In 1832 the Andover Circuit was formed, which embraced the Andover and Boscawen Churches. A grand camp-meeting was held in June, 1834, on the plains near the school-house, by the societies of this denomination. Many tents were pitched, a large number of speakers present, and the meeting continued four days. During the prosperous days of the society in Andover it was widely known for the zeal and interest manifested.

In 1818 a Universalist Society was incorporated. In 1819 the first church was gathered in Andover, under the name of the Christian Denomination. The numbers of this society were large, and at its formation had one hundred and seven members. A second church of this denomination was formed in May, 1820, with twenty-five members, and these churches were under the pastoral care of Elder Peter Young and Elder Nehemiah Sleeper. A third Christian Church was organized at Andover Centre August 19, 1843, with seventeen members. The meetings were held in the meeting-house in connection with other societies, and Elder Elijah Shaw will be remembered as a leading man in this church during its early days. The creed to which their signatures were attached was, "To recognize each other as the Church of God, receiving the New Testament as the rule of faith and practice." Other religious denominations have been represented in town, but if ever formally organized here, their records have not been found.

Schools.—Perhaps no town in the State, with no larger population than Andover, has had better school advantages. Whatever difference of opinion may have existed regarding other public affairs, the necessity of providing for the intellectual training of the rising generation was realized by the original grantees, and the means of instruction have since been fully supported by the inhabitants of the town.

We find in the grant of the township certain lots of land reserved for the maintenance of schools, and in the early days of the settlement of the town, before school districts or school-houses had an existence here, schools were kept in dwelling-houses and in barns.

The character of the first settlers was such as to perceive the necessity of at least the rudiments of an education, and the first instructor in these primitive schools is familiarly known as Master Randall. He taught school in the winter season, usually in barns, without the comforts of a fire or the luxury of doors to the building. Various places are pointed out as the location of these schools. This first instructor is buried in the southeastern part of the town, and in an unmarked grave. Other instructors followed Mr. Randall, and as early as 1783 the town voted seventy dollars for the support of schools, and for several years following, appropriations were almost annually made for this purpose. The division of the town into school districts, probably, was not contemplated by the proprietors at the time of the grant. It was not until 1799, or nearly fifty years after, that the selectmen were voted a committee to divide the town into school districts, each district to build its own school-house. The town was divided into seven districts, and was afterwards kept in a state of constant perplexity by the changing of district lines. In 1779 the town voted to sell one of the school lots at public auction, and expend the money for schooling. Whether a school lot was sold and the money thus expended we have been unable to determine. Undoubtedly it was, for the second lot was sold in 1810 for one hundred and ninety dollars, and the remaining lot in 1829, the proceeds of both being appropriated for the support of schools.

In 1829 the town received its proportion of the literary fund, which, added to the amount realized from the sale of school lots, was placed at interest. In 1835 this had amounted to $1219.37, and the income of this has been annually expended in the support of schools.

At the time of districting the town, in 1799, eight hundred dollars was raised for building school-houses in the several districts. In 1808 the town was re-districted into eleven, and in 1863 into fifteen districts. In 1875 Districts Nos. 14 and 15 were annexed to No. 12, and District No. 6 was abolished by being united to the several districts adjoining. In 1884 Nos. 12 and 13 were united, and eleven is the number of districts existing in the town to-day.

The first superintending school committee was chosen in 1809, and consisted of Rev. Josiah Badcock, John Weare and Ephraim Eastman. A committee was only occasionally elected until 1846, since which time they have been annually chosen by the town or appointed by the selectmen.

The annual report of the superintendent of schools was first published in 1858, again in 1860, since which time they have been annually issued in printed form.

In 1875 a history of the schools of the town was prepared by Rev. Howard Moody, the committee of that year, and published in the annual report of the State superintendent. For several years following 1858 the schools of the town were under the superintendency of Hon. John M. Shirley, who brought to them such invigorating discipline and system as to produce beneficial effects for many years. Perhaps no superintendent has taken a greater interest or given more time to the welfare of our schools than did Clarence E. Carr in 1876.

The citizens of the town have manifested great liberality in later years by appropriations for the support of schools, and have otherwise shown such a kindly interest in their success as to produce most gratifying results.

At various times local schools have been successful and well supported. The Noyes High School, liberally endowed by Mr. Joseph Noyes, was, for a time, noted and prosperous in that part of the town now Franklin. Schools at East Andover, Taunton Hill, Andover Centre and West Andover have at different times been successful in aiding the district schools and academies in advancing the standard of education within the limits of the town.

PROCTOR ACADEMY.—The school association, from which Proctor Academy originated, dates its first formal meeting July 8, 1818, a list of thirty-six names having been previously obtained and duly chartered for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a school. Hon. Samuel Butterfield was chosen president of the corporation, Wileot Hamlin secretary, and the school named Andover Academy. The noted instructor, Dyer H. Sanborn, was the first principal, and Miss Eliza Wingate preceptress. Four terms of twelve weeks each were held annually, and the instruction included the languages, drawing, painting and needle-work. A catalogue, published at the close of the first term, gives an attendance of one hundred and five scholars. Professor Sanborn resigned during the second year, and Moses L. Morse, A.M., was chosen, remaining in the school until August, 1851. The duties of preceptress were performed by Miss Louisa J. Clark and Miss Hannah J. Sanborn. During the two years of Mr. Morse's management the school was exceedingly prosperous. Among those fitted for college was John Wesley Simonds, who entered the sophomore class from this school, graduated with honors, was afterwards an instructor here and a leading educator of the State. Two hundred and fifty-two scholars are reported for the two years. Thomas W. Bruce, A.B., was then chosen principal, and Miss Marcia E. Foster preceptress, and at the expiration of two years Mr. Bruce was succeeded by George Dustan, A.B. The school was well sustained, the names of two hundred and five students appearing in the catalogue issued April, 1854. John W. Allard, A.B., was the next principal, chosen in August of this year. Sickness soon after caused disturbance and excitement in the school, and finally produced its discontinuance. In July, 1856, the property and appurtenances of Andover Academy, by vote of the trustees, were transferred to the members of the New England Christian Conference, and the name changed to the New England Christian Literary and Biblical Institute. On the 18th of February, 1857, school was opened under the new organization with John W. Simonds principal, O. D. Barrett, A.B., and Miss D. E. Payne assistants. At the close of the first term Mr. Barrett and Miss Payne were succeeded by George O. Dodson, A.M., and Miss Mary J. Ambrose, who remained one year. The students number one hundred and ninety-six at this time. Mr. Simonds remained at the head of the school until the fall of 1858, effecting a thorough and systematic organization in the various departments of instruction. Rev. S. W. Whiting was principal until November 10, 1859, and was succeeded by John M. Haley, A.B. In October, 1860, the management of the school was restricted to the New Hampshire Christian Conference, and the name changed to the Andover Christian Institute. Rev. John Burden was chosen president of the trustees, and Rev. Thomas Bartlett elected principal. Mr. Bartlett retained his position until 1865, when the school was discontinued at Andover, and soon after removed to Wolfborough. This academic institution had been in operation in Andover, with only brief cessations, for seventeen years; and, although controlled by different parties and under different names, its methods and operation were not materially changed. It was well supported by the citizens of the town, and had an average annual attendance of one hundred and thirty scholars. For several years no school was regularly sustained. In 1874, having closed its work in Wolfborough, the liberality of the citizens of Andover induced the officers of the corporation to return the school to its former location. The school buildings and four thousand dollars for repairing and enlarging were presented to the association, which was incorporated by the Legislature of New Hampshire, June 24, 1874, under the name of Proctor Academy. It was named in honor of Hon. John Proctor, a wealthy citizen of the town, one of the grantees of the charter and a liberal contributor to the school. It was organized here and managed, for a brief time, by Hon. J. W. Simonds. Following are the names of the principals in this academy since its reorganization in Andover: 1874, Miss Annie P. Little; 1875, Frank P. Adams; 1876-76, Alvah H. Morrill; 1876-77, Alvah H. Morrill; 1877-78, Alvah H. Morrill; 1878, Henry Melville; 1878-79, B. A. Field; 1879-80, George W. Stone; 1880-81, Herbert B. Dow; 1881-82, W. J. Loyd; 1882-83, Herbert B. Dow; 1883-84, Herbert B. Dow; 1884-85, Herbert B. Dow. During this time one or more assistants have been employed. Mr. Dow is a graduate of Dartmouth in 1879, and his earnest efforts in this school are bringing gratifying results.

HIGHLAND LAKE INSTITUTE.—In the early part of the year 1859, citizens of East Andover, interested in education and emulated by the success of the school at Andover Centre, raised by subscription a sufficient fund for the erection of a building for school purposes. The paper, to which about fifty people attached signatures, was dated March 23, 1859, and read as follows:

"We, the subscribers, will pay the several sums set against our names respectively for the erection of a building at East Andover of suitable size, furnished for an academy and other purposes, to be divided into shares of five dollars each, each shareholder to be entitled to vote, according to number of shares, in all matters in relation to the building and locating said house, and all other matters touching the interest of the same. No subscription to be paid unless a sufficient amount be subscribed.

The sum subscribed was paid either in money, labor or material, for which certificates of stock were issued. A deed of the land, on which the building still remains, was given May 28th, and an organization formed about this time known as the East Andover High School Association, with the following officers: President, Rev. D. Sydney Frost; Secretary, Geo. E. Emery; Treasurer, Joseph Osgood; Executive Committee, Jeremy Y. Bryant, Joseph A. Rowe, Caleb Cross, Thomas Haley, William A. Bachelor, Joseph Osgood and George E. Emery.

The building was immediately erected, and in the fall of the same year the first term of school was held, known as the Highland Lake Institute, with instructors as follows: Principal, Lyman Marshall, A.B.; Preceptress, Miss Eliza Wingate; Teacher of Chirography, Rev. D. Sidney Frost. The examining committee consisted of N. B. Bryant, Esq., Bristol; Rev. D. Sydney Frost, East Andover; David Cross, Esq., Manchester; Rev. Reuben Dearborn, Andover; E. G. Emery, Esq., Danvers, Mass.

Connected with the institute was a reading-room containing a selection of daily and weekly papers, to which a library of considerable extent was afterwards added. Three literary societies were in prosperous condition,—“The Mountain Club,” “The Y. M. D. Society” and the young ladies’ literary society, “The Conjunctæ Germanæ.” Instruction was given in drawing, music and painting, and no pains spared for a first-class school. The natural attractions of the place, the interest of the citizens and energy of the officers of the association contributed in making the school a most gratifying success, the names of eighty-six scholars having been enrolled at the close of the first term, November 5, 1859.

Willard Emery was chosen president of the association at this time, Rev. Reuben Dearborn and Watson Dickerson vice-presidents. To the faculty were added Thomas Marshall and Milan Graves as assistants; George W. Murray, teacher of music; D. P. Putnam, M.D., lecturer on anatomy and physiology; and William P. Hammond was chosen teacher of chirography. A normal class was formed for instruction in the science of teaching. Various other advantages were offered, and the school continued to prosper, having one hundred and forty-three scholars, representing thirty towns of New Hampshire and four New England States in the year 1851.

During the following year changes were made in the board of instruction. Rev. C. M. Dinsmore, A.B., was chosen principal; Miss Letitia J. Shaw, preceptress; George S. Rawson, M.D., lecturer on anatomy and physiology; and S. G. Haley, teacher of penmanship. The previous prosperity of the school continued, the number of scholars was slightly increased and its enviable reputation became more extended during 1852.

At the close of the school year in November, W. A. Bachelder was elected secretary, to succeed Mr. Emery, and several changes were made in the executive committee, Mr. Willard Emery still continuing as president of the organization. Nathan F. Carter, A.B., succeeded Mr. Dinsmore as principal, Miss Shaw remained as preceptress, assisted by Miss Mary J. Cross during the fall term, and Miss Marilla J. Butler was teacher of music. The catalogue issued in November, 1883, indicates the same thrifty condition of the school, and the elevating and educational influence upon the entire community surrounding its location is conceded by all familiar with its history.

Public meetings by the literary societies were frequently held and widely known for the dramatic talent displayed. At this time, those interested in its organization, having either sought a higher education or entered business life, were compelled to relinquish further interest here. The school was not supported by others, and, after a lingering existence, this institution, which had been successful and very productive of good in many ways, was entirely discontinued, and the building only occasionally used for a school by some transient instructor. In 1867 a majority of the stock held in the building was purchased by C. A. Durgin, Esq. A litigation followed between Mr. Durgin and other owners in regard to the disposition to be made of the building, and was decided in 1873, the building having remained on its original location and used for such purposes as the needs of the town require.

Religious Informer.—The Religious Informer was published at Andover Centre by Rev. Ebenezer Chase. The first number was issued July 20, 1819, and commenced with a subscription-list of one hundred and forty. It was a small sheet of eight pages, published in pamphlet form, twice a month, at seventy-five cents per year. At the expiration of six months it was enlarged to sixteen pages, issued monthly and the price reduced. It soon after reached a circulation of eight hundred. It was devoted to the interests of the Free-Will Baptist Church, and did valuable service in securing regularity and uniformity in the churches and Quarterly Meetings of this denomination. Mr. Chase was a practical printer. He owned the press and type, and, with the assistance of a journeyman printer, the labor was all performed by himself and family. This was one of the first religious papers published, and at the expiration of four years was removed to Enfield, and continued under the same management.

Various books and pamphlets were issued from this office, and the ingenuity and skill of Mr. Chase as a printer are highly commended by the newspapers of that day. He not only learned the trade without assistance, but made the press himself upon which his first work was executed.

Physicians.—The first physician settled in Andover was Dr. Silas Barnard. He was born in Bolton, Mass., a son of Francis Barnard, the common ancestor of the distinguished men of this name famous in early New England history. Dr. Barnard came to Andover in 1792 and practiced his profession here until his death, June 25, 1795.

Dr. Jacob B. Moore, the second physician settled in Andover, was born September 5, 1772, at Georgetown, Me., and was of Scotch descent. He was a man of culture, and is said to have acquired a fine education by his own industry. He came to the town in 1796 and practiced his profession with great success until 1812, when he received the appointment as surgeon's mate in the United States army. He continued in the service until December of that year, when he returned to his family, his health destroyed, and died January 10, 1813.

His two sons, Henry E. and Jacob B. Moore, are quite extensively known. Dr. Moore was a musician and poet of some note, and his remains are buried at East Andover.

Dr. Silas Merrill moved to Andover about 1811 and was the successor of Dr. Moore. Dr. Merrill was born January 16, 1784, in Salem, N. H., and studied his profession with Dr. Morrill, of Epsom. He built a house, in 1819, on the place where Dr. H. A. Weymouth now lives, this place having been occupied by a physician since that time. Gains Jenkins, who was deliberately shot by the Kansas Senator, Jim Lane, was a son-in-law of Dr. Merrill. Dr. Merrill remained in practice in Andover until 1837, when he moved to Peoria County, Ill., and his house and practice were taken by Dr. James M. Buzzell.

Dr. Buzzell remained until 1839, when he was succeeded by Dr. Jacob C. Hanson. Dr. Hanson remained until September, 1843, when Dr. Henry A. Weymouth moved to the town and to the place where he has since resided.

This seems to be the line of physicians in direct succession since Dr. Barnard came to town, in 1792. Others have been located in town. Dr. Tilton Elkins was at West Andover from 1820 to 1854, except two years at Concord, about 1835. Mr. Elkins was born at Andover Centre in 1799. Dr. J. Allen Tibbetts was at Taunton Hill from 1842 to 1844. Dr. John P. Elkins, Dr. Nelson P. Clark, Dr. Simpson and others have been located in the town for brief periods. The earliest physicians, Dr. Barnard and Dr. Moore, were located at East Andover; Doctors Merrill, Buzzell, Hanson and Weymouth at Taunton Hill. Dr. Henry A. Weymouth has been in the practice of his profession in Andover forty-two years. It has not been confined to the limits of the town, and students of the profession in his office are now successful physicians in other sections. Dr. Weymouth is a member of the New Hampshire Medical Society and of the National Medical Association. He enjoys an extended acquaintance, has received all honors within the gift of the town and is still in the vigor of life.

Lawyers.—The legal fraternity were first represented in Andover in 1817 by John H. Slack.

Samuel Butterfield opened a law-office at Andover Centre in 1829. In 1852, Wolcott Hamlin came to the town and formed a partnership with Mr. Butterfield, under the firm-name of Butterfield & Hamlin. Mr. Hamlin moved from town, and the partnership was dissolved in 1855.

John M. Shirley came to Andover September 11, 1855, and October 1, 1855, formed the partnership known as Butterfield & Shirley, and which existed until the death of Mr. Butterfield, in 1869. Mr. Butterfield was also connected with an office in Concord during the later years. John P. Carr, Jr., entered the firm with Mr. Shirley, January 1, 1867, and remained until May 8, 1869. Frank Kimball came to the town in the fall of 1869 and remained two years in the office of John M. Shirley.

Clarence E. Carr was admitted to the bar in August, 1879, and a partnership was formed January 1, 1880, under the firm-name of Shirley & Carr, and existed until January, 1882. George W. Stone was admitted to the bar in August, 1882, and entered into partnership with Mr. Shirley, January 1, 1883, with the firm-name of Shirley & Stone, and this remains as the firm at the present time.

Frank W. Proctor was admitted to the bar in 1876. Mr. Proctor was afterward in Kansas two years, when he returned to the town and practiced his profession at Andover Centre until near the close of 1881. At this time he moved to Boston, and is now in the practice of his profession in that city, as a member of the firm of Upham & Proctor. Several students have been connected with the law-office at Andover and admitted to the bar elsewhere.

Centennial Anniversary.—The one hundredth anniversary of the incorporation of the town of Andover was celebrated at East Andover June 25, 1879.

It is estimated that two thousand five hundred people were in attendance, and it was the most noted day in the history of the town. Clark Durgin was chairman of the committee of arrangements, and the following were the permanent officers of the day: President, Hon. J. W. Fellows; Vice-Presidents, William Dyer, James Marston, Henry D. Cilley, Joseph A. Rowe, Samuel Morrill, Ziba Severence, Herod Thompson, John Keniston, Silas C. Fifield, John Wadleigh, Elias Davis, Benjamin F. Scribner, Gilbert C. Kilburn, Warren Rowell, Andrew J. Cilley; Secretary, Henry M. Putney.

Prayer was offered by Rev. Howard Moody. Mrs. R. G. Burleigh sang "Hurrah for Old New England," after which the president of the day made appropriate introductory remarks and felicitously introduced the speakers. George E. Emery, of Lynn, Mass., delivered the historical address. The school children of Andover sang "America." Hon. N. B. Bryant, of Boston, delivered an oration. The Gifford Cornet Band was in attendance and furnished music for the occasion. A fine collation was served to all, after which the literary exercises were resumed, and the following toasts, announced by the president, were ably responded to by the persons named:

"The President of the United States"—Hon. A. E. Pike.

"The State of New Hampshire"—[A letter of regret was read from Governor Head, who was to respond to this sentiment, and an original poem by Eliza Ivan Proctor was read by Miss Mary A. Brown.]

"The United States Navy"—Prof. John R. Eastman.

"The Judiciary System of New Hampshire"—Hon. N. B. Bryant.

"Highland Lake Institute and Andover Academy"—Rev. C. M. Dinsmore.

"The Common School System of New England"—George W. Stone, Eq.

The exercises were held in the grove near the village, and perfect order prevailed throughout the day. A valuable and interesting collection of historical articles was exhibited in Academy Hall, and was visited by hundreds of people. It comprised a great variety of ancient articles, the oldest of which was a book loaned by George E. Emery, of Lynn, Mass., printed in 1546. The hall was in charge of Walter B. Durgin, and proved one of the most attractive features of the centennial. The occasion was a grand success and worthy the day celebrated.

Secret Organizations.—KEARSARGE LODGE, NO. 81, F. AND A. MASONS.—The first meeting was held under a dispensation, April 28, 1866. The lodge was constituted, hall dedicated and first officers elected and installed June 23, 1866.

Officers as follows: Master, George Sleeper; S. Warden, Charles W. Quimby; J. Warden, William H. Huntoon; Treasurer, Moses P. Thomson; Secretary, George H. Morrill.

The society has an elegantly furnished hall at Andover Centre, and a good sum in the treasury. Present number of members sixty-three, and following are the names of the masters in order of service: George Sleeper, Charlton W. Woodbury, John B. Wadleigh, Joseph D. Philbrick, George H. Morrill, Frank P. Goss, Herbert B. Dow.

HIGHLAND LAKE GRANGE, No. 88, P. of H.—This society was organized December 14, 1876, with twenty-seven charter members. Officers elected: Master, J. B. Wadleigh; Overseer, O. E. Eastman; Lecturer, E. G. Emery. Masters, in order of service, J. B. Wadleigh, N. J. Bachelder, G. H. Haley. Present number of members, fifty-eight.

The hall is located at East Andover, conveniently furnished, and meetings are held twice a month during the year.

The Proctor House was erected at Andover Centre in 1874 by Hon. John Proctor. It was a magnificent hotel, built and furnished in elegant style at an expense of over one hundred thousand dollars. It became a noted summer resort under the management of W. S. Thomson, the popular landlord, and was patronized to its greatest capacity. This house was destroyed by fire March 23, 1882, and proved a severe loss to the business interests of the town.

Many individuals of local note and eccentricities have lived in the town whose personal history would prove interesting, while those of a broader influence and reputation are already known to some extent. Richard Potter, the celebrated ventriloquist and juggler, resided in the town, and is buried at the Potter Place, a village named in his honor.

Andover has representatives among the leading minds of the country in all honorable professions at the present day. Successful business men in the accumulation of wealth, and professional men of distinguished honors refer to Andover as their native town. Leading educators, noted authors and eminent jurists could be mentioned.

Edna Dean Proctor, whose fame as a poetess is world-wide, has resided in the town. Napoleon Bonaparte Bryant, a power in the legal fraternity of Massachusetts and the country, was reared on a farm in Andover. Perhaps there exists at the present day characters equally as grand, which the power of development will disclose.

Present Condition.—The town of Andover is bounded by the towns of Hill on the north, Franklin on the east, Salisbury on the south and Wilmot on the west. The Northern Railroad traverses about thirteen miles of the town, and four stations are located within its limits: East Andover, Andover Centre, Potter Place and West Andover.

Cilleyville is a small village supported by its water-power.

Andover has a population of twelve hundred and four, mainly engaged in farming. The natural resources of the town are abundant, and the soil in the hilly sections is strong and well adapted to grass-culture, while the sides of the mountains afford excellent pasturage for the flocks and herds annually driven from the southern part of the State and from Massachusetts. Its manufactories consist of two hosiery-mills and a hame manufactory.

Harrison M. Busiel is making hosiery on the site of the first saw-mill in town, and the Murphy Brothers are operating, on a lease, a hosiery-factory on the place to which the first saw-mill was subsequently moved.

The manufacture of hames at Andover Centre is a peculiar business, these goods being made at but a few places in the United States. The firm was established in Enfield February 10, 1860, by Robert C. Carr and Joseph Baker, under the firm-name of Baker & Carr. The business was moved to Andover in December, 1863, and several changes have since been made in the firm, which is now known as Baker, Carr & Co. The members of the firm at present are Joseph Baker, John P. Carr, Walter S. Carr and Clarence E. Carr. Within the memory of the senior partner, hames were made from old ox-hoes which had become useless, and the work mainly done by hand. They now manufacture by machinery four hundred kinds of hames, and the styles are constantly changing. The trade-mark of the firm is "The Concord Hames." It is conceded by most, if not all manufacturers, that the best Concord hames manufactured in this country are made here. The market is mainly confined to this country, with some export trade. An extensive wholesale and retail grain trade is carried on by Daniel Downes at the Potter Place.

The natural attractions of Andover are a leading feature. The grand scenery of Kearsarge and Ragged Mountains on the west and north is afforded variety by the numerous ponds and innumerable streams abounding. Blackwater River flows in a southeasterly direction through the town. Elbo Pond, often known as Echo Lake, located at the base of Ragged Mountain, is surrounded by an irregular outline and densely-wooded shores. It is easily accessible, yet has wild natural attractions so much admired. It is well-known to sportsmen for its pickerel-fishing and is a noted resort for wild fowl in their spring and fall migrations. Adder and Cole Ponds are also in the vicinity of the mountain, but remote from any road or present habitation. The latter is stocked with trout of the gamest kind, bred in the pond and its tributary, and never displaced by the introduction of inferior fish. Bradley Pond is at the base of Kearsarge Mountain. Highland Lake is in the eastern section, contains nearly a square mile and has lately been stocked with land-locked salmon. It is noted for the purity of its water, and the dry and rocky shores adjoining well-kept groves, finely cultivated farms and numerous dwellings. An island, known as Halexon, adds to the picturesqueness, and since before the memory of the oldest inhabitant a pair of loons have annually returned and reared their young on this beautiful lake. The black bass and pickerel-fishing attract sportsmen in its season, and many summer tourists find in the romantic surroundings of this vicinity a pleasant annual sojourn.

HISTORY OF HENNIKER.

BY E. W. COGSWELL.

CHAPTER I.

HENNIKER is the most southwesterly town of Merrimack County, and is in form nearly a square. It is, in its extent, on its east line, adjoining Hopkinton, two thousand one hundred and fifty-two rods, the variation of lots being south eighteen degrees east. Its west line, adjoining Hillsborough, is two thousand one hundred and fifty-two rods in extent, the variation of the lots being the same as upon its west line.

Its north line is, in extent, one thousand six hundred and thirteen rods adjoining Warner, and four hundred rods adjoining Bradford, the variation of lots being north eighty-two degrees east. The south line is one thousand two hundred and twenty-seven rods adjoining Weare, and seven hundred and eighty-six rods adjoining Deering, the variation of lots being the same as upon the north line. The township is, therefore, seven-sixteenths of a mile longer upon its east and west lines than upon its north and south. The township contains about twenty-seven thousand acres, one-fifth of which is covered with water.

The town is situated in latitude $43^{\circ} 10'$ north, and in longitude $5^{\circ} 10'$ east from Washington, and lies fifteen miles west from Concord, twenty-seven north from Amherst, thirty-four east from Keene and twenty-five northwesterly from Manchester.

The Contoocook River enters the town at its southwestern side, passing easterly through its centre, and leaving the town upon its eastern side. The course of the river is very circuitous, and presents, in many places, scenery of peculiar interest and beauty. Few places in the State have better water-power than is afforded by this river within this township. The vicinity of the falls, in the southwesterly part of the town, presents as favorable a power as can well be found in any other town. The stream rises rapidly in the spring of the year and during heavy storms, but as soon subsides when the cause is removed, and an even supply of water, the entire season, goes rippling and singing on its way to the ocean.

The surface of the town is broken and in some parts hilly. The highest hill is Craney Hill, which, tradition says, was so called for a family by that name who at one time resided upon its south side and near the Weare line. Its elevation is one thousand four hundred and twenty feet above the sea. Upon the southerly side of this hill are to be found some of the best farms of the town. A chain of hills extends from this hill westerly to the river, beyond which are some of the most hilly, but best cultivated farms. A chain of hills extends along the western line of the town affording most excellent pasturage, and, in some places, excellent farms. Slight elevations, only, exist in the northern and eastern parts of the town. The land lying in the valley of the river was not considered fit for settlement until long years after the town began to be peopled, the larger part of the inhabitants settling upon the hills. In this valley are situated the two villages, one mile apart, and many excellent farms. A large number of the early settlers commenced living in the town, in its southeast part, in consequence of there being at that time quite a tract of low land, upon which grew a coarse grass, which assisted in sustaining the little stock that was kept until the land could be cleared. This natural meadow, now quite large, has furnished an immense amount of hay during the century and a quarter it has been mown.

Few minerals have ever been found in the town, Craney Hill furnishing a little black lead.

Besides the river, the town is well watered, quite a number of small streams rising in different parts of the town, and others still coming into town, and nearly all emptying into the river.

Most of these small streams furnish water during the entire season, affording good fishing-grounds.

Quite a number of ponds are to be found in different parts of the town, the largest of which is Long Pond, situated one mile and a half north of the main village. This pond was known for over half a century as Farnham's Pond, having been named for Baracus Farnham, the first settler near it. This pond is about one mile in length from east to west, and from sixty to eighty rods in width from north to south.

Connecting with Long Pond is Middle Pond, a little pond lying easterly from Long Pond, being about eight rods across it, and nearly circular in form. Connected with this pond, and lying easterly, is Upper Pond, about eighty rods across, it and some half a mile in width. This pond was formerly known as North Outlet Pond. These ponds furnish a large amount of fishing-grounds, and are much sought after during the proper times for fishing.

Besides these, there are Whitaker's and Cove's Ponds, in the easterly part of the town, both of which were favorite resorts for fishing and camping by the Indians. A few years since the relics of an Indian were found buried near the first-named pond.

Pleasant Pond is situated in the south part of the town, from which flows a little stream, which has been utilized for more than a century for milling purposes. Craney Hill Pond is situated close under the hill, on its southern slope. Baxton's and Morrill's Ponds are also in the south part of the town, both small in size. Mud Pond is situated in the southeast part of the town, and Clough's Pond in the northwest part.

All the woods usually found in this latitude are to be found in the town, as also are all the fruits growing here in large quantities.

The scenery of the town is very fine as a whole. From the hills around some fine views may be taken in. From the summit of Craney Hill a magnificent view is to be had. Several villages and innumerable farm-houses dot the landscape as far as the eye can reach. On a clear day the snowy peak of Mount Washington is to be seen. From the northernmost step of Federal Hill the eye takes in one of the finest panoramas of nature that exists in this vicinity. The valley can be seen for miles, through which can be traced the Contoocook in its various windings, the intervalles and the plains, in the summer clothed with the most luxuriant green; while close under the feet, as it were, stands the main village of the town, with its snowy-white buildings embowered behind the beautiful maples which adorn the streets. A little to the left can be seen the pretty little village of West Henniker, buried, seemingly, in shade. The town has become a popular resort for summer tourists, on account of its pleasant location and its varied landscape. None better are to be found anywhere.

The sons and the daughters who have gone out from these hills and these valleys, and have made themselves homes in different parts of the world, ever revert with pleasure to the good old town which gave them birth, and love it yet as the dearest spot on earth.

First Grant of this Township by the Province of Massachusetts.—In 1690 the colonies in New England and New York, being aroused at the unprovoked atrocities committed upon some of the inhabitants of the frontier towns during the year previous by Indians and Canadian allies, determined upon a speedy revenge, and united in an effort to invade Canada and, if possible, to conquer it. With this end in view, two expeditions were sent against that province—one, a land expedition from the New York colonies, was sent against Montreal; the other, a naval expedition, against Quebec. This latter expedition was furnished wholly by the Massachusetts colony, and consisted of thirty-four vessels and two thousand men, under the command of Sir William Phipps, a native of Pennaquid (now Bristol), Me. Finding the city strongly fortified and an attack with the forces at his command useless he returned to Boston, and the expedition was a failure.

The soldiers in this expedition were paid for their services in paper money, the first ever seen in New England, which soon became so depreciated in value as to become almost worthless. Nearly forty years afterwards the soldiers of this expedition then living, petitioned the General Court of the province of Massachusetts for an additional compensation for their services in grants of land, which petitions were generally granted. Eight townships in New Hampshire, from territory claimed by Massachusetts, were granted these different petitioners.

One of the companies in the expedition in 1690 was composed of men from Middlesex and Worcester Counties, Mass., and was commanded by Captain Andrew Gardner. A large number of the men composing Captain Gardner's company were from Stowe, Marlborough and Westborough, Mass., and these men, headed by John Whitman, Esq. (at that time one of the most prominent men of Stowe, and a grandson of John Whitman, who was in Weymouth, Mass., before 1633), petitioned the General Court of Massachusetts in 1728 for a grant of land six miles square. After various delays, for which the most trifling reasons were given, in 1734 the attention of the General Court was again directed to the prayer of these petitioners, and on January 11, 1735, the petition was referred to its appropriate committee, which committee, on the day following, January 15, 1735, reported through its chairman, Edward Quincy, as follows:

"January 15, 1735. Willm. Dooly, Esq., submitteth a report from the Committee on the Petitions for Townships, &c., ordered a survey of the Lands between Merrimack & Connecticut Rivers, in the North of the Center of Rindol on the Merrimack to the Great Falls on the Connecticut, at least 12 miles in breadth, and a committee of 14 was chosen to lay out the land into townships of six miles square, not less than six miles square from East to West, to make reports to the next session."

"That John Whitman, Esq., and others that have not been heard of, be admitted to come, or send others within the space of seven years last past, or in any former or other Grant of a township, or particular tract of land, condition of settling, and that shall appear and give security to the value of Forty Pounds to perform the Condition that shall be imposed by this Court, may, by the major part of the committee, be admitted to receive notice of the said Township, the committee to give public notice of the time and place of their meeting, to admit of others, which committee shall be empowered to employ surveyors and chainmen, as well the men as surveyors and chainmen, not exceeding twelve at the charge, and be repaid by the town or towns, who may be admitted, the whole charge they shall advance, which committee we approve of and hereby do give and impose, and do admit of all others, who shall be admitted, and take their bonds payable by the committee, and then sit on the said first, to the use of the Province, by the performance of the conditions of the Grant, viz. That each Grant should be divided into 36 equal lots of six acres and seven foot and six inch of the least, on the respective Bous Lots, and broken up for ploughing, or other and stock with English Grass, &c. Acres of Land within three years next after their admittance, and cause their respective Lots to be inhabited, and that the Grantees do, within the space of three years from the time of their being admitted, build and finish a Convenient Meeting-House for the publick Worship of God and settle a learned Orthodox Minister, and in case any of the Grantees shall fail or neglect to perform what is enjoin'd as above, the Committee shall be oblig'd to put the bonds in suit and take possession of the Lots and Rights that shall become forfeit, and proceed to grant them to other Persons that will appear to fulfil the conditions within one year next after the said last-mentioned Grant. And if a sufficient number of Petitioners that have had no Grant within seven years as aforesaid, viz. sixty to each Township, do not appear, others may be admitted, provided they have fulfilled the Conditions of their former Grant, the Committee to take care that the whole sixty-three House Lots laid out in a regular, compact and defensible manner as the Land will allow of, one of which Lots shall be for the first settled Minister, one for second Minister and one for the School, to each of which an equal proportion of Land shall accrue in all their divisions, By order of the Committee.

This was concurred in in the Council the same day, J. Belcher, Governor. The following order was passed the same day :

“Ordered, that Joseph Gerrish, Benjamin Prescott, Josiah Willard, Job Almy, Esqrs, Mr. Moses Peterson and Capt. Joseph Gidd, with such as the honorable Board shall join, be a Committee to all Intents and Purposes, to effect the business proposed by the report of the Committee of both Houses, to Consider the Petitions for Townships, which passed this Day, &c., on the proposed Line between Merrimack and Connecticut Rivers, and on both sides of Connecticut River, and that they be granted and allowed, to be paid out of the publick Treasury after the rate of fifteen shillings per diem to each one of the Committee for every day he is in the Service in the Woods, and subsistence, and ten shillings per diem for every day to each one of the said Committee while in the Service in admitting settlers into the said Towns, and subsistence.”

The proposition to oblige the petitioners or grantees to give a bond for fifty pounds was afterwards stricken out, and the commonwealth assumed all expense under that sum. This committee caused the necessary survey to be made in accordance with the above order, and made their report at the next session of the Provincial Assembly.

The townships thus surveyed were assigned to the several parties petitioning, and this township, known then as No. 6 in the line of townships, was assigned to John Whitman, Esq., and others, of Stowe and Marlborough, as witness the following :

“On the petition of John Whitman, Esq., and others, of Stowe and Marlborough, &c., praying for Lands, as certified the 2d of December, 1732, and referred, which was read and accepted, and the House came into the Court of a Township of the contents aforesaid, in a reasonable part on the Concord-Cook River, on the same Conditions of Settlement with the former. Sent up for Concurrence Dec. 13th, 1732.”

Upon this order the grant was made as above given. Before completing all the necessary arrangements for the settling of this township the Provincial Assembly adjourned, and it was not until December 4, 1736, that the following order was passed :

December 4, 1736. John Whitman, of Stowe, Esq. is hereby allowed Land and empowered to receive and convey as soon as may be the Grants or Proprietors of No. 6, lying in the Line of Towns between the Rivers Merrimack and Merrimack, to whose officers and divide their Lands and make return of the same to the Court.”

The petitioners met at Concord, Mass., in September, 1737, at which time sixty grantees were admitted. Thus, after a delay of some ten years after the petition of Mr. Whitman and others was received by the Provincial Assembly, this tardy act of justice was done. These petitioners were well advanced in years when the grant was made, for nearly half a century had passed away since they were soldiers in the ill-fated expedition in which they were engaged. John Whitman was a grandson of John Whitman, of Weymouth, Mass., who was in New England before 1633, and was the ancestor of the Whitman family in America, and settled in Stowe, Mass., about 1675-80. He was a prominent man of the town, being a justice of the peace, and was empowered by the General Court of Massachusetts to settle all difficulties arising amongst the settlers about him, particularly those relating to land titles. He died in Stowe shortly after receiving this grant, and was the immediate ancestor of the Whitman family, which has existed in this town, Henniker, for nearly a century. There is no record yet discovered of the action taken by these grantees, but as will be seen further on, improvements were made in No. 6,—roads were laid out, which were “paths” through the wilderness, and preparations were made to erect a mill, and tradition says one was operated for a short time, but there is no definite proof of it. A few settlers came into the township, but the exact locality of their settlement is not known. Mr. Crane, with a large family, resided on the north shore of the pond south of Crancy Hill, which hill was named for him; but he, as well as the other settlers, were driven from the township by Indians. One or more settlers made a clearing in the southeast part of the township, and others in the southwest part, near Hillsborough line and in close proximity to the few settlers then in that town. None of the grantees of the township ever settled within its borders, and they were evidently deterred from doing so because of the dispute between Massachusetts and New Hampshire as to the southern boundary line of New Hampshire which was in dispute from the early part of the eighteenth century until its final settlement, in 1749; and the French and Indian War followed so closely upon this settlement that permanent settlers were deterred from entering the township. By the terms of the settlement, all of the line of towns that had been surveyed were inclosed in New Hampshire, nearly all of the land in dispute being claimed by the heirs of Captain Mason, who finally succeeded in establishing their claim, and then disposed of their interest to a company of gentlemen of Portsmouth and vicinity, who were known afterwards as the “Masonian Proprietors.”

After the trouble between New Hampshire and Massachusetts had been adjusted, some of the grantees, whose titles to township had been vitiated by the cession of lands in this State back to the State, petitioned the General Court for township within its jurisdiction.

Among those who made application were the heirs and assigns of the first grantees of this township. Under date of February 26, 1774, they petitioned the General Court of Massachusetts, as follows:

"PROVINCE OF THE MASSACHUSETTS BAY.

"To his Excellency, Thomas Hutchinson, Captain General and Commander-in-Chief in and over this Province. To the Honorable His Majesty's Council and to the Honorable House of Representatives in General Court aforesaid, Assembled, Feb. 26th, 1774. The petitioners of the subscribers in behalf of ourselves and heirs, grantees of the township No. 6, in the line of towns, humbly sheweth that the great and general Court of this Province, at their session 1755, granted a township of the contents of six miles square, No. 6, in the lines of towns between the Connecticut and Merrimack Rivers; that the grantees were at considerable expense in clearing its woods, building mills, &c. in said township; that by the late running of the line between this government and the government of New Hampshire, the said township was taken into the government of New Hampshire, and your petitioners and their associates have lost their interest therein, together with the money expended for bringing forward the settlement of the township. Your petitioners humbly request that you, Excellency and honors would, in your known wisdom and practice, grant petitioners and other grantees and proprietors of No. 6, within thereof, a township of the unappropriated lands in the eastward part of the Province, or otherwise relieve your petitioners as your excellency and your honors in your wisdom shall think proper, and your petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

"JOHN GARDNER,
"STEPHEN MAYNARD,
"SILAS RICE.

In answer to this petition was the following:

"Resolved, That in lieu thereof there be granted to the proprietors and legal representatives or assigns of the original grantees, who were sufferers by losing their lands, a township seven miles square in the unappropriated lands belonging to this Province."

This town is now known as Waterford, Me.

The Masonian Grant and Charter.—November 29, 1748, a meeting of the inhabitants of Londonderry was held at the house of Joseph Scobey, to take action relative to a grant of land upon which to settle. At this meeting Captain Todd was chosen moderator, Captain Barr treasurer, and Robert Cochran clerk. Sixty-one persons joined the organization and paid the fee required of them towards defraying the necessary expenses that would be incurred in procuring the grant. Twenty more were admitted as members shortly after. The names of these men were,—

"John McMurphy, Esq., Capt. And. Todd, Capt. Saml. Barr, S. Willson & Son, James Todd, Saml. Todd, Alex. McCollon, Joseph Willson, John Hillsdale, Henry Ewin, Wilham Forest, Robt. Parkison, Saml. Wallace, Senr., Joseph Boyes, James Smith."

At a meeting of these proprietors, held at the house of William Blair, July 13, 1752, Robert Cochran and James Wallace were chosen to go to Portsmouth to "Get a Charter." These men attended to their duty at once, and on July 16th, three days after, the following grant of land was obtained, called No. 6:

PROPRIETORS' GRANT.

The surveyors employed were Matthew Patten, of Bedford, and Daniel Leslie, of Londonderry. Several meetings of the grantees were held before the survey was completed, and on July 11, 1753, the committee drew the lots at Portsmouth. Some changes had been made in the number composing the grantees, but the lots were drawn for substantially those petitioning for the grant. Preparations were at once made for erecting a saw-mill and making settlements in the township; paths were cleared, but the French and Indian War, which involved the colonies in all the calamities of a war with the Indians of Canada and the neighboring tribes, suspended operations for years. Up to 1761 no settlement had been made in the township. A good many of the original proprietors were dead, some had disposed of their rights, while others still took but little interest in the grant. It is a singular fact that but one of the proprietors, James Peters, ever settled in the town. In the spring of 1758 a foundation was laid for the first saw-mill in the township, to use the water from Long Pond. Tradition says that when the mill was near its completion Indians appeared, and the workmen left for their homes in Londonderry, and the project was abandoned.

First Settlers.—In the spring of 1760, Rev. James Scates, having come into possession of some land in the easterly part of the township, built a log cabin under the hill known as Foster Hill. Mr. Scates was a native of Roxford, Mass. He graduated at Harvard in 1733, settled in Rumford in 1737, and was teacher of the first school taught in that town. He was shortly afterwards licensed to preach, and was the first minister at Canterbury. He moved from that town to Hopkinton, and was the first preacher in that town, being ordained as pastor of the church there November 23, 1757. It was while he was residing in Hopkinton that he built his log house in this town. He resided here some six months, then disposed of his claim and resumed his residence in Hopkinton. The hill near his cabin was known for half a century as "Scates' Hill." In the spring of 1761, Mr. James Peters and his family moved into town from Hopkinton, and built a log house near the one occupied by Mr. Scates. There were no neighbors nearer him than on Putney's Hill, Hopkinton, fifteen miles east. To the westward a few families had commenced a settlement in Hillsborough, while to the north it was an unbroken forest for fifty miles.

In this wilderness Mr. Peters made his home. In June, 1763, Eliakim Howe, Amos Gould and Thomas Stone moved into town from Marlborough, Mass. They settled in the southeast part of the township, and were joined, in September of the same year, by Jonas Bowman, of Lexington, Mass., who settled near them. In the same year William Peters, a son of James, the first settler, moved into town from Hopkinton, and settled easterly and near his father. He was killed by a falling tree July 5, 1775. Josiah Ward and his family moved into town from Marlborough, Mass., in September of the same year, 1763. In 1764, Deacon Ebenezer Harthorn came from Marlborough, Mass., and was the thirteenth settler in the township. In 1765, Annas Campbell came from Hawke (now Danville) and became a large landowner. He erected the first two-story frame house in the township, in 1766, Deacon Harthorn erecting the second one in 1768. Eliakim Howe erected the first frame house in the township, one story and a half in height in front, with a long, slanting roof on the back side, reaching near to the ground. In 1765 came Alexander Patterson and his family, including his sons Joseph and Isaac, who settled on what is known as "Goss Hill." Ezra Tucker and family came in this year and settled in the westerly part of the town. Mr. Tucker was from Marlborough, Mass. Cornelius Bean settled near him during the same year.

In 1764, Charles and Jacob Whitecomb moved into town from Stowe, Mass., and Timothy and Jesse Ross, also from Stowe. Francis Withington, also of Stowe, came this same year. In 1766, William Presbury came from Stowe, Mass., and settled in the southwest part of the town, where he resided a few years, and then removed to Bradford and was the first settler there. During this year came the three brothers, Ebenezer, Noah and Joshua Gile, from Marlborough, Mass., and settled in the southeast part of the township. Ezekiel Smith and Solomon Childs came from Grafton, Mass.; Hezekiah Newton came from Marlborough, Mass., and Ephraim Merrill from Stowe. The brothers Adonijah and Jephthah Tyler came from Marlborough in 1767. Thomas Howlett came from Stowe in 1766; also William Powers from the same town, and William Eastman in 1765. David Connor settled in the northeast part of the township in 1766, and Silas Barnes came from Marlborough. Ephraim Goss, in 1767, came from Lancaster, Mass., and Samuel Wadsworth, in 1768, came from Grafton, Mass. Abraham Morrison and Moses Duston came in 1768 from Hopkinton, and Moses Huse in 1766. During the years these settlements were being made the proprietors at Londonderry held several meetings, and took measures, in co-operation with the settlers here, to lay out roads, raise money, etc., and the last meeting of the proprietors was held January 1, 1768, which, without transacting any business, adjourned without date.

In 1768, the township having become settled in various places, a move was made for an act of incorporation of the township, which was secured, under date of November 10, 1768.

PETITION OF THE INHABITANTS TO HAVE THE TOWN INCORPORATED, 1768.

"To His Excellency, John Wentworth, Esq., Captain-General, Governor and Commander-in-Chief in and over His Majesty's Province of New Hampshire, in New England, And to His Majesty's Council in the Province aforesaid—

"The Petition of the Inhabitants of the Place called Number Six of the Line of Towns, or New Marlborough, in the Province aforesaid, humbly sheweth, That whereas your humble Petitioners, whose Names are hereto subscribed, find ourselves under great Inconveniences & Difficulties for want of the Powers and Privileges which incorporate Towns in this Province enjoy; And we, your humble Petitioners, humbly pray your Excellency & your Honours to take our Case into your wise and compassionate consideration, and if you think it proper & necessary, you would incorporate into a Town, included with the Powers & Privileges of other Towns in the Province, that Tract of Land which is the sixth in Number of the Line of Towns which was first laid out by Order of the General Court of the Province of the Massachusetts-Bay, & granted to some of the Inhabitants of Marlborough, in said Province, and was since granted by the Massman Proprietors to some of the Inhabitants of Londonderry, in this Province of New Hampshire, said Tract of Land lies between Hopkinton & Hillsborough. We, your humble Petitioners, humbly pray that your Excellency & your Honours would incorporate the said Tract of Land, with the Inhabitants, present & future, then Poils & Estates, into a Town, included within the same Bounds and Limits wherein it was included when it was first granted by the General Court of the Massachusetts Province, and when it was granted by the Massman Proprietors (not intaking or hurting any private Property), and that your Excellency, and your Honours will be pleased to appoint & empower Mr. Eliakim How, Mr. Ebenezer Harthorn and Mr. Jonas Bowman (now Inhabitants of said Tract of Land) or any others whom your Excellency & your Honours shall think proper, as a Committee to call the first Meeting of the Freeholders & Inhabitants in said town.

"For which Goodness, your humble Petitioners, for your Excellency & your Honours, as in Duty bound, shall ever pray.

COPY OF THE CHARTER OF HENNIKER
PROVINCE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

"George the Third, by the Grace of God of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth, To all to whom these presents shall come Greeting: Whereas our loyal subjects, the Inhabitants of a Tract of Land within our Province of New Hampshire, known by the name of Number Six in the Line of Towns and containing six miles square, and bounded as hereto mentioned, have humbly petitioned & requested us that they may be erected and incorporated into a Township and intrusted with the same Privileges which other Towns within our Province have: A Envy by law; and if appearing unto us to be conducive to the general good of our said province, as well as of the said Inhabitants in particular, by maintaining good order & tranquillity, the culture of the Land, that the same should be done; minister's tax at his own request. To be valid, his dissent must be given at the meeting at which such action was taken and recorded upon the records of the town.

SETTLEMENT OF FIRST MINISTER. At a meeting held November 25, 1768, Mr. Rice's salary was established as follows:

"The conditions of his settlement are, thirty pounds settlement and thirty pounds salary for the first four years, and then thirty five pounds for four years more, and then forty pound a year till there is seventy families in town, and then to be fifty pounds yearly till there is ninety families in town, then to be fifty pounds yearly till there are a hundred and ten families in town, then we will give him sixty six pounds, thirteen shillings and four pence yearly, when six shillings and eight pence per ounce, and to the full of the sum proposed or above as silver what it is at present. Also, that the town allow him two Sabbath's the first year after his ordination to be absent from his town, and the next one Sabbath yearly afterwards to be absent from his people during his ministry. Also, that Mr. Jacob Rice began his year to preach with this town on October 24th, A. D 1768, and what he is absent in the winter season his wages is to cease till he comes again."

The terms were satisfactory, save in matter of the standard of silver, Mr. Rice wishing his salary to rise or fall as silver rose or fell, which was quite an important item in those olden days. The town assented to his request, and at a meeting held December 16, 1768, Silas Barnes, Ebenezer Harthorn and Ebenezer Gile were chosen a committee "to agree and appoint with Mr. Jacob Rice for his Solemn Ordination in this town." June 7, 1769, was the day fixed upon for that purpose, when a council was convened, a church embodied, consisting of nine male members and six female, and Mr. Rice was duly ordained their pastor.

The names of the nine males were Rev. Jacob Rice, Silas Barnes, Ebenezer Harthorn, Thomas Howlett, William Presbury, Timothy Ross, Josiah Ward, Charles Whitecomb and Ezekiel Smith; the names of the females are not known. A church covenant was adopted and signed by all of the members, which continued in use without amendment or alteration until April 1, 1835, a period of sixty-five years. In the spring of 1773, Mr. Rice experienced a severe attack of measles, which impaired his eyesight and otherwise incapacitated him from ministerial labor, and he only occupied the pulpit a portion of the time until his dismissal, February 29, 1782. Different persons were employed to preach for many years, months passing at a time without any meeting until after Mr. Rice's dismissal. Among the clergymen that efforts were made to settle were Rev. Aaron Hutchinson, of Grafton, Mass.; Rev. Ebenezer Allen, of Kingston, this State; Rev. Josiah Carpenter, Rev. Mr. Williams, Rev. Jabez P. Fisher and Rev. Nathaniel Hall. None of these efforts were successful; but at a meeting of the town held August 12, 1801, Rev. Moses Sawyer was invited to become the minister. More than one-third of the voters of the town dissented from this vote, and another meeting was held, December 9, 1801, to reconsider the vote, which was not done, although the majority in favor of the settlement of Mr. Sawyer was small. In consequence of the large number of people opposed to settling Mr. Sawyer, his friends determined to separate church from state, and on this same day formed themselves into a society to be called "The Calvinistic Congregational Society of Henniker." Over this society and church Mr. Sawyer was regularly ordained May 26, 1802. Those dissatisfied with Mr. Sawyer held another town-meeting, and voted unanimously to give the Rev. Pliny Dickerson a call; but he did not see fit to accept it, and that was the last effort made by them to settle any minister.

Mr. Sawyer continued as pastor of the church and society until April 9, 1826, when he preached his farewell discourse, having sustained his relation with the church for nearly twenty-four years.

Rev. Jacob Seales, of Colchester, Ct., was ordained pastor of the church January 17, 1827. Rev. Justin Edwards, of Andover, Mass., preached the sermon, having woolen mittens upon his hands because of the severity of the weather. Mr. Seales was dismissed January 2, 1839, after a pastorate of twelve years, and the pulpit was occupied by different clergymen, none of whom saw fit to accept a call. July 12, 1841, Rev. Eden B. Foster, of Hanover, received a unanimous call to become pastor, which he accepted, and was ordained August 17, 1841. He was dismissed at his own request January 7, 1847, and December 1, 1847, Rev. Richard T. Searle was ordained, and was dismissed February 1, 1850. January 6, 1851, Rev. Joseph M. R. Eaton, of Fitchburg, Mass., received a call, which he accepted, and was installed February 6, 1851, and dismissed May 11, 1868, after a pastorate of over seventeen years. September 1, 1859, Rev. Stephen S. Morrill, of Hillsborough, was installed pastor, and dismissed, at his own request, August 18, 1873. Rev. George H. Moss, of Townsend, Mass., occupied the pulpit from November 21, 1873, to July 30, 1876, but was not settled.

Rev. John H. Hoffman commenced preaching for the church June 19, 1877; ordained August 27th, same year, and installed pastor June 7, 1878, and dismissed October 6, 1881, and Rev. F. L. Allen, of White River Junction, was installed pastor.

During the first one hundred years from the embodiment of this church more than five hundred persons became members of it, and January 1, 1880, the total number then belonging to the church was one hundred and seventy-six.

BAPTIST CHURCH. Shortly after the Revolution a Baptist Church was formed in this town, which was considered as a branch of the church at Sutton. It prospered for a while, but soon became extinct. February 23, 1832, an ecclesiastical council was convened to consider the expediency of forming another Baptist Church in this town, and, after due deliberation ten persons were embodied as a branch of the church of Bradford. In September of 1833 this branch was severed from the church at Bradford, and became known as the Baptist Church of Henniker, and Rev. Enoch T. Winter was duly installed as pastor, which position he held until 1828, and was succeeded by Rev. Jairus E. Strong, who remained one year; and the next settled pastor was Rev. John Peacock, who remained but a short time, and Rev. David G. Mason became the pastor, being ordained May 15, 1845, and was dismissed in 1847, being the last settled minister the church had.

The whole number of communicants of this church during its existence was one hundred.

METHODIST.—During the summer of 1814 the first Methodist meeting was held in this town by Rev. Mr. Bates, the preacher upon the circuit that included Henniker. Meetings were occasionally held at private houses and at school-houses until 1832, when the first church was formed, consisting of ten members,—six males and four females. Rev. George Pickering was the second preacher, followed until the present time by Caleb Dunton, Michael Quimby, Moses Chase, William T. Cass, Abram Folsom, John C. Haseltine, Samuel Prescott, Joseph Palmer, Abram M. Osgood, John Gould, Elijah R. Wilkins, William Iscariot, G. W. S. Rogers, L. H. Gordon, G. W. Norris, Josiah Hooper, N. M. Bailey, Otis Cole, H. S. Maud, William H. Jones, Watson W. Smith, George C. Powell, George H. Hardy, John H. Steele, W. W. Le Scur and E. L. House.

The whole number admitted to communion in this church has been about three hundred and seventy-five, with a present membership of nearly one hundred.

QUAKERS.—A Friends' Meeting was established in this town, as a branch of the Weare Meeting, in 1799, Timothy Peasley, Pelatiah Penington, Nathaniel Chase, Aaron Foster, Daniel B. Alley, Joseph Huzzey and Samuel Morrison were the founders. The meeting flourished for more than half a century; but the older members died, many of the younger ones moved from the town, and others still partook of the ways of those outside of the sect. Meetings are still regularly held, though the numbers are few. The whole number of members of the meeting has been about three hundred and forty, with a present membership of about twenty.

UNIVERSALISTS.—Meetings connected with this sect began to be held here as early as the commencement of the present century by Revs. Mr. Murray, Sebastian Streeter and Edward Evans; still later by Revs. Adam Ballou and Alonzo A. Miner. In 1876 and 1877 meetings began to be held at intervals until 1880, when regular preaching was had, and in 1881, Rev. W. H. Fiske became pastor of a society then formed, which is still in a flourishing condition.

MEEING-HOUSES.—Before the incorporation of the town, steps were taken to erect a house of worship, and in the proprietors' records we find this,—

"PROVINCE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

"Number Six, October 22, 1769.

We, the under Subscribers, being appointed a Committee by the Proprietors of said Number Six to fix some Convenient Place on the Senter Lot in said Town to Build a Meeting-House on, and for a burying Place and Church for a Training to B. E. &c. And the Place We have agreed upon is at a homelock tree, Marked, Where the Land out Highway Comes into said Lot, thence Running North twenty four Rhods to a Stake marked, thence West twenty Rhods to a Stake, thence South twenty four Rhods to a Stake, thence East twenty Rhods to the Bounds first mentioned.

"Ezekiah How, Josiah Ward, James Wallace, Thomas Wallace, Proprietors 1769. 10."

At a meeting of the people of the town, held March 26, 1770, it was

"Resolved, to build a meeting-house

"Resolved, to build the said house on the Cusy lot, so called, on the north side of the highway, on the east side of the lot, near the pot ash.

"Resolved, that said house shall be thirty feet long and twenty feet wide.

"Resolved, twenty dollars to build said house.

"Resolved, Ebenezer gile, thomas stone and William presbury is a Committee to see the work done on said house.

"Resolved that the men shall have two shillings and six pence per day and find themselves, lawful money, that work on said house."

The house was built the same season, of logs, and it was used for public worship some weeks before it was covered with a roof. All the religious meetings, as well as meetings of the town, were held in this humble log house for ten years, when, on or about the 19th of May, 1780, the evening of the "dark day," it was burned to the ground, having been fired, as is supposed, by an incendiary, as no fire had ever been in the little house, save what was carried in in little foot-stoves upon the Sabbath, which were then in use by those who could afford them.

Several efforts were made to erect another meeting-house, which proved of no avail; but at a meeting of the town, held January 9, 1786, it was "Resolved to Build a Meeting-House." Committees were chosen for the purpose; but the same difficulty arose that had so long hindered a house being erected, and that was the proper selection of a spot upon which to erect it which would best accommodate the people of the town. As early as 1783 efforts were made to select a place,—by far the larger part desiring to have it built upon the centre lot,—and it was finally agreed that a committee of three disinterested persons outside of the town should determine the place, and they made the following report at a meeting of the town, held October 27, 1783:

"HENNIKER, 9 October 27th, 1783.

"We, the Subscribers being Chosen By The Town of Henniker A County to Examine and agree Where a Meeting-house Should Be Set to Commence the 3^d Town of Henniker, we have this Day accordingly Met and Examined all circumstances which was in our power, and Beg leave to report that it is our opinion that it is the Best Place to set said Meeting-House To Commence said Town, is Neare the North end of said Senter Lot on the Plane, where it was told us they held their last Town-meeting By Adjournment, which is our solemn opinion.

"Stevens Banniman, Francis Davis, Samuel Philbrick, Comitty."

These three men were residents of Warner. But a portion of the people were not satisfied with this report, and, as a last resort, the following petition was sent to the General Assembly of the State, then in session at Exeter:

"[1786.] Petition for the Appointment of a Committee to locate a Meeting-House, 1786.]

"To the Honourable Senate and House of Representatives of the State of New Hampshire, now sitting at Exeter, in Said State.

"We, the Subscribers, Inhabitants of the Town of Henniker, Humbly Sheweth, whereas, we are about Building a Meeting-house in Said Town, and are So unhappy as not to agree upon the Spot where to Set said house, although we have had Two Committees to Peruse the Place for Said house, and they reported Two Different Places, and the Distance Between the Two Spots is about one hundred and forty rods; where fore we Pray your honours to appoint a Disinterested Committee from the Neighbouring Towns, Consisting of three men, to View the Situation of the Place, and hear the Pleas and determine the Spot where Said house Shall Be Set, and we, your Petitioners, as in Duty Bound.

"Henniker, September ye 11th, 1786.

"Jonas Bowman, James Wallace, Joshua Heath, Nathan Putney, Michael Archer, Thomas Peop, David McKillip, William Sargent, Francis Withington, Joshua Wright, John Campbell, Jesse Campbell, Thomas Willson, Johnthung Connor, David Peop, Isaac Putney, Stephen Spelton, Samuel Eastman, Oliver Noyes, David Clough, John Chadwick, Elias Withington, Samuel Morrison, David Bennett, Benjamin Currier, William Wallace, Abathar Bowman, John Smith, John Putney, Benjamin Clough, Joseph Lewis, John Withington, Samuel Barr, Barnab hadwick, Thomas Stuart, Thomas Townsend, Joseph Ward, William Patrick, John Smith, Jr., Alexander Parker, James Marsh, Jesse Ward, Simon Roe, Benjamin Hoyt, George Hoyt, Moses Hoyt, Simon Simonds, Phineas Ward, Nahum Nuten, Oliver Clough, Mather Withington, William Morrison, John Campbell, Jr., Thomas Howlett, Samuel Durealls, Josiah Ward, Timothy Ross, Benjamin Clark, Jonathan Ross, Joseph Chadwick.

"In H. of Rep., September 13, 1786, a committee was appointed, consisting of the following men: Major Isaac Chandler, of Hopkinton; Nathan Aiken, Esq., of Doering; and Samuel Caldwell, of Maine."

No report of the action of this committee, if any was ever taken, has been found.

Whilst the dispute as to location was in progress, preparations for the erection of a meeting-house were being pushed actively forward, and at the time of this action by the General Assembly the frame of the building was nearly ready for raising. At a meeting of the town, held August 30, 1786 it was "Voted, to Provide three Barrels of Rum to Raise the Meeting-house with," and with this and the aid of the strong arms of the men of this and neighboring towns the frame was raised early in the month of October of this year, 1786, upon the spot that had been originally selected. The other place selected was nearer the centre of the township, but not as good a location for building. Nothing more was done to the frame until the next season. At the annual meeting, held March 5, 1787, it was voted to pay the men who assisted in the two days' work of raising the meeting-house, and amongst other items the town voted to pay were the following:

"Voted Gideon Adams £1 4s. for Sugar.

"Voted Sam. Kimball £5 15s. for Beef

"Voted Dr. Hunter £12 5s. 1 2-4 P. 60 ninety three gallons and a quarter of Rum and three empty Barrels."

The work upon the building progressed rapidly, and the first meeting held in it was on November 14, 1787, for the purpose of choosing a grand and petit juryman. The ground floor was marked off and sold, each purchaser to build his own pew; but this was reconsidered, and a committee chosen to build the pews and sell them. The inside was finished in accordance with the style then prevalent, and when completed was a noble structure, and has withstood the storms and blasts of nearly a century, with its timbers as perfect as the day they were raised.

It was used for religious meetings by the town until the separation that took place in 1801 and more or less for that purpose by different denominations for half a century afterwards, and has always been used by the town in which to hold its meetings since 1787.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.—In 1803 the Congregational Church and Society, finding themselves without a regular place in which to hold their meetings, resolved to erect another meeting-house. A committee was chosen to take the matter into consideration and decide upon what should be done. A spot was selected, and in 1804 a meeting-house was erected, and dedicated in 1805. This house was about the length of the town's meeting-house, without the porches, and about its width, sixty-five by forty-five feet.

There was a porch at the south end, surmounted with a low belfry, the first one seen in the town. In this house the meetings of the church were held until its destruction by fire, August 23, 1833, when the church and society found itself again without a church-home. In 1834 the present structure was erected, and dedicated August 27, 1834. This house was furnished with a bell, the first one in the town, a clock and an organ, and with a new communion service in place of the one destroyed by fire when the church was burned. This building has been kept in excellent repair, and in 1882 was thoroughly modernized, and is at present one of the most complete and commodious churches to be found in any rural district.

BAPTIST CHURCH MEETING-HOUSE.—The Baptist Church held their meetings in private houses and in school-houses until 1834, when they erected a very neat and commodious building of brick. This house was finished very comfortably, and was used as a house of worship as long as the church existed. In 1856 it was purchased by the Methodist Church, who still occupy it.

METHODIST MEETING-HOUSES.—Like their brethren of the Baptist Church, the members of the Methodist Church were without a church-home until 1834, when they, too, erected a meeting-house. This house was very plain in its architecture, without any belfry or ornamentation whatever, but very substantial. The pews were straight slips without doors; there was a very small pulpit at one end, and equally small seats for the choir at the other. Meetings were held in this building until 1856, when it was sold and converted into a large and commodious barn, and the society purchased the brick church, which has been their home since. In 1882 the building was modernized in its interior, and provided with an organ and very heavy and elegant memorial windows.

UNIVERSALIST MEETING-HOUSE.—This society held its meetings in the town-house, in Academy

Hall and other halls until 1883, when it erected a very neat and substantial building for its home. This building is of the Gothic style, with a seating capacity of upwards of one hundred and fifty. It is supplied with an organ and heated with a furnace.

FRIENDS' MEETING-HOUSE.—For three-fourths of a century the Friends have had a meeting-house. These people always having lived in the south part of the town by themselves largely, have always had their meeting-house in their neighborhood. It is a plain structure, partaking severely of the simplicity of the sect who have ever been some of the best farmers and most worthy citizens of Henniker.

Military History.—The settlers of Henniker were in strong sympathy with the efforts made by the colonies to throw off the tyranny of the home government, that was continually seeking new means to oppress them. When the fight at Lexington took place, April 19, 1775, and help was called for, several of the sturdy settlers of this town responded by hastening to the scene of action, leaving their plows in the furrow and their oxen invoked; one man who was mending fence, laying down his axe, and seizing his gun left his home never to return, having been killed at Bunker Hill shortly afterwards.

Joseph Kimball, Esq., one of the prominent citizens of the town and one of the selectmen of the town at the time, was suspected of disloyalty and charges were preferred against him. His case was referred to the Committee of Safety, who ordered him to appear before them and make answer to these charges. The meeting was held in the log meeting-house, where a hearing was had, and this was their report,—

"HENNIKER, June 30, 1775.

"The Resolves of the Committee met to discuss Joseph Kimball, Esquire, concerning his political principles in the dispute between Britain and this North America. Accusations as follows, viz. The s^t Kimball did say that he did not blame General Gage for coming to this North America, but did not justify or approve his evil conduct since he has been in y^e Country. Further, the s^t Kimball is for keeping up civil authority. Further, the s^t Kimball being accused of speaking taxably of Gov. Wentworth, but dissembling the Committee before the body of the people, and making the people disaffected, the s^t Kimball both he is sorry that the people are angry with him, and that he is sorry if he hath given any provocation of offense, but means to do all as far as he is in his power, to propagate y^e Liberty cause, and we, the s^t Committee of Safety, do receive y^e said Kimball as a friend to the common Cause.

The following-named men were at the battle of Bunker Hill, June 17, 1775:

Alexander Patterson, James Deakap, John Gordon, John Stone, Samuel Eastman, Obadiah Bean, Joseph Marsh, Charles Whiteside, Elisha Rice, George Bennett, Samuel Wadsworth, Amos Gould, Isaac Patterson, James Carr, James Palmer, John Barnes, James Stone, Joseph Gough, Abraham Kimball, Lieutenant Gess and James Reed.

These men, twenty-one in number, were in Captain Hutelins' company and General Stark's brigade. Alexander Patterson and Abraham Kimball were wounded. Pursuant to an order issued by the Continental Congress, a census was taken, with this result,—

"Males under 16 years of age	117
"Do from 16 years of age to 50 not in the army	47
All males above 50 years of age	45
Persons gone in the army	9
All Females	158
Negroes and Slaves for life	1
Total	387

By order of the Continental Congress, an enumeration of the inhabitants liable for military duty was ordered. By the law of New Hampshire, two classes of soldiers were provided for,—“a training-band and an alarm-list.” The former included all able-bodied male persons between the ages of sixteen and fifty, except persons in office, negroes, Indians and mulattoes. The latter included all males between the ages of sixteen and sixty-five, not included in the training-band and not exempted by law. Under this order an enumeration was made in the town, with this result,—

Those Persons Refuse to sign the within Declaration are underwritten: Joseph Kimball, Joshua Kimball, William Kimball, Corporal Samuel Kimball, William Chambers, Samuel Morrison, Ezra Tucker, present lieutenant, Moses Howe, Captain James Dustin, Samuel Easton, Thomas Stone, Jr., Ebenezer Bowman, Josiah Ward, Sergeant Heath, Euseb Benjamin Carrier, Nathaniel Merrick, Amos Eastman, Noah Gile, Robert Campbell, Aaron Adams, Captain James Stone,—twenty-one names.

"JONAS BOWMAN, Selection."

"SAMUEL WADSWORTH, of Henniker."

Of the twenty-one who refused to sign, over two-thirds of them were afterwards in the American service, and did their duty faithfully, and to the honor of the town it can be said that although upon a question of expediency there were various and conflicting opinions, yet upon the main question of defending their homes and supporting the cause of liberty against any and all foes the people of this town were a unit, and obtained for themselves the reputation of being amongst the most patriotic in the State.

The following-named men were in the battle of Bennington, August 16, 1777:

Capt. Jonas Bowman, Sergt. Peter How, Sergt. Joshua Gile, Thomas Pope, Jonathan Eastman, Corporal Moses Smith, Sergeant Heath, William Heath, Zachariah Bowler, Ezekiel Stone, David Colby, Zedek Bowman, Jabez Alexander, Samuel Eastman, Abraham Kimball, Levi Colby, Lemuel Ross, Isaac Patterson, Moses Powell, James Dustin, Levi Hartman, John Putney, Joshua Whitney.

Four men from this town participated in the battle of Monmouth, N. J., on Sunday, June 28, 1778.—Jesse Campbell, Joseph Marsh, James Peters, Jr., and Daniel Squire.

In all the important conflicts of the Revolutionary War Henniker was well represented, and before the war had ended, as near as can be ascertained, the whole number of enlistments for the town were one hundred and thirty-two. So frequent were the calls for men that at one time there was hardly an able-bodied man left in the town, save Rev. Jacob Rice. Even the boys over sixteen years of age were called upon not only to perform military duty, but also to pay taxes. All through the seven long years of the war almost continual calls were made upon the town for men and for rations. The little bands of patriots who were thus hastily collected together usually assembled in the log meeting-house (until it was burned), and listened to an appropriate address or prayer, as the time admitted, by Rev. Mr. Rice, who was one of the foremost citizens of the town in helping on the cause of liberty. Few, if any, towns can show a better record, in proportion to their population, than can Henniker.

WAR OF 1812.—In the War of 1812 fully one hundred men bore an honorable part. Large numbers enlisted together and served under various commanders, and were at various points where their services were most needed. Two of the men of the town were in the regular army when the war broke out, and were in the battle of Tippecanoe, November 7, 1811. Not only those liable for military duty were ready for enlistment, but those exempt from such duty formed themselves into a company and volunteered their services, if needed.

MEXICAN WAR.—One man from this town was a grenadier in Captain Charles N. Bodfish's company, which was composed of the men of the greatest height, selected from the Ninth Regiment United States Infantry, which was recruited in New England and commanded by Colonel Truman B. Ransom, of Vermont. Two men also enlisted in Captain Daniel Batchelder's company, belonging to the same regiment, one of whom was killed at the storming of Chapultepec.

THE WAR OF THE REBELLION.—The commencement of the Rebellion found the people of Henniker still patriotic. One of the first men to enlist when the call was made for volunteers to fill up the First Regiment was Enoch W. Goss, who was at the time quietly pursuing the avocation of a machinist at Concord. He was commissioned second lieutenant in Company I, First Regiment, New Hampshire Volunteers, and upon the formation of the Thirteenth Regiment, he was commissioned first lieutenant of Company K, in that regiment, and was shortly afterwards promoted to be captain of Company L. He was killed October 27, 1864, in Virginia, whilst in command of a battalion of sharpshooters attached to the First Division of the Eighteenth Army Corps. The following roll contains the names of men who enlisted from Henniker, in the several regiments of this State and of other States:

Number enlisted for the town	92
Number enlisted in the navy	2
Number re-enlisted	7
Number enlisted in other States	41
Number of substitutes	51
Whole number furnished by the town	163

Under a vote of the town:

15 men were paid $150 each	$2,250
14 men were paid $200 each	2,800
15 men were paid $175 each	2,625
8 men were paid $1,000 each	8,000
2 men were paid $200 each	400
Total amount paid	$83,675

Of the number of men who enlisted for the town, thirty were killed in action or died in the service. Of the thirty-one original men from Henniker in the Eleventh Regiment when it left the State, only nine were present when it was mustered out.

Educational.—The first money raised by the town after its incorporation was at the annual meeting held March 1, 1773, when the town "Voted Nine Pounds Raised to support a Schule." "Voted to have a Schule this year."

For the first eighteen years after the incorporation of the town only two hundred and thirty dollars was raised by the town for schooling. During this time, however, many private schools were taught. The first school-houses were built of logs. The town was districted first in 1788, and in 1800 again districted, substantially as they have remained since. In 1808 the first female teacher was employed. Liberal sums have, from time to time, been appropriated by the town in addition to the amount required by law, and much interest has been manifested in providing suitable school buildings, and at this time every district in the town, save one, has an excellent school-house—most of them being new—and the valuation of the school property of the town is exceeded by only two towns in Merrimack County.

HENNIKER ACADEMY.—Henniker Academy was erected in 1836. The matter of having such an institution in the town had been under discussion for some years, to a certain extent, but not until this year did it culminate. The building was erected by voluntary subscription, the people contributing very liberally towards it. A committee was chosen early in this year to procure a plan and contract for its erection. Horace Childs was its builder, and an act of incorporation was obtained from the Legislature, and the following-named gentlemen were chosen the first board of trustees: Rev. Jacob Seales, Dr. Natham Sanborn, Hon. Joshua Darling, Samuel Smith, Esq., Page Eaton, Abel Connor and Horace Childs, of Henniker; Col. Stephen H. Long, of Hopkinton; Rev. Jubilee Wellman, of Warner; John Grimes, Esq., of Deering; Rev. Orlando G. Thatcher, of Bradford; and Gen. Anthony Colby, of New London. The first term was taught in the spring of 1837, Breed Batchelder, teacher.

one to three terms being taught yearly. From 1867 until 1884 several terms were taught by different teachers, but not continuously. In 1881 an arrangement was made with the trustees whereby the town obligated itself to appropriate a fixed sum for the purpose of modernizing the upper school-rooms in the building, and appropriate five hundred dollars yearly, for five years, towards paying the salaries of competent teachers, and an excellent school is again in progress. Notwithstanding all the hindrances, a large number of students have pursued their studies in this institution and become graduates of some college. Amongst the more prominently known graduates of this institution are Hon. James W. Patterson, ex-Senator in United States Senate; Hon. James W. Childs, State Senator of Michigan; Rev. Addison Childs; Rev. Augustus Berry, five years principal of the institution; Rev. Nathan F. Carter, Rev. Henry E. Sawyer, Rev. Addison P. Foster and Edna Dean Proctor.

The towns of Henniker, Hillsborough, Deering and Society Land (now Bennington) were classed for the purpose of choosing a representative, and November 14, 1774, Captain Joseph Simonds, of Hillsborough, was chosen for one year, and Captain Timothy Gibson, of Henniker, was then chosen; then Captain Simonds, who was succeeded by Isaac Andrews and James McCauley, respectively, of Hillsborough, by Robert Alcock, of Deering; then Captain Simonds was again chosen. Hon. Robert Wallace was then chosen for the next four years; then Gen. Benjamin Pierce, of Hillsborough, for two years; then William Wallace, Esq., of Henniker, for the ensuing two years, since which time the town has had one or more representatives yearly, as follows:

William Wallace, Francis Bowman, Aaron Adams, James Bowman, Timothy Gibson, Joshua Darling, John Smith, John Sawyer, Oliver Noyes, Moses Brown, Robert M. Wallace, Artemus Rogers, Elisha Darling, Jacob Rice, William L. Woods, Lewis Smith, James Straw, Oliver Pillsbury, Harris Campbell, Carleton S. Dodge, Israel P. Chase, Asaander W. Cogswell, William E. Cogswell, Henry A. Emerson, John H. Allen, George W. S. Dow, Col. Iuri Woods, Jacob Straw, Daniel C. Gould, Parrott Marsh, Moadt Howe, Zebulon Foster, Jr., John S. Craig, Nathan Sawyer, Titus Wadsworth, Oliver C. Fisher, Alfred Wanship, Jeremiah Foster, Jonas Wallace, Cyrus Goss, Zedek Dunton, George W. Rice, Oliver H. Noyes, Walter B. Barnes, Harrison Merrill, Francis Hills, Daniel F. Wyman, Leonard M. Peabody.

TOWN CLERKS FROM 1768 TO 1885.

Shas Barnes, Amos Gould, William Prosbury, Aaron Adams, Timothy Gibson, David Clough (nineteen years), William Wallace, Joshua Darling, John C. Proctor, Isaac Rice, Josiah Morse, Iuri Woods (sixteen years), Daniel C. Gould, James Caldwell (sixteen years), Horace Gibson, Hiram Marsh, William E. Cogswell (twelve years), David S. Carr, George C. Preston, Walter T. Sargent.

Timothy Darling, William Wood, Seocrates Smith, Elizabeth Darling, Cassandra Sawyer, Mary E. Wadsworth, M. D., Emma Sandborn, Margal Hill.

TEACHERS OF MUSIC.

Samuel Mansfield, John Conner, Iuri Woods, Daniel C. Gould, Frederick Whitney, Iuri S. Whitney, Harris W. Campbell, John Jackson, Enoch E. C. Colby, Oliver Pillsbury.

LAWYERS.

John Kelley, Artemus Rogers, Samuel Smith, Lewis Smith, John H. Allen, John J. Frostist, Timothy Darling, E. B. S. Sandborn, Warren Clark, Robert M. Wallace.

JUDGES.

Robert Wallace, Luther J. Howe, William Conner, Joshua Darling.

TRIAL JUSTICES.

Jonathan Sawyer, William Wallace, Iuri Woods, David Clough, Jacob Straw, Oliver C. Trasher and William O. Folsom, who was also the very efficient register of deeds for Merrimack County from April, 1867, to April, 1869, and High Priest of Woods Chapter, No. 11, R. A. Masons.

Social Organizations.—Aurora Lodge, No. 43, A. F. and A. Masons, was instituted June 24, 1825, and has been in continuous existence since. Enoch Darling, first W. M.

Woods Royal Arch Chapter was instituted June 7, 1867. Judge Horace Chase, First High Priest.

Bear Hill Grange, No. 39, was instituted December 4, 1874, and is a prosperous organization.

Crescent Lodge, I. O. O. F., No. 60, was instituted July 28, 1876, and an encampment was instituted in 1879, both of which are prosperous organizations.

Henniker Division, Sons of Temperance, is a flourishing organization.

Business Industries.—OXFORD VALLEY PAPER COMPANY.—This company purchased the water-power at West Henniker in 1871. Extensive improvements were made, including a large new dam and an entire new mill, at an outlay of fifty thousand dollars, and the company was incorporated June, 1872. Large additions have been made to the property since and although some changes have been made in the members of incorporation, it has, with the exception of a few months, been substantially under the management of Henry A. Emerson, one of the three original owners of the property, assisted, since 1881, by William N. Johnson, a member of the company.

The goods manufactured at this mill have taken a high rank in the markets of New England and the Middle States, their book-paper being pronounced by experienced and competent judges to be of the very first class. The value of the goods manufactured yearly is fully one hundred thousand dollars.

This company now own the entire water-power at West Henniker, which is one of the most valuable on the Contoocook River.

FLOURING-MILLS.—John Gatterson purchased the lower mill property in 1862, and erected thereon a first-class grist and flouring-mill. In November of 1864, Mr. Gatterson purchased and brought to town a car-load of corn, containing four hundred and sixteen bushels, the first car-load of corn ever brought into the town. He now averages sales of corn of seven thousand to ten thousand bushels, and fifty tons of shorts. Connected with his mill is a saw-mill, where half a million feet of lumber are manufactured yearly.

COTUSER & SON are owners of a first-class mill on the upper mill Pond, disposing of large amounts of grain and shorts yearly. Connected with their mill is a thrasher, with which they thresh several thousand bushels of grain yearly; and also they make cider, and saw shingles and clapboards. They are also owners of the water-power on the opposite side of the river from them, upon which they have erected a building used as a saw-mill. The largest part of the wheat raised within a radius of fifteen miles is manufactured into flour at these two flouring-mills.

DRY MEASURES.—Gage & Co. have a large mill near Long Pond, at which a very large amount of dry measures, nest boxes, piggins, covers, etc., are manufactured yearly, which find their way into the far West and South, as well as to the nearer home markets. The saw-mill attached to their mill manufactures half a million feet of lumber annually.

KIT MANUFACTORY.—George W. S. Dow has a large, first-class mill and machinery, in which seventy-five thousand kits are made yearly; he also has machinery for dressing lumber and for sawing shingles.

GEORGE E. BARNES has a shingle, clapboard and cider-mill, near Long Pond, at which two hundred thousand shingles and a large amount of clapboards are sawed yearly, and hundreds of barrels of cider made.

JAMES WILKINS & DANIEL E. PUTNEY have carriage-shops, manufacturing and repairing carriages and sleighs.

C. C. RICHARDS has an extensive tin, iron and copper establishment.

Traders.—William O. Folsom, G. C. & A. G. Preston, Oliver H. Noyes and Samuel M. Currier, as traders, dispose of goods to the amount of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars yearly.

The several industries of the town furnish employment for a large number of hands, and manufacture and dispose of goods yearly to the amount of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The productions of the soil amount annually to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The inhabitants of the town have on deposit in the different saving-banks of the State two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, are the owners of railroad bonds and stocks of the value of thirty thousand dollars, and have invested in government and State bonds and other securities not mentioned above fully one hundred thousand dollars, and the people receive yearly from summer tourists several thousand dollars.

Any improvements of the water-power or any enterprise bringing capital and business into the town is exempted from taxation for ten years.

Early Families.—In addition to the early families already mentioned, are the following:

Alamy, Alley, Bowman, Bred, Brown, Chase, Connor, Cogswell, Colby, Clough, Dodge, Darling, Foster, Trichom, Gove, Gould, Gibson, Goodnow, Gordon, Harriman, Howe, Huntington, Kinsall, Livingston, Merrill, Marsh, Morse, Morrison, Newton, Noyes, Page, Patton, Peabody, Pillsbury, Proton, Plummer, Ray, Rogers, Rice, Sawyer, Simmons, Temple, Tucker, Wallace, Whitney, Wilson, Whitman, Wood, Woods.

Cemeteries.—At a meeting of the inhabitants of the town held March 26, 1770, it was "Voted that the burying-place shall be upon the Senter lot." "Voted that Josiah Ward, Ezra Tucker, Silas Barnes is a Committee to look out the spot of ground to bury the Dead in." "Voted that Josiah Ward should Dig the graves this year." The lot selected was the only burial-place for many years, and in it lies a large number of the early settlers, very many of them having no tablets to mark the spot where they are buried. Burial-yards in the southeast, southwest and northeast parts of the town were established; but the old cemetery, near the old meeting-house, which was laid out in 1810, was the chief place of burial until the new cemetery was laid out. In this old yard lie the remains of a larger number than the entire population of the town at this date. The Friends have a burial-place near their meeting-house, in the south part of the town.

NEW CEMETERY.—An effort was made, in 1862, to enlarge the old burial-yard by adding to it a portion of the common adjoining it; but no favorable action was taken, and a number of individuals incorporated themselves into an organization known as the Henniker Cemetery Association, and purchased several acres of land east of the main village, of which association Jeremiah Foster was president, George W. Rice vice-president, William O. Folsom clerk, James Straw treasurer. The lot was laid out into avenues and burial-lots, a large proportion of which have been sold. A large receiving vault was erected, and the association voted that it should be forever under the control of its members. The members of the association are never to exceed thirty. A large sum of money has been expended in monuments and improvements, and it is indeed a place "beautiful for situation."

Census.—The first census of the town was taken in 1775, and the population was three hundred and sixty-seven. In 1783 another census was taken, and there were found to be 749; in 1790, 1127; in 1800, 1476; in 1810, 1608; in 1820, 1900; in 1830, 1725; in 1835, 1709; in 1840, 1715; in 1850, 1690; in 1860, 1500; in 1870, 1288; in 1880, 1326.

The mortuary records of the town show the average of deaths, yearly, since 1775, to be twenty-five; that one-third of the deaths have been children under ten years of age, and more than one-half under thirty years of age. Hannah Hardy died at the age of one hundred and three years; Mrs. Ruth Hemphill, one hundred years and three months; Jeremiah Crocker (colored), one hundred years. Nearly or quite fifty persons have died in the town aged over ninety years, and nearly two hundred persons have reached the age of eighty years and upwards.

Musicians.—Christopher C. Gibson, the eminent violinist, was a native of this town. He gave concerts in his best days in many large cities of this country, and at the Peace Jubilee held in Boston, in 1872. Mr. Gibson was the only American first violinist retained through its entire session, receiving many encomiums for his wonderful melody, which fully earned for him the title given him,—the "Ole Bull of America."

EMMA ABBOTT.—Seth Abbott, the father of Emma Abbott, the celebrated prima donna, was born in Henniker, resided there many years, and then settled in Illinois. Her grandfather, Dyer Abbott, was a celebrated singer and teacher of music and chorister in Concord and Henniker very many years.

Henniker has furnished one Governor of this State—Hon. Nathaniel B. Baker; one United States Senator—Hon. James W. Patterson; two Representatives in Congress for the State of Maine—Hons. Rufus King Goodenow, in the Thirty-first Congress in 1849, and Robert G. Goodenow, in the Thirty-second Congress in 1851. Another brother, Hon. Daniel Goodenow, was Speaker of the House of Representatives in Maine in 1830, was Attorney-General of the State in 1838, and a justice of the Supreme Court of the State from 1855 to 1862. Two other brothers, John B. and William G., were eminent lawyers in Maine. Henniker has furnished several State Senators for other States; one judge for Michigan, and one for New York—the former, Hon. William Conner, and the latter, Hon. Luther J. Howe. Hon. Robert Wallace was a judge in this State from 1803 to 1815, and Hon. Joshua Darling was a judge for many years, from 1816. Hon. Timothy Gibson, Hon. Robert Wallace and Captain Jonas Bowman were prominent men in the councils of the town and the State during the Revolutionary war. Hon. Samuel Tyler, a son of Henniker, made his home in the Argentine Republic, in South America, and was the pioneer of the South American trade, and shipped the first cargo of wool brought from Buenos Ayres to an American port, amassing a large fortune in the trade, and settled in Portland, Me., where he died in 1879.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

ABEL CONNOR.

William (1), the original ancestor of the Connor family, came from England in the ship "Fortune" in 1621. The Plymouth records mention his division of land in 1623. The name was then spelled Coner. Cornelius (2), his son, was in Exeter in 1637. Thence removed to Salisbury, Mass., and married Sarah —, by whom he had Sarah, born August 23, 1656; John, born December 8, 1660; Samuel, born February 12, 1662; Mary, born December 27, 1663; Elizabeth, born February 27, 1665; Rebecca, born April 10, 1668; Ruth, born May 16, 1669; Jeremiah (3), born November 6, 1672; and a daughter, probably Ursula. Jeremiah (3), one of the proprietors of Exeter, married, July 3, 1696, Ann Gove, daughter of Edmund Gove, and their children were Jeremiah, Jonathan (4), Philip, Samuel, Benjamin, Hannah and Ann.

Jonathan (4) married Mehitable Thing, born July 19, 1706, daughter of John and Mehitable Thing. Their children were Anne, born September 15, 1724; Mehitable, born December 5, 1726, died August 30, 1736; Jeremiah, born February 8, 1730-31; Jonathan, born October 14, 1737; Anne, born December 10, 1739; Mehitable, born July 27, 1742; John Thing, born July 18, 1745. These two daughters became Mehitable Thing and Anne Giddings.

Jeremiah, son of Jeremiah the proprietor, settled with his family in Gilmanton, January 19, 1763, and was the eleventh family in that township. Jonathan (4), his brother, was a practical surveyor of lands, and gave much assistance in surveying the lots in Gilmanton. Jonathan (4) was born in Exeter December 5, 1699. He was commander of a scouting company during the French and Indian Wars, Thursday, December 4, 1746, the House of Representatives, then in session at Portsmouth, passed the following vote:

"Resolved that there be allowed eight pounds, eleven shillings & three pence in full, to Capt. Jonathan Connor & fourteen others under his command, scouting at Nottingham ten days from ye 7th Aug. last, to be paid out of ye money in ye Treasury for ye Defense of ye Government."

John (5) Thing Connor, son of Captain Jonathan (4), born in Exeter July 18, 1745, married Susanna Kimball, of Exeter, and removed to Hopkinton, where his children were born, and where he resided until near the close of the Revolution, when he came to Henniker and settled upon the farm where his grandson, A. D. L. F. Connor, now resides. He was a soldier in the Revolutionary War, and the powder-horn carried by him is in the possession of his grandson, John K. Connor. We copy his discharge from the service,—

"Copy. Jonathan Connor, a soldier of the first N. Hampshire Regt., formerly an Inhabitant of Hopkinton, County of Hillsboro, and State of N. Hampshire, having honorably and faithfully served Three years in the service of the United States, being the term of his enlistment, is hereby discharged from the Army and is permitted to return to the State of N. Hampshire.

"J. S. CHURCH, Ct

"Camp Danbury, April 5, 1780. To whom it may concern."

The children of John Thing and Susanna, born in Hopkinton, were Melitabde, born April 13, 1770; George, born August 9, 1773; Anna, born July 9, 1775; John, born September 28, 1779; Abel (6), born November 23, 1782; Susan C., born March 8, 1789, in Henniker.

Abel Connor married, April 26, 1805, Hannah, daughter of Alexander and Lois Whitney, of Henniker, who died November 23, 1828, and he married, September 27, 1830, Martha Greeley, of Hopkinton, who died November 13, 1831, and he married, May 3, 1833, Mary L. Nichols, also of Hopkinton, who died July 11, 1881. His children were by his first wife, and were Hannah, born January 18, 1809, died February 9, 1809; John Thing, born December 9, 1809, died June 20, 1816; Liza, born June 26, 1811, married Solomon Heath, of Bow; Liza, born April 25, 1813, died September 18, 1838; Alexander W., born February 6, 1815, married Harriet Spofford, of Barre, Vt., died December 11, 1880; Alvira, born January 8, 1817, married J. G. M. Foss, of Hopkinton, died August 9, 1882; Eunice C., born November 25, 1818, married E. P. Leach, of Dunbarton; John K., born June 6, 1820, married Mary J. Darling, of Henniker; Hannah C., born March 11, 1822, married P. M. Flanders, of Hopkinton; and Abel De La Fayette, born April 16, 1824, married, first, Louisa Bacon, of Henniker, who died June 27, 1839, and, second, Lucy S. Goodell, of Hillsborough. Daniel Connor, of Exeter, once warden of New Hampshire State Prison, was a cousin of Abel Connor.

Abel Connor was no ordinary man. Future generations have a right to know what manner of men preceded them, who, by their genius, thrift, energy and enterprise, gave form and stability to the town in which they lived. Henniker has had many of these men, but, perhaps, among them all, no name is more closely identified with the prosperity of the town than that of Abel Connor, who, by his honesty, energy and upright Christian character has left a history which will continue far into the future. When all who knew him personally shall have passed to the other shore, his name will be fresh in the minds of the generations left, for his life stamped its impress on the town itself.

The youngest son of the family, he remained with his father upon the homestead, caring for his parents while they lived, performing his share of the hard work required upon the farm in clearing the forests and turning the land into fruitful fields, and his chances for acquiring much of an education from books were very limited, a few weeks at the district school, during the winter term for a few winters, being his only opportunity; but his innate force of character early developed his wonderful observation, and his aptness to benefit himself by what he saw and heard assisted him very much to form those habits and fix within him those principles which were the guide of his life.

In his mature years, recognizing his individual responsibility to God, humbly and cheerfully consecrating himself and all that he had to Christ, he, November 13, 1831, publicly confessed his faith and united with the Congregational Church in Henniker. For several years preceding this event he had been a strong support of the society connected with this church, holding many responsible positions. From the time of his union with the church till the day of his death he was an earnest Christian worker, attending the meetings of the church punctually upon the Sabbath and upon week-days, giving words of encouragement and admonition without stint, often presiding at the meetings of both church and society, serving as collector and treasurer (treasurer seventeen years, which position he held at the time of his death).

A man of strong and right convictions, he was prompted to corresponding actions. His question always was "What is my duty under existing circumstances?" So far as man can, he marked out his own course, seeking light from every possible source, and then, acting upon his best judgment, generally accomplished his object. Without seeking to be popular, he was respected by all who knew him. He possessed the knowledge of human nature in a marked degree, and usually read the true character of those around him.

His biographer has said of him: "Mr. Connor was not an isolated man; he was a citizen. And a man of his promptness and precision in transacting his own private business would, almost as a matter of course, be called on from the retirement of private life to look after the interests of others. A very large proportion of the public monies of the town for a third of a century passed through his hands. He transacted the business of the public with such perfect accuracy as to secure the utmost confidence of all."

Mr. Connor never sought preferment at the hands of his fellow-townsmen; but they knew him well, and, because of this knowledge and the confidence reposed in him, great responsibilities, requiring sound judgment, skill and great executive powers, were placed upon him, and he always handed back these trusts after their execution, accomplished in so faithful a manner that the only answer that could be given him by his fellow-citizens was,—“Well done, good and faithful servant.”

Presiding officers of town-meetings often called upon him to assist in preserving order, and he was always obeyed promptly. He was an abiding law and order man; indeed, his whole life was one system of order. He did what his hands found to do with a precision almost remarkable, allowing nothing to swerve him from the line of duty marked out by him when any responsibility was placed upon him, and no obstacle was too great for him to overcome when once he saw the end desired.

He was collector of the taxes of the town for over twenty years, and though the collector's book was never correct when placed in his hands, it was always found correct when he returned it, and this position, at the time Mr. Connor held it, was one of great responsibility. He ever proved true in this, as in all other business intrusted to him.

Though many people sought his advice and assistance in the placing of money in safe and remunerative investments, and his advice was ever freely given, yet it is remarkable that no loan he advised proved a poor or losing investment. To him, more than to any one else, were the poor and unfortunate of the town indebted for the comfort they enjoyed in their declining years, for it was largely through his efforts that, after years of discussion, it was finally voted to have a town farm, where all could be well provided for, instead of being sold to the lowest bidder yearly, as had been the custom for so long a time. Mr. Connor was chosen one of the committee to purchase a farm. The one bought was objectionable to some, and in a few years it was thought wise to change it. Mr. Connor made no objection; but when it was suggested that the committee paid too much for the first farm, he offered to take it at what it had cost, in order that the poor could be better provided for, which offer the town accepted and received the money. He was, perhaps, more conversant with the landed property of Henniker than any other man, having assisted in measuring and lining a large portion of the town, being especially fitted for this work by his well-known habits of accuracy. His life was full of little incidents that illustrate the marked characteristics of the man and the principles he had laid down for the government of his life.

Promptness and decision were two great traits of his daily action. While collector of taxes he met at one time, at a store, a strong, stalwart man, who defied his authority to execute the law then existing in regard to taking the body for taxes. After listening for a few moments to the talk and threats of the man, he asked all present to assist in placing him in his wagon, and in an almost incredibly short space of time the man found himself within the walls of the county jail. In 1833, when some of Mr. Connor's friends, earnest workers in the cause of temperance, were endeavoring to persuade some hard drinkers to give up the cup, they were met with the objection, "If we had Uncle Abel's cider orchard, we would give up drinking rum." When this was reported to Mr. Connor, he immediately said: "Does my cider orchard stand in the way? It shall be cut down!" and, suiting the action to the word, he passed through his orchard, marking every tree whose fruit was fit only for cider, and felled them all to the ground, heavily laden with half-grown apples.

Another incident illustrates the generosity and justice that governed him. He had many chestnut-trees, the nuts from which he always gathered himself; but one season two needy young men applied for the privilege of picking them on equal shares. It was granted, and when all (several bushels) were gathered, Mr. Connor was called upon to divide them, and did so, giving the young men two-thirds instead of one-half. When reminded that they expected only one-half, he said: "You have gathered these chestnuts and have requested me to divide them; I am satisfied with the division and I have done you no harm; you have been faithful."

Mr. Connor became an early friend of the cause of temperance. In the earliest years of his life it was the custom of almost every one to indulge in the use of intoxicating drinks, and he was not an exception; but having some conversation upon the matter with true and trusted friends, he resolved to do what lay in his power to stay the demon of intemperance, and was one of four men and eight women who organized the first temperance society in Henniker, July 6, 1829. When the Washingtonian movement swept over the land, in 1843, Mr. Connor was among its earliest and most ardent advocates, and, largely through his unbounded zeal and great personal interest in the cause, Henniker was moved as never before in this work, and good effects were produced that have never been effaced. Besides all he did for the church and Sabbath-school, with which he was connected, he was a warm advocate of, and dispenser of many gifts to different charitable organizations engaged in missionary work, both in this and foreign lands, and a certain portion of the products of his farm was set aside yearly for this generous purpose. One of these objects was the Colonization Society, which assisted slaves who could obtain their freedom to establish homes in Liberia.

As early as 1824 his attention was called to the raising of grafted fruit, and in a few years his orchards were bending with their luscious burden, and Mr. Connor was known throughout this and the neighboring States as one of the first to introduce grafted fruit into Central New Hampshire, and one of the most successful raisers of good fruits in New England at that time; and when it found its way to market, it was only necessary to say by whom it was raised to secure for it a ready sale.

Living and dying upon the old homestead, Mr. Connor was a progressive, hard-working farmer, securing his bountiful harvests by earnest, faithful labor, and it was in the privacy of his own home that he, as a husband and father, was the best-known, setting an example to his family safe for them to follow. The first act of every day was to acknowledge his dependence upon the overruling power of God, and to seek His guidance. That he had faults need not be said; for had he not, something more than human must he have been; but he knew them all, and, through the grace of God, sought to overcome them, teaching his children to shun them, and by so doing became the loved and honored head of the family making his home one of comfort, peace and happiness.

Mr. Connor died October 20, 1854. On the day preceding the night in which he was attacked with his last illness he was in his accustomed place in the church, and addressed the Sabbath-school in his usual earnest manner. The progress of his disease was rapid, and he passed peacefully away, surrounded by his loving family, to whom he gave faithful admonitions to be prepared to follow him.

And not only in his own sorrowing family, but throughout the town and community where he had been so long known and highly respected, there was great sadness and a feeling that a faithful, affectionate husband and father, a trusted, reliable, honorable citizen, had passed on to his reward.

JOHN GUTTERSON.

John Gutterson was born June 16, 1832, in Dunbarton, Merrimack County, N. H. He is the son of Nathan and Sarah (Atwood) Gutterson, and grandson of Josiah and Rachel (Sawyer) Gutterson. Josiah was born in Pelham, N. H., while his wife, Rachel, was a native of Dracut, Mass. He was by occupation a blacksmith. When a young man, soon after his marriage, he went to Francestown, and remained there ten or twelve years, when he removed to Weare, N. H., where the remainder of his life was spent. He died aged fifty-seven. Mrs. Gutterson lived to be sixty-nine years of age.

Nathan Gutterson was born in Francestown March 8, 1796. He learned blacksmithing with his father, and remained with him till twenty-one years of age. His tastes did not incline him to follow blacksmithing as a pursuit, and for some years after attaining his majority he clerked in a store, and at intervals taught school. He also did a considerable business at potash-making, which in those days was quite an industry. He married, March 25, 1821, Sarah, daughter of Jacob and Sarah (Cross) Atwood, of Atkinson, N. H. In 1825 he removed from Weare (whither he had gone with his parents) to Dunbarton, N. H., where he engaged in farming and butchering till 1839, when he took charge of Stark's Mills, and continued in charge till 1856, and from 1844 to 1850 he also had charge of the Stark farm; he then removed to a farm of his own, but still retained charge of the mills. In 1863 he removed to Henniker, N. H., where he resided in the village, and spent his time—whenever he chose to be employed—in tending his son John's grist-mill. In his younger days he was a captain of militia, and retained the title among his acquaintances as long as he lived. He was frequently chosen to town offices, and in 1841 and 1842 was representative to the State Legislature. He was a life-long Democrat, and in religious belief was a Universalist, although he never united with any church.

He had four children: William W., resides in Henniker. Sarah J., married, first, Alfred L. Boynton, of Weare; had two children; married, second, Otis Hanson, of Henniker; no issue; she died May 25, 1871. Maria L., married David S. Carr, of Goffstown; now resides in Henniker; has three children. John whose portrait accompanies this sketch. Nathan Gutterson died December 2, 1872. Mrs. Gutterson died November 22, 1873.

John Gutterson received his education at the common schools, supplemented by an attendance of three terms at a select school.

When a lad he assisted his father in the mill and on the farm. When in his nineteenth year he went to Lynn, Mass., to learn the carpenter's trade, and remained there most of the time for about three years. In the spring of his twenty-second year he went to Goffstown, and engaged in a sash and blind-factory. May 23d of this same year, 1851, he married S. Frances, daughter of Dr. Isaac Stearns, of Dunbarton. Her mother was Eunice P. Marshall, of Dunbarton. The following year Mr. Gutterson removed to Dunbarton and took charge of the Stark Mills, succeeding his father in their management. In 1860 he superintended the remodeling and rebuilding of the mills. October 1, 1862, he removed to Henniker, having purchased the property known as the old Howe Mill and privilege on Contoocook River. This place he has made his home to the present time. The year following his purchase of the property he rebuilt the mill and remodeled it throughout. In 1866 he built the pleasant and commodious dwelling in which he now resides. In 1868 he purchased a half-interest with John Gage in the manufacture of bent dry measures. This interest he retained seven or eight years, when he sold out. He has always continued his grist and saw-mill, and does quite a considerable business purchasing grain, grinding it and selling the product.

In politics he has until recently affiliated with the Democratic party; but, being an earnest advocate of temperance, he has cast his vote and influence with the Prohibition party, and been somewhat prominent as a temperance worker in connection with the Reform Club and, more recently, the Sons of Temperance.

In the summer of 1862 he received the Blue Lodge degrees in Masonry in Blazing Star Lodge, No. 11, of Concord, N. H., and that fall he became a member of Aurora Lodge, No. 43, of Henniker. A few years later he took the Chapter degrees in Woods Chapter, No. 14, of Henniker. He has held various offices in both, and was Master of Aurora Lodge, 1883-84.

He united with the Congregational Church in 1870, and in 1872 was chosen superintendent of the Sunday-school, which position he still holds.

Mr. and Mrs. Gutterson have four children: Kate M., married Richard L. Childs, of Henniker; has three children,—Anna L., Emily F. and Francis L. Clara C., unmarried, a teacher in the Francestown Academy. Alice M., resides with her parents,

John Guttersen

Horace Childs

Sarah B., who has been alternately attending and teaching school.

Mr. Gutterston is one of the substantial, respectable and influential citizens of Henniker, industrious, earnest and persevering, of genial nature, with a pleasant word for all. He is of the type of man who will win and retain a friendship, let his lot be cast where it may.

HORACE CHILDS.

Horace Childs, son of Solomon Childs, Jr., and Mary (Long) Child, was born August 10, 1807, in Henniker, N. H., and is a descendant of an old English family of honor, entitled to bear a coat-of-arms. The first date we have of the appearance of the family in America is in 1630, when Ephraim Child and his brother William emigrated to Watertown, Mass. They were men earnest in character, distinguished for piety, methodical and exact in their habits, and the American family bearing the name of Child or Childs has always taken a prominent part in the progressive movements of the day. William (1) was made a freeman in 1634; was a man of note, and possessed of much landed estate. John (2), son of William, was born in Watertown, Mass. He married, for his second wife, May 29, 1668, Mary Warren, born November 29, 1651, grand-daughter of John Warren, who came to America in the "Arabella" with Governor Winthrop, in 1630 (Mr. Warren was a selectman of Watertown, a man independent and eccentric in character). Mr. John Child, although dying at the age of forty, had been representative to the General Court, and was conspicuous in town affairs. John (3), born in Watertown April 25, 1669, married Hannah, daughter of Captain William French. He was an intelligent and representative man. Jonathan (4), born in Watertown April 26, 1696, married Abigail Parker, October 2, 1729; they settled in Grafton, Worcester County, Mass., where Mr. Child died September 8, 1787, in his ninety-second year. Josiah (5) married Ruth —, Solomon (6) was born in Grafton January 3, 1743. He married, April 16, 1767, Martha, daughter of Elijah Rice, of Westborough, Mass., and sister of Elijah and Deacon Daniel Rice. Animated by the restless spirit and tireless energy which marks the pioneer, soon after his marriage, Solomon left Massachusetts, came to New Hampshire and settled in Henniker, when the whole northwestern portion of the town was a wilderness. Mrs. Martha (Rice) Childs was a woman of sterling worth, and well fitted to be a helpmeet for this sturdy pioneer. She died August 26, 1804, leaving children. Mr. Childs married, second, Mrs. Sarah (Goodell) Ward. He lived to see the town reach its maximum population. He was a farmer all his days, and his original farm is now occupied by his grandson, Carlos Childs. He died February 27, 1827, leaving a large family to honor his memory and emulate his virtues, which gave him a high place in the esteem of the community. Solomon (7), Jr., was born in Henniker July 30, 1781. He acquired the trades of carpenter and cabinet-maker, and was prominent as a builder, and when the large factories in Dover, N. H., were being erected his services were in requisition, and he passed five years there. He married, first, September 21, 1806, Miss Mary Long, of Hopkinton, N. H. She died in 1823, having been the mother of eleven children. Mr. Childs married, second, Lucinda, daughter of William and Mary (Heaton) Child. She died January 20, 1852. Mr. Childs was also a farmer, having inherited a part of his father's farm, and carried it on in connection with his other business. He was a Whig in politics, a member of the Congregational Church and a very industrious and worthy citizen. Affable and courteous, with a smile and good word for all, he will be long remembered with pleasure by those who knew him. He was a very vigorous man, and after he was eighty years old walked from Concord to Henniker, a distance of fifteen miles. He died October 19, 1865. Horace Childs (7) passed his childhood, and until he was eighteen years old, attending school and assisting his father on the farm. He then accompanied his parent to Dover, N. H., and engaged in the carpentering business, remaining there a few years. At the age of twenty-two he returned to Henniker, and spent two years in house-building, when, on account of a severe illness, he was compelled to relinquish active labor for a time, and in the interim, a year or more, attended school and fitted himself for future work. At this time his cousin, Colonel S. H. Long, who had invented a new design for bridges, prevailed upon him to go to Boston, where he engaged in building bridges on the Boston and Worcester and Boston and Providence Railroads. After he had acquired sufficient knowledge of the business he engaged as a master-builder to superintend the building of a bridge across the Connecticut River at Haverhill, N. H. This bridge, after half a century of constant usage, stands to-day a testimony of the fidelity with which the work was done. He built three other bridges at various places on the Connecticut River; also three over White River. All the bridges on the line of the Hartford and New Haven Railroad were originally built under his supervision and contract, he paying Colonel Long a royalty for the use of his patent. The plan of Colonel Long was found to be deficient in strength for heavy railroad bridges, and Mr. Childs studied to devise one that would be satisfactory. His labor was successful, and he patented his improvement, which was followed in nearly all of his subsequent work, which comprised most of the bridges on the Northern Railroad from Concord to White River Junction, many on the Providence and Worcester Railroad, a large one on the Erie Railroad at Port Jervis, N. Y., and some smaller ones on the same road. The bridges on the New Hampshire Central Railroad also were of his construction. While building one across the Merrimack at Manchester he had a limb broken by a falling timber, which disabled him for some time, but he entirely recovered its use. During this period of inactivity his brothers, Enoch and Warren, took charge of his business, and were engaged in the work in Maine, on the Kennebeck and other roads.

In 1851 a train from Boston to Concord, having on board President-elect Franklin Pierce and family, was wrecked, and the only child of Mr. Pierce was killed and many passengers injured, among them Mr. Childs. He was badly hurt about the head and rendered insensible for some time. For several years the effects of this accident were seriously felt, and he has never fully recovered from it. During all these years of active labor Mr. Childs has made Henniker his home, and after he gave up bridge-building he purchased a small farm on which to occupy himself, and he has continued until the present time to overlook its cultivation. The house in which he now resides in the village has been the home of himself and wife for nearly fifty years.

Mr. Childs married, January 11, 1837, Matilda R., daughter of John and Sally (Jones) Taylor, of Lempster. Mrs. Childs is descended, paternally, from William Taylor, who came to America in 1642. The line is William (1), Abraham (2), Deacon Samuel (3), Thaddeus (4), John (5), Matilda R. (6). Her uncle, Rev. Oliver Swaine Taylor, M. D., died in February, 1875, at Auburn, N. Y., at the remarkable age of over one hundred years and four months. He was born December 17, 1784; graduated at Dartmouth, in 1809; was appointed missionary physician to Ceylon in 1815, but circumstances prevented his going; he assisted in editing the Panoplist, and was ordained as an evangelist at the age of sixty-three. Mrs. Childs' father lived to be nearly ninety-two, and one of his brothers reached the age of ninety-six.

Maternally, she is descended from the Lockes, the first American ancestor being Deacon William Locke, who came from Stepney Parish, London, England, in ship "Planter," and settled at Woburn, Mass., in which place and Winchester there are many of his descendants, who, at present, are good and prosperous citizens.

Mr. and Mrs. Childs have had no children, but they have cared for those of others.

Mr. Childs has taken an active part in the educational interests of his native town, and has assisted young men in obtaining an education. In 1836 he was chosen one of a committee to report a plan for locating and building an academy. The site decided upon was given by Mr. Childs, and the academy was built by him under contract. He was also one of its incorporators. He has been all his life an earnest advocate of temperance, making it a point, when employing men upon public works, that no ardent spirits should be used in or about the works. He is a staunch Republican, and has always voted that ticket. In 1831 he united with the Congregational Church in Henniker, and has been one of the deacons of the church since February 19, 1855, and faithfully fulfilled the duties of that position. He has done much to sustain the church in all of its relations, and is a valuable member of the society. He has also been personally very active in making improvements about the church and vestry. He is a life-member of the American Board of Foreign Missions.

Mr. Childs is a man of strict integrity, marked generosity and liberality of character. As a business man successful, as a citizen respected and beloved, and as one who has done much to further and promote the improvement and prosperity of his native town, he stands among her representative men, and is a worthy descendant of the "old pioneer."

HISTORY OF HOOKSETT.

BY SAMUEL HEAD, (2nd).

CHAPTER I.

HOOKSETT is located in the most southerly portion of Merrimack County, being bounded on the north by Bow and Allenstown, on the east by Deerfield, Candia, and Auburn, on the south by Auburn and Manchester, and on the west by Goffstown. The surface is very uneven and is not generally adapted for agriculture, but in some sections of the town, especially bordering the Merrimack River, the soil is fertile, of an alluvial and aluminous nature, which affords some well-cultivated farms. The Merrimack River flows in a winding manner through the westerly part of the town nearly its entire length from north to south. The river, from the early primitive times, has changed its channel in a number of instances according to the geographical and geological construction of the surface of the valley of the beautiful Merrimack. The banks of the river are high and dry above the surface of the water in a large portion of the territory that the river meanders through, thus protecting the adjoining country from being overflowed with the turbid stream in times of floods and high water. Whenever such barriers exist the land is of a sandy nature, which is not successfully cultivated at the present time. Between the Merrimack River, back from the valley, and the eastern part of the town the soil is sandy, with a gravelly subsoil, and is almost entirely covered with scrub oaks and underbrush growing into a slight growth of woodland. About three-fifths of the acreage of the town of Hooksett is wild, unfit for filling or grazing, and consequently the land is devoted to growing wood and timber. Throughout this whole territory solid ledges and high boulders of granite crop out in every direction, giving the land an ungainly and impracticable appearance. The early growth originally cut and marketed was mostly white and hard pine. Most of the original territory now embraced in the town of Hooksett, on the east side of the river, was formerly called Chester Woods. As early as October, 1719, about eighty persons, chiefly from Hampton and Portsmouth, associated for the purpose of obtaining a grant of a township in the "Chestnut Country." In every reference in early history made to the northerly part of the old town of Chester it was called "White Pine Country" or "Chester Woods." Thus, to this late day, the country remains the same, only the territory is at some points in a thorough state of denudation. This whole country, according to the original map prepared by Benjamin Chase¹ of the town of Chester, places it in the fifth and fourth divisions. The lots were made out running north and south, and numbered east and west. In the eastern part of the town there are a number of ponds, now called Lakin's Pond, Clay Pond and Sawyer's Pond, and they are interlinked by brooks at the north part, having their outlet from Lakin's Pond through Brown's Brook into the Merrimack River, and in the southerly part via Lake Masabesic. In the early history of old Cheshire, when the primeval forests were undisturbed, this part of the township abounded in beavers, that built dams across the various streams, and the growth of wood was destroyed by constant flowage, but when the country became settled the beavers were destroyed, and the land came into natural grass, which was of great use to the early settlers. These meadows extended into all parts of the original township, including the territory lying between the White Hall Mill, near Rowe's Corner, and old Derryfield (now Manchester).

Another most prominent meadow commenced in what is now the village of Auburn, and extended to the Londonderry line, and was called the "Long Meadows." As late as February 5, 1721-22, the proprietors "Voted that the Lott Layers survey the principle meadows and Reserve them out of the Second Division for the Publick use until the Prop^r See Cause to Divide 'em."

April, 1727, it was "Voted that the Inhabitants, and those that are coming to Settle, divide ye Cutting of ye meadows in Equal Proportion among Themselves for ye Year Ensuing, and that none Cutt any before the Last day of July, on the penalty of 20s., to be paid by each person for every day y^e he or they shall offend, to be paid to the Selectmen for ye use of the Poor of the Town."

March 28, 1728, it was "Voted That there shall be ¹Benjamin Chase is the author of "Chase's History of the Town of Chester," published in the year of 1809.

a Division of meadow to Every Right according as it will hold out in quantity & quality, according to y^e goodness or badness of y^e Meadow, to make every man's share as Equal as can be."

At the present time, whatever meadow there is in the town of Hooksett that could be classed in the above is not valued so much for cropping as then, for the farmers now devote more attention to English grass, and use meadow hay for cheap folding purposes. In a number of instances the old original meadows are entirely obliterated, being now covered with a growth of trees, and if, in the march of modern progress, the farmers should improve these lands, they would find, in time, land of great natural fertility. On the west side of the Merrimack River the land is very uneven, and rises to quite an elevation where the boundary line divides us from Goffstown, Dunbarton and Bow. The soil is good and farming is successfully carried on.

The origin of the name of Hooksett dates back to an early period in the history of this country. Isaac W. Hammond, in his compilation of State papers, says, "The name 'Isle au Hooksett' and 'Isle au Hooksett Falls' was attached to the locality many years before the incorporation and naming of the town, but it is impossible to ascertain its derivation." He refers to Captain Ladd's scouts, who camped near a pond in the north part of Chester, called Isle Hooks Pond, which is now supposed to be Lakin's Pond. The above facts were gleaned from Abner Clough's journal, containing an account of the march of Captain Daniel Ladd and his men, who were sent by the Governor and Council of New Hampshire on July 14, 1746,— "Marched from Exeter to Beach plain, in Kingston. On the 13th day marched to Chester and there took more men. On the 16th day enlisted more men. On the 17th day marched from Chester town to a place called Isle Hooks pond, and scouted round the Pond and then camped about 11 miles. On the 18th day, early in the morning, raged the woods till almost night, and could make no discovery of the Enemy then marched to Suncook and there camped."

During these years the early settlers were having much trouble from the small bands of Indians that were scouting the entire province. The French, through their mercenary modes of warfare, were the instigators of these scenes of devastation and cruelty, and during the years 1745, '46, '47, '48 and '49 a great many settlers were killed or taken captives. These proceedings were constantly taking place until the year 1749, when peace was declared.

Chase, in his "History of Chester," says that in the year 1748 there was a man killed by the Indians near Head's Mill (now Hooksett). This man was probably a McQuade, who was going to mill with a bag of corn. He was shot from behind a tree. W. H. Otterson, of Hooksett, remembers that in his boyhood, his mother knew the location of the stump when it was called the McQuade stump. At that time the old Gault house, now the premises of Norris C. Gault, was a garrison. From other historical sources we learn that soon after 1745, the year that the French war broke out, a man by the name of Buntin was shot by the Indians near Head's tavern, in Hooksett. He was a Pelham man and was on his way to Pennacook. According to Jeremy Belknap, D.D. in his "History of New Hampshire," a man was killed at Suncook in the year 1747. Undoubtedly the circumstance to which Belknap refers is the same as that mentioned by Chase and other historians, but Belknap is more correct as to data, etc. In the year of 1772, according to Captain Pecker's journal, who was with a surveying-party prospecting in the Merrimack Valley, after going up the Black Brook into Goffstown, where they camped, it says,—

"On Dec. 10th, Marched from Anna Hooksett hill, Cross Merrimack River at So, Steering a South Easterly Course, marched to Great Masses-pond pond, to the northernmost part of Cheshire,—16 miles."

It seems by this record that some hill now in Hooksett, west of the Merrimack River, had the appellation of Hooksett connected with its history. At an earlier period, in the journal kept by John Wainwright, clerk of a committee appointed by the Great and General Court or Assembly to lay out a new township of seven miles square at Pennacook, it is said,—

"May 10th, 1726.—This day the Committee met at the House of Ebenezer Eastman, in Haverhill, in order to go to Penny Cook to lay out the Township according to order.

"Wednesday, May 11th.—Present, The Hon^{ble} William Taylor, Esq., Jno. Wainwright, Esq., Capt. Jno. Shipley, Ebenezer Tyngs, Esq., and Mr. Joseph Wilder. This day the Committee received, of several ye Settlers, forty shillings each, a list where-of was taken; being to defray the charge of surveying the Lands, &c., and prepared the necessary provisions for their Journey and their Attendants to Penny Cook.

"Thursday, May 12.—Lowry Weather with some rain. . . . At Amoscook Falls we found several Irish people catching fish, which that place affords in great abundance. We travelled in a cart path from Saffield to Amoscook, but it was very indolent travelling. Cloudy Weather.

"Friday, May 13th.—This Morning we proceeded on our Journey. Very Hilly and Mountainous Land. About Eight a Clock we passed by a Fall called Omna hookline, in Merrimack River, which is taken from a Hill of the same name. About Nine a clock we forded a pretty deep Brook or Rivulet called a blank,¹ and soon after we came upon a large Tract of Intervale Land joining to Suncook River, where we baited and refreshed our selves and Horses. About ten or eleven a clock we forded Suncook River, which is a rapid Stream, and many loose Stones, of some Considerable Bigness in it, making it difficult to pass. One of our men going over, having a heavy load on his Horse, was thrown off into the River and lost one of the Bags of provisions which we lost, not having time to look after it. Another of our fell into ye River. Here we met with two men Capt. Tyng sent up before us with stores (Benj. Nicolls and Ebon. Virgin, two of ye Settlers), and about one a Clock we passed Penny Cook River (alias Shin Brook or Sow Cook), pretty deep and very rocky. . . ."

We find, by reading the above description, that the name Omna Hookline is applied to the falls, and other points are familiarly described in this journey. Again, in the year of 1638, eighty-eight years before the above, and only nineteen after the landing of the Pilgrims, the General Court of Massachusetts ordered a survey of the Merrimack River to be made, which was done by Nathaniel Woodward in the spring of 1639, and made out as Gardner's map. On this map the Pinnacle or hills in the vicinity where Hooksett village now is called Hanna-ko-Kees Hills. According to the map the whole country from the mouth of the river to the Lake Winnepesogee is almost a perfect survey, and to the familiar eye, excepting the early names, it looks reasonable. Thus we find, by the names early given our falls, that they were derived from Hanna-ko-Kees, a mountain in this vicinity. The hills of Hooksett are not prominently numerous, but in some parts of the town quite an elevation can be reached. In the early history of the State the Pennacook Indians were numerous and powerful. Their hunting-grounds were in the Merrimack Valley. They were a very harmless people naturally, and friendly to the settlers. The writer of this has heard of some old people speak of recollecting of their fathers' telling about a number of Indian families living within the limits of Chester. The race has become extinct, excepting the transmitted intermixture of Indian and white blood. There are a few cases in this State where families have multiplied and become numerous and noted by partially springing from the Pennacook Indian tribe.

In the southeast part of the town, near the boundary, is Hall's Mountain, which is elevated, and can be seen from the west a great distance. In the western part of the town is Hackett's Hill. At the south, east and north sides a very extended view can be obtained, reaching as far as Mount Chicoua, in Albany, Sandwich Mountains and Mount Moolisunke.

From an eminence called the Pinnacle a delightful view of the Merrimack Valley is seen. At your feet is the thriving village of Hooksett, which makes an enchanting scene. On the east side is an abrupt precipice more than two hundred feet high. At the foot of the mountain, on the west side, is a beautiful sheet of water, transparent, with a greenish tinge, and showing no visible outlet. In the year of 1859-60 about seven thousand dollars was expended in blasting and digging for silver and gold on the west side of the hill. Some was discovered, but not in such quantities as to make it pay. Tradition says that this point was a lurking-place for the Indians. A fine view could be had of the river in both directions, so that the approach of a foe was discerned at once. Just opposite, on the east side of the mountain, is Otterson's Hill. On this elevation a fine northwesterly view is enjoyed. This point also was a place of rendezvous for signal purposes. On the plain between this point and the river Indian relics of numerous varieties are found, and vestiges of their wigwams are very evident at the present day. Around Hooksett Falls was a famous place for salmon, and wherever those fish were abundant the Indians prevailed.

Of the early settlers little is known except what is found in common with the towns that Hooksett was made from. In that part of Chester now Hooksett one of the early settlers was Daniel Martin, who had a grant from King George. His descendants live in Hooksett and elsewhere in large numbers. It is said when the road to Martin's Ferry was laid out, in 1776, it crossed land owned by "several of the Martins." In the year of 1791 there was a tornado, which blew down the buildings of Daniel Martin, carrying him more than twelve rods. A large piece of timber was lodged on the body of Mr. Martin. David Martin, then a child three weeks old, was held between the knees of an aunt, and saved from being blown away. This woman removed the timber from the body of Mr. Martin by her herculean strength. In the year of 1826, in July, two girls, daughters of David Martin, were drowned from the Dalton rock in the Merrimack River. They followed after their father to get the cows, but while playing, they slipped in, and the current carried them out. Mr. Martin narrowly escaped drowning himself in trying to save them.

Jesse Kimball lived near Martin's Ferry; had a son Jedediah, who lived on lot 117, fourth division; his descendants are numerous throughout New England. John Dustin was a physician and was at Martin's Ferry in 1775. He was probably the first doctor that ever located within our territory. Thomas Wicom lived on the Mammoth road, and some of the people now living, remember the old "Smoke-house," so called. D. Harper, on lot 82, and S. Rowell, on lot 81, Auburn road. On the old road now located between the river and the present highway were Dalton's and Arwine's taverns. On Samuel Holland's map, made about the year of 1784, a point is indicated near this location called Kars; it is supposed to be an early settlement where travelers were put up. At the junction of the White Hall and Londonderry turnpike was the J. Martin settlement. Further on was the White Hall, and Chase, in the History of Chester, places it on lot No. 123, fourth division, and J. Talford beyond, on lot 121. According to investigation, the location of the White Hall was the original J. Talford settlement. Chase says "that in May, 1724, John Paeker, of Haverhill, Mass., conveyed to John Talford, of Bradford, the home lot No. 66, and one-half of all of the other divisions, on condition that he should make a settlement. He accordingly settled on that lot on Walnut Hill. He was a major in the militia and held many civil offices. He became a large land-holder and was an enterprising man. He built the first saw-mill at White Hall, in Hooksett." This Talford lot, now called the Sawyer place, contained eight hundred acres, and it was heavily covered with white pine timber, and as Talford in that day was a speculator in land, it is presumed that he located here for the attractions it offered for speculation.

Mr. Talford died May, 1790, aged ninety years. Near the White Hall place the first path to Penna-cook was traversed, following the same direction from that point as the Concord and Portsmouth Railroad was laid out. In the extreme eastern part of the fifth division, on lot 104, was the Wiggins settlement. On the old Chester turnpike, on lot 62, was the toll-house, but later the Langley tavern, which was a famous stopping-point for the stages. This building was burned in the year 1878. On lot No. 113, fourth division, Joseph Whittier settled at what is now Clark's tavern, or Stearns' hotel. He owned a large tract of land. Simeon Carr lived on the Boyes land, half a mile southeast of the Head tavern, in Hooksett, where is now the old Ledge boarding-house. He had a daughter born about 1778, who married Major Nathaniel Head, who sold to Mark Whittier and moved West. The Head tavern was settled at a later date, about the year 1802, and a tavern was opened soon after by Samuel Head. It was formerly the Boyes lands. The original homestead is now owned by James Thompson. Just above was the Harriman place. Laban Harriman came from Hampstead about 1780; in a few years went back, and a brother, Rufus Harriman took his place, and in a few years sold. Afterwards Richard Head owned it, dying in 1831, leaving it to his son, John Head, who died about the year 1850. The place has since been owned by Henry H. Thompson, and the buildings were burned in September, 1883.

There was a family named Abrams that settled in this vicinity, of which little is known. Then the R. Gordon place, which is of a later date. He is remembered by many people living. Hon. Jesse Gault now lives on the old site. The Otterson place was settled by William Otterson, who bought of Robert Boyes No. 128, fifth division, where Martin L. Otterson now lives. William was drowned while crossing Lake Champlain in the year of 1760; he was a soldier in the army. He left one son, James, who served as a soldier at Rhode Island in 1778. The old original house was located a few rods north of the present Otterson house, which supplanted one that was burned in the year 1860.

Samuel Brown settled on No. 28, fifth division, which is now owned by Hon. Jesse Gault; it was formerly the Hooksett poor farm. Joseph Brown settled near where is now Head's mill. William Brown located on lot No. 30, in that vicinity. Nathaniel Head came from Pembroke about 1780, and built a log house on the same spot where his grandson, the late ex-Governor, lived. He was an energetic business man, a good counselor, and was a much-respected justice of the peace. His daughter Polly married Thomas Cochran, of Pembroke, who settled on Buck Street. One Sunday, about the year 1800, Thomas said to his wife, "Let us go and see father and mother Head to-day." After the chores were finished they took an infant baby and crossed the Suncook River, taking a footpath through the woods. When arriving at the homestead the mother greeted them cordially. Mr.

Cochran went into the main room where Esquire Head sat studiously reading the Bible. The reception was not very cordial, as he soon turned his attention from the book and said,—"Thomas I shall be glad to have you come to our house on any week-day, but I do not want you to visit us on the Sabbath." Thomas immediately notified his wife, Polly, and they returned to their home, never to repeat again a visit to the Head place on the Lord's day. This characteristic sentiment prevailed to a larger degree with our forefathers than at the present time. It is said that Mr. Head kept a public inn at the time when the incident occurred, and if any person called for spirituous drinks, he was supplied and it was drunk on the premises, but the Bible-reading went right on with the same profound regard for its teachings and Puritanic respect for the Sabbath. Nathaniel Head died October 4, 1830. He was a trial justice, and many cases of litigation, etc., were left to him for decision. Noah M. Coffran, of Pembroke, now over eighty years old, relates that at one time, when a mere boy, he was drawing logs with oxen to the Merrimack River. Esquire Head was there unloading some logs, but became greatly troubled about landing them. Young Coffran helped him out of the difficulty, and the esquire frankly acknowledged it was the first time in his life that he had learned anything from a boy. Mr. Coffran relates that he was surprised in receiving such a compliment from the respected, dignified man. There was a family by the name of Lakin, which Chase, in his "History of Chester," overlooked. Their settlement was on the east side of Lakin's Pond. Some of their descendants live in Hooksett at the present time. The pond was a famous one for pickerel. The original Lakin always spoke of it as his "Pork Barrel."

Just above the Head settlement was S. Gault's. He was born in Scotland; married Elsie Carlton, of Wales. They had three children born in Scotland. He moved to Londonderry, Ireland, and had two children born there. He came to this country, and settled on the land now owned by his great-great-grandson, Norris C. Gault.

The original house was a garrison, and the land was on the Suncook grant. The descendants of this family are numerous, becoming successful and noted. On the west side of the river, which was formerly Dunbarton, according to a plan drawn by David Tenney in October, 1803, and one drawn at Portsmouth in 1749, the lots were allotted as follows: 1st lot, 11th range, Mark H. Wentworth; 12th range, lots 1 and 2, Jeremiah Page; 13th range, lots 1 and 2, common lot 3, John Wallingford and John Wentworth; 1st lot sold in 1764 to Bond Little; 2d lot sold in 1764 to — Martin; 14th range, 1st lot sold to Alexander Todd; 2d lot, school lot; 3d lot, John Wentworth; 4th lot, vacant. Lots running along the bank of the Merrimack: owners, Jacob Green, Jeremiah Page, Thomas Upham; sold in 1795 to Benjamin Noyes. The proprietors' meeting September, 1764, "Voted Jeremiah Page, Thomas Caldwell and John Hogg be a committee to plan out the common that lays on the Merrimack River." In June, 1771, "Voted, that Caleb Page go to Portsmouth and try to make a settlement with the Lords Proprietors about their common lands in Dunbarton." The most of these common lands were situated in what is now Hooksett. On the 11th day of September the proprietors of more than seven rights in the common and undivided lands in Dunbarton called a meeting "to see if the proprietors would vote that every proprietor who is settled on common land in said town shall have his share or shares laid out when they have done their work in quantity and quality as said proprietors shall vote, or that the proprietors shall make a division of the common lands as they shall think best when met." This was signed by Thomas Cochran, William Cochran, James McColley, James Cochran y^c 3d, James Cochran, William Page, William Wheeler, Nicholas Dodge, Ephraim Kinsman, Ebenezer Hackett. These men were mostly inhabitants where Hooksett is now located. From 1751 to 1802 the proprietors were constantly having meetings, the records showing the names of those who were residents of the territory of Dunbarton (now Hooksett).

Among the proprietors' rights were Thomas Cochran, four rights of land where he lived, near the river (supposed Merrimack), fifty-one acres each, one hundred and three acres, two rights including the Hooksett Falls; Deacon Cochran, one right of land adjoining Thomas Cochran's land, thirty acres; Farrington and Abbot, five rights where Abbot lives, seventy acres. This was one of the original settled places, called the Joshua Abbott place, near the head of Hooksett Falls, on the lot where the John Prescott place is now situated. In the year 1813 the selectmen of Dunbarton notified Robert Cochran, a surveyor in what is now west village of Hooksett and outskirts, which composed Dunbarton, to give notice to the following tax-payers of the amount of their highway tax: Robert Cochran, Richard H. Ayer, Joshua Abbot, Philip Abbot, Henry Moulton, Captain John Hoyt, Lieutenant John Baker, Ensign Samuel Flanders, Luman Lincoln, Josiah Barnes, Sirus Baker, Abel Dow, Samuel Hosmer, Winthrop Knight, Samuel Martin, Luther Shattuck, William Otterson. The whole amount assessed was $65.15.

A valuable collection of papers that have been kept in good condition, that belonged to the Cochran and Abbot families, the first settlers in above district, are interesting on account of their age and curiosity. An original deed as follows:

"PROVINCE OF NEW HAMPSH. The following is a copy of a letter written to Robert Paterson, of New Boston, N. H., from a soldier in the Revolutionary War:

"MEADSBORO, June 30, 1775."

"Humana fallos.—I take this opportunity to let you know that I and brother Samuel is well—Blessed Be God for it!—hoping you all enjoy the Same Blessing. I have Reason to Bleas god at all times For preserving Mevius, But especially in the Day of Battle, when I escaped So near, I have nothing Remarkable to write to you, But I like my living very well and we enjoy peace and plenty at present. Remember My Love to Thomas Colvin and his Family and all our loving friends. Not forgetting The Pretty girls, So Sad no more but Remain you Dutyfull Son till death.

"ALEXANDER PATERSON."

The above papers, consisting of a boxfull, containing receipts, deeds, contracts and two or three copies, systematically kept, of account-books, with dates from 1764 to 1800, are in the hands of the writer. They contain interesting references to our early settlers, which want of space will not allow us to publish.

The following documents, which were found in the New Hampshire State papers compiled by Hamond, relate to Hooksett anterior to the organization of the town.

PETITION OF JOSHUA ABBOTT FOR A FERRY IN 1782.

"To the Honorable the Council and House of Representatives of the State of New Hampshire, in General Court Convened at Concord, the 11th Day of June, 1782.

"We, the Subscribers, inhabiting near Isle a Hooksett Falls, on Merrimack River, apprehend a Ferry is much wanted at or near said Falls, which would greatly accommodate the Publick, and Joshua Abbott, having purchased a Piece of Land and bargained for a Boat, in order to keep said Ferry. Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray that your Honors would make a Grant of said Ferry to said Abbott, and your Petitioners, as in Duty bound, shall ever pray.

In the mean time Dustin and Martin petitioned for a ferry about four miles below (now called Martin's Ferry), in Hooksett, as follows:

"To the Honorable the Council and Assembly of the State of New Hampshire, now convened at Concord, in said State.

"We, the Petitioners, John Dustin a Dumfriesing, of Chester, in the County of Rockingham, in said State, humbly sheweth that your Petitioners has lived many years in said Chester, on the Bank of Merrimack River, in such a situation for keeping a Ferry as is Very convenient to accommodate a great Number of the Inhabitants of Godstown, Dunbarton and of many other Towns above who have Occasion to travel to the Lower Part of this and the Massachusetts State, that highways have been laid out by the town, joining on both sides of the River to said Place, and well made and Repaired, and that Your Petitioners has been at a considerable Expence in building and maintaining of boats and giving constant attendance to Ferry People across for more than sixteen years when the profits was Very Inconsiderable and In No wise Equal to the Expence, and that there is now Considerable travelling and delays increasing, Being found to be Very advantageous to the Public, and that your Petitioners expects that a petition will be preferred to your Honors for a License to keep a Ferry on said River, about two or three miles up said River, from where your petitioners keeps their ferry, where there is no Road laid out on neither side of the River to the place, with an intent to prevent your petitioners from any profit by their ferry, wherefore your petitioners humbly prays that you would grant them a License to keep a Ferry where they now Does, and that if a petition shall be preferred, as suspected, that you would Dismiss the same or appoint a Committee in the vicinity to view the place proposed for a ferry with the place for Boats on both sides of the river, as well as your petitioners' ferry and the Roads leading to and from the same, and make Report that your petitioners may have an opportunity of appearing on Any future day you may appoint to shew cause, and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

"Chester, June 14th, 1782."

"JOHN DUSTIN,

"DANIEL MARTIN.

In the House of Representatives, November 19, 1782, a committee having viewed the premises, reported in favor of establishing the ferry asked for by Dustin and Martin instead of the one asked for by Abbott, et als. A vote giving leave in accordance therewith passed the Assembly. The locality is still called Martin's Ferry.

The following is a copy of the McGregor and Duncan petition for the exclusive privilege of locking Hooksett Falls, 1794:

"To the Hon^{ble} the Senate and house of Representatives for the State of New Hampshire, convened at Exeter on Wednesday, the 25th of Dec^r, 1794. Humbly shew your petitioners that they conceive the advantages arising from canals opened round the falls of Rivers in a County of such vast extent as ours, and at a great distance from the Seaports, to be almost innumerable, that the enterprise and public spirit of the present age have afforded ample proofs of this and have inspired your petitioners with an intention of commencing a work of such universal utility. That should the River merrimack, as is proposed, be made navigable for boats, timber, &c. from its mouth round Amoskeag Falls, the benevolent intention of the Legislature would be rendered quite useless unless a canal was also cut for that purpose by Isle a hooksett Falls, upon the said river, and above the said Falls of Amoskeag. Your petitioners are sensible that undertaking of this nature is hazardous and expensive, and attended with almost insurmountable difficulties. But that the public may be accommodated with a work of such obvious utility, your petitioners have resolved, with the consent and aid of the legislature, to cut and perfect a canal round the said Isle a hooksett falls with all possible diligence. They therefore pray that this honorable body would grant to them the exclusive privilege of cutting a canal round said Isle a hooksett falls for said convenient purpose of navigating boats, timber, &c., by said falls from its entry an dispatch, and that they would allow them such reasonable toll to compensate their trouble and expence as they think proper, and that they may have leave to bring in a bill accordingly, and, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

"Exeter, January 1st, 1794."

"ROBERT MCGREGOR,

"WILLIAM DUNCAN.

In the House of Representatives, January 4, 1794, the petitioners were granted leave to bring in a bill. Subsequently the privilege asked for was granted, and the same was extended in 1797. This canal, or "locks," as it was sometimes called, was a very important enterprise in those times. It facilitated merchantable traffic between the people above and the country below. They were kept in general use until about 1840, when the railroads commenced to be built into the central part of New Hampshire. Hooksett Falls, since the earliest settlements along the river, have been considered important. They have also been dangerous to boatmen who plied the river in the capacity as common carriers. The channel and ragged rocks through which the water flows was deceitful and very precipitous. About fifteen lives have been lost on these falls. One of the saddest accidents that ever occurred on the falls was about the year 1840. Three children, the oldest about ten years, in the temporary absence of their mother, wandered to the head of the falls, finding an unlocked boat, and while innocently playing in the same, the boat was cast upon the waters and floated into the stream and went over the falls. They were all three lost. These children belonged to Milo L. Whitney, lately deceased. The annual "drive" of logs, which at the present time is not so large, sometimes receives a serious "set back" at these falls. Huge jams have occurred, when it would take weeks to get them off. Quite a number of log-drivers have been killed and drowned while working on them. The descent of the water is about eighteen feet in a distance of thirty rods. They afford excellent facilities for additional manufacturing. Only about two-tenths of the power is at present utilized. The Concord Railroad built, about the year 1868, three spans of bridges over the falls to the east side of the river. This gives to the occupants of the cars a grand, romantic view.

In the year of 1799 an attempt to have the upper end of the town of Chester annexed to Pembroke was made through a petition of Nathaniel Head and others, on account of long distance from church and town business privileges. In 1818 a petition was presented to the legal voters in the north part of Chester and the east part of Dunbarton and Allens-town, but was not acted upon. In the year of 1818, Henry Moulton and thirty others of Dunbarton petitioned the Legislature for a new town. In the year of 1821, Samuel Head and thirty-two others presented a petition; also Nathaniel Head and seventy-two others, inhabitants of Chester, Dunbarton and the easterly part of Godstown. These petitions, so strongly representing the inhabitants of the above locality, were presented to the General Court. The committee on the part of the House reported to postpone action until the next session, and the report was accepted.

It was voted by the House of Representatives, at this session, 1821, "That the petitioners be heard on their petition before the standing committee on incorporations on the first Tuesday of the next session of the Legislature, and that the petitioners cause the selectmen of the towns of Chester, Goffstown and Dunbarton to be notified of the substance of the petition, etc." At the next spring meeting the towns of Dunbarton and Chester voted to grant the favor, and Goffstown voted to remonstrate, by a majority of one hundred and ten legal votes against twenty-two in favor. The selectmen accordingly sent in a remonstrance in long detail. Caleb Austin, Caleb Hershey and Daniel Straw, of Dunbarton, put in a remonstrance. Their principal reason was that the river running through the town would be a great inconvenience, and that it would derange school districts. Hugh J. Taggart and Andrew McIntire, of Goffstown, also sent in a remonstrance, voicing, in the main, the same objections that those from Dunbarton gave. On June 20, 1822, the standing committee on incorporations, after hearing all the parties interested, reported favorably to the project, and that the petitioners have leave to bring in a bill. The following is the copy of the original bill, as passed by the legislature,—

“STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

“In the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two,
 An act to incorporate the town of Hooksett.

“Whereas petitions signed by a number of the inhabitants of Chester, Dunbarton and Goffstown have been presented to the General Court, praying to be incorporated into a separate town, and the prayer thereof appearing reasonable, Therefore, Section 1st. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court convened that all the lands and inhabitants within those parts of the towns of Chester, Dunbarton and Goffstown herein described, to wit: Beginning at the northeasterly corner of Manchester; thence on a straight line to the southeast corner of lot No. 69, in the fourth range of lots in Chester; thence on the easterly line of said lot No. 69 and lots No. 71 and 80, northerly to the southeast corner of lot No. 95; thence across a part of said lot No. 95 and lot No. 94 south, 70 degrees east, to the south head-line of said lot No. 94; thence north, 23 degrees east, to the southwest corner of Candia; thence northerly on Candia line to Allenstown south line; thence westerly on Allenstown to Merrimack river; thence across said river to the southeasterly corner of Bow; thence by Bow line to the southerly corner of said Bow; thence running a line due south until it strikes the northerly line of Goffstown; thence westerly on Goffstown line to the northwest corner of Hugh J. Taggart’s land, thence southerly to the southwest corner of lot No. 4, in Goffstown, formerly owned by Col Robert McGregor; thence easterly on the southerly line of said lot No. 4, and continuing the same course, until it strikes the highway leading from Samuel Poor’s to Merrimack river; thence by said highway, and including the same, to said river; thence by said river to the northwest corner of Manchester; and thence to the place of beginning, he and the same hereby are incorporated into a town by the name of Hooksett, and the inhabitants who now reside, or hereafter may reside, within the aforesaid boundaries are made and constituted a body politic and corporate, and vested with all the powers, privileges and immunities which other towns in this State are entitled to enjoy, to remain a distinct town and have continuance and succession forever.

“Section 2d. And be it further enacted that all names that are assessed for schools in the towns of Chester, Dunbarton and Goffstown shall be divided between the said towns and the several parts of the said town of Hooksett, disannexed from said towns, according to their proportion of the public taxes, and all funds belonging to said towns of Chester, Dunbarton and Goffstown shall be in like manner divided, reserving to said town of Goffstown the donation given by James Allen to said Goffstown, and the inhabitants of the town of Hooksett shall pay as all taxes now assessed on them by the towns of Chester, Dunbarton and Goffstown respectively, and the said town of Hooksett shall, after the next annual meeting, support all the present poor, including all those who are supported in whole or in part by said towns, and the inhabitants of the towns of Chester, Dunbarton and Goffstown, by whom the tax paid on either of said towns that is now included in the towns of Hooksett, and shall support any poor now residing in said towns, whether such persons are the towns of Chester, Dunbarton and Goffstown or persons residing in the towns of Chester, Dunbarton and Goffstown, and be liable to relieve or support that have come to settle in either of said towns by residing within the boundaries now constituted, in 1822, of Hooksett, provided, nevertheless, that this act shall not affect the interest of any of the inhabitants of Chester, Dunbarton and Goffstown, or of the town of Hooksett, in any school-house now erected within the same.

“Section 3d. And be it further enacted that Samuel Head, of Chester, and William Hall, of Dunbarton, or either of them, be empowered to call a meeting of the inhabitants of the said town of Hooksett for the purpose of choosing all necessary town officers, to continue in office until the annual meeting of said town in March next, and either of them may preside in said meeting until a moderator shall be chosen to govern in the same, which meeting shall be held on some time in the month of September next, and shall be warned by posting up a notification fifteen days prior to the time of holding the same at Nathaniel Head’s house, in Chester, at William Hall’s house, in Dunbarton, and at David Abbott’s house, in Goffstown, provided that all town officers residing within the limits of the town of Hooksett, who were chosen by the town of Chester, Dunbarton or Goffstown, shall continue in their respective offices during the time for which they were elected, with full powers to execute the same, and provided, further, that all the public taxes which the towns of Chester, Dunbarton and Goffstown shall or may be compelled to assess before a new act for proportioning the public taxes among the several towns in the state shall pass, may be assessed, levied and collected by the proper officers of the said towns of Chester, Dunbarton and Goffstown upon the inhabitants of the town of Hooksett in case the selectmen of said Hooksett neglect to assess, levy and collect their proportion of such public taxes and pay the same seasonably into the treasurers of the towns of Chester, Dunbarton and Goffstown in the same way and manner as if the act had not passed, anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding.

“Section 4th. And be it further enacted that said town of Hooksett shall be, and hereby is, annexed to and considered a part of the county of Hillsborough, and that said town be annexed to Sanabato district number three and to the eleventh Regiment of Militia in this State.

“STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

“In the House of Representatives June 25th, 1822. This bill, having had three several readings, passed to be enacted. Sent up for concurrence.

“CHARLES WOODMAN, Speaker.

“In Senate, Je. 29, 1822. The foregoing bill was brought up, read a third time and enacted.

“JONATHAN HARVEY, President.

“July 24, 1822, Approved.

“SAMUEL BELL.

“A true copy. Attest.

“SAMUEL SPURDICK, Secretary.”

The following is a copy of the petition and a list of the signers.

“To the Hon. the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of New Hampshire, in General Court convened, Humbly shew—
 The petition of the undersigned that they are inhabitants of the north-westerly part of the town of Chester, in the County of Rockingham and the easterly part of Dunbarton, and the easterly part of Goffstown, in the County of Hillsborough, that their places of residence are at the distances of from ten to sixteen miles from the places established for the transaction of town business and for holding public worship in said towns. By reason whereof they are in a measure deprived of the common rights and privileges enjoyed generally by the good citizens of this State. They therefore pray the Legislature, in their goodness, to relieve them of the inconveniences to which they are now subjected by granting an act incorporating all the lands and inhabitants of said Chester, Dunbarton and Goffstown hereafter described to wit: Beginning, northerly and northwesterly of a line drawn from the northeasterly corner of Manchester, in the County of Hillsborough, across said Chester, in such course as may be thought most proper, to the southeasterly corner of the town of Candia; thence by Candia line to Allenstown line; thence by Allenstown line to Merrimack river; thence across the Merrimack river to the southeasterly corner of Bow; thence by Bow line to the southerly corner of said Bow; thence running a line due south until it strikes Goffstown line, thence through Goffstown south-easterly hill it strikes Merrimack river opposite the northwesterly corner of the town of Manchester; thence from the northwesterly corner of the town of Manchester to the bounds first mentioned, into a town, with all the powers, privileges and immunities to which other towns in this state are by law entitled, and to be annexed to the County of Hillsborough, and as an duty bound, will ever pray.

We see, by producing the names of the signers of the above petition, who the principal residents were at the time the town was incorporated. It contained all the principal real estate owners, with the exception of a few living in these parts who would not be directly benefited. In the southeast part of the town a few inhabitants were indifferent to the matter, as they were, perhaps, as near Chester proper as they would be at Hooksett village. Hooksett village, as originally located, was almost to the extreme limit in the northwest part of the town, which, fortunately, accommodated the major part of the population, and since the formation of the town, people in the remote sections have quite a distance to travel to do town business. For post-office accommodations and commercial transactions the people living contiguous to Manchester patronize that city. In the year of 1823 the following persons, residents in town, were assessed for taxes. It was the first inventory taken, and will show the complete family record in the whole town at that time,—

CIVIL HISTORY.

1822.—The first meeting of the legal voters qualified to vote was held on the 16th day of September, 1822, at the house of William Wall. "Chose Hon. Richard H. Ayer, moderator; Gideon Flanders, town clerk; chose Hon. Richard H. Ayer, Samuel Head and Samuel Poor, selectmen; chose Captain Daniel Sawyer, Colonel John Head, Captain John Prescott, constables; chose Abraham Mitchell, John Clay, hog reeds; chose Josiah McGoon, Roger Dutton, surveyors of lumber; chose Jacob T. Wallace, John Bagley, cutters of staves; chose John Whipple, Robert Davis and Nathaniel Mitchell, school committee; chose Robert Brown, treasurer."

1823.—The first annual meeting was held at the house of Samuel Head, March 11, 1823. Elected Hon. Richard H. Ayer, moderator; Gideon Flanders, clerk; for Governor: Samuel Dunsmore, 73; Levi Woodbury, 67; Hon. Richard H. Ayer, representative; Richard H. Ayer, Captain Daniel Sawyer, Samuel Poor, selectmen; Samuel Head, treasurer; Dr. Samuel Hoston, collector of taxes; Gideon Flanders, Dr. Samuel Hoston, William Hall, school committee. "Voted, that two days' labor be raised on a single Poll and other property in proportion for a highway tax, one-half of which to be worked out in the winter." "Voted, to accept the road laid out by the Selectmen from the South end of Hooksett Bridge to the highway that leads from James Otterson land to the saw-mill on Hooksett Falls." "Voted, that the Barn-Yards of Jacob M. Farnum and Richard H. Ayer be considered as Pounds." Jacob M. Farnum and Roger Dutton were appointed pound-keepers.

1824.—Richard H. Ayer, moderator; John Head, clerk; for Governor David L. Morrill, 71; Levi Woodbury, 36; Samuel Head, representative; Richard H. Ayer, Daniel Sawyer, Samuel Poor, selectmen; Samuel Head, treasurer.

1826.—Richard H. Ayer, moderator; John Head, clerk; R. H. Ayer, Thomas R. Taggart, Jonathan Davis, selectmen; for Governor Benjamin Peirce, 86; David L. Morrill, 53; Dr. Asa Sawyer, representative; Samuel Head, Thomas R. Taggart, Asa Sawyer, school committee Joseph Mitchell, tax collector.

Morrill, 5; Dr. Asa Sawyer, representative; Samuel Head, treasurer; Isaac C. Otterson, tax collector; Hiram Brown, Asa Sawyer, Thomas R. Taggart, school committee. "Voted, to lay the public funds in building a Town-house, and that the Selectmen receive proposals for land to erect said house on and by the same before the Town at the adjournment of this meeting that may adopt the best place to locate the same." At the adjourned meeting, April 2, 1827, the Boston and Concord Boating Company's store-house, it was voted locate the grounds on the west side of the river. The vote stood 74 favor, 47 against. Henry Moulton, Samuel Head and Samuel Poor were chosen committee to build the town-house, of brick, fifty feet long, and they were authorized and empowered to collect all the public money due the town to defray the expense of said building, and the said committee be authorized to cut wood on any land belonging to the town to burn brick for said house. On the 15th of September meeting was held to see if the town would reconsider the previous vote relative to the location of the town-house, and see if the town would locate on a piece of land, to be given by Nathaniel Head to the town, near the south end of the Hooksett bridge. It was voted not to reconsider. It was voted that the committee should build a town-house not less than forty feet wide, nor less than fifty feet long. Samuel Head was excused from being one of the committee and Asa Sawyer was elected in his place.

HOOKSETT—(Continued).

ECCLESIASTICAL.

The Congregational Church was the first established society in town, but Methodism was probably preached by itinerant ministers at as early a date. Early in the history of the first settlers of our locality church privileges were enjoyed only by traveling a long distance to Chester, Dunbarton or Pembroke. As early as 1770, Samuel Martin, Daniel Martin, John Martin, Caleb Dalton and Daniel Foster had their parish rates given in on account of living so far from the meeting-house. This was an important reason, prior to the formation of the town, for its incorporation. Rev. Joseph A. E. Long first ministered to the people of Hooksett in the year 1824. He held meetings in different places in town, at periods up to the year 1828. He then being called very eloquent, and in the capacity of an evangelist, was instrumental in forming a sentiment to organize a Congregational Society. So, accordingly, on January 22, 1828, an organization was perfected. The following proceedings occurred at the council:

"HOOKSETT, Jan. 22, 1828.

"At an Ecclesiastical Council, convened by virtue of letters from several individuals in Hooksett for the purpose of taking into consideration the expediency of organizing a church of the Congregational order in this place.

"Present: Rev. Abraham Burnham, Josiah Kittredge, delegates from church in Pembroke; Rev. Roger C. Hatch, from church in Hopkinton; Rev. William R. Tallbot, Elder Foster Towns, from church in Nottingham West; Rev. Nathaniel Bolton, Rev. Nathaniel Abbott, from church in Concord; Rev. Henry Wood, Elder Jonathan Aiken, from church in Goffstown.

"The Council was organized by choosing Rev. A. Burnham, Moderator; Rev. N. Bolton, Scribe. The meeting of the Council opened with prayer by the moderator. Attended to communications from the individuals who are candidates for church membership. Roger Talbot presented a letter of dismission and recommendation from the church in Wold, Maine. Miss Zebiah and Miss Melchitee Hery presented a letter of dismission and recommendation from the church in Dunbarton. Sarah Head and Mary Otterson communicated their Christian experience in writing. Susan Moulton expressed the reasons of her hope in Christ and Arna Mitchell did the same. Whereupon, 'Voted, unanimously, that it is expedient to embody the above individuals into a church of Christ."

Agreeably to the foregoing vote, the above-named individuals were acknowledged as a regularly constituted Church of Christ in connection with the following exercises. Hymns were sung and prayer offered by the Rev. Mr. Hatch. Sermon preached by Rev. Mr. Bouton from Acts ii. 47. Confession of faith and covenant administered by Rev. Mr. Burnham; the fellowship of the church expressed by him. The Rev. Mr. Talbot offered the concluding prayer. "Voted, that the council be dissolved." It was voted by the above council that J. A. E. Long act as moderator of the church. The following members composed the church at its organization who subscribed to the Articles of Faith and Covenant: Roger Dutton, Susan Moulton, Sarah Head, Zebiah Hersey, M. Hersey, Mary Otterson, Arria Mitchell, Mrs. Poor, all of whom have since deceased. The following have since been admitted:

1828.—Feb. 13, Nancy Towns by profession; Feb. 17, Rachel Dutton and Rebecca Hatchelder by profession; Feb. 23, Mary Sawyer by profession; Mar. 29, Hugh Taggart, Elizabeth Taggart, by letter; June 21, Joanna Saltmarsh, Sally Sawyer, by letter; Aug. 30, Rosanna Whittier, Phoebe Hawes, and Eunice Kimball by letter; Oct. 25, M. All the above is a complete record, as far as can be ascertained, of the membership of the Congregational Church since its formation. Of the clergymen who have ministered to the church a full account cannot be given. Sometimes, at periods intervening between the resignations and ordinations of different pastors, the pulpit was supplied for a year or less by clergymen of whom there is no record. The first clergyman was the Rev. J. A. E. Long. He was born in Amesbury, Mass., and was a son of Nathan Long. He graduated at Harvard College in 1818, and afterwards at the Cambridge Divinity School; was ordained as an evangelist in Kensington, N. H., in April, 1822. After preaching a year he removed and labored as an evangelist in different places, and quite successfully in Hooksett a few years prior to the formation of the Congregational Church, when he was accepted as a settled preacher. He was in Lyman, Me., in 1836, and afterwards labored a short time in Kensington. He afterwards settled in Hooksett, and for a number of years was a conspicuous person, known as "Priest Long." Many people living can relate pleasing anecdotes of his suave temperament, polished manner and somewhat eccentric habits. He died suddenly in 1859, leaving a wife, son and daughter. His widow is now living at the age of eighty-seven, in Chelsea, Mass. Mr. Long was succeeded by Rev. Charles Boyter. Mr. Boyter was a missionary and was first installed at Springfield, N. H., in June, 1828. After preaching there two years, he preached at different parts until his location in Hooksett, in 1833, where he labored until 1835. He afterwards preached in Acworth, N. H. April 30, 1835, Rev. Humphrey

Moore was ordained as pastor, and acted until 1836. He afterwards preached in Merrimack, Amherst, Greenfield. He was succeeded by Rev. W. C. Greenleaf, in 1837, and he, in 1838, by Rev. S. E. Jewett, who preached an indefinite period with some other clergymen of whom no record is made. On the last Sabbath of February, 1846, Rev. James W. Perkins commenced his labors. August 30, 1846, the present house of worship was dedicated. It was erected this year by contributions, the largest contributors being Samuel Head and wife. The Rev. Mr. Perkins labored until 1848. He preached in Francestown in 1844; in Alstead, 1846; Hillsborough in 1852, where his health gave out June 16, 1852.

Rev. John Lawrence became pastor in 1848. He ministered to the people until 1850. Mr. Lawrence is still living at an old age in Cambridge, Mass. On December 5, 1850, Rev. J. W. Tarlton was ordained. Mr. Tarlton was a son of William and Comfort (Wallace) Tarlton; was born in Epsom, N. H., February 19, 1817; prepared for college at Homer, N. Y.; graduated at Dartmouth College, 1842; teacher in Boston 1842-44; student at Yale Theological Seminary two years and Andover Theological School one year. He was without charge at Boston, Mass., 1855-68, and Watertown, Mass., from 1868 till death. Sometimes engaged in evangelistic labors, and acting pastor at North Chelsea (Revere), two years. Married, February 3, 1854, Betsey Dutton, daughter of Deacon Roger and Rachel (Sawyer) Dutton, of Hooksett, N. H. Died in Watertown, of congestion of the liver and lungs, February 27, 1883, aged sixty-six years. Rev. William Forbes was ordained November 8, 1855, and was supported until May 2, 1857, when he sent in his resignation, but continued to serve until December 23, 1858, when he was dismissed. He afterwards preached in Deerfield. Mr. Forbes was succeeded by the Rev. E. H. Caswell, who occupied the pulpit one year, until May 31, 1860, when he ceased his labors. On July 8, 1860, Rev. Marvin Leflingwell commenced to supply the pulpit; after preaching two years Sabbaths, was engaged for one year. Mr. Leflingwell preached until the year 1865. During this time he strongly advocated the cause of the Union in the pulpit and out. He was succeeded by Rev. A. Burnham, who performed the duties of pastor from July 16, 1865, until March 31, 1872. Mr. Burnham was a devoted Christian, a thorough scholar, and his memory is indelibly imprinted on the minds of many who live in Hooksett. He died a few years ago in West Stewartstown, N. H. The church was supplied by different preachers until the year 1873, when the Methodist and Congregational Churches were united. This departure was followed by an era of great success, when church matters and attendance were greatly enhanced. The Congregationalist members earnestly acquiesced in supporting Methodist preachers. The Rev. J. E. Robbins was the first pastor under the new order of things, he serving until 1876 with great success. Mr. Robbins has preached in Plymouth, Lebanon and Portsmouth since, and is now presiding elder in the Claremont District. The next was Rev. B. W. Chase (Methodist), who served one year, afterwards preaching in Sunapee and the West. Mr. Chase was succeeded by Rev. S. G. Kellogg (Methodist), three years. Rev. Mr. Kellogg is a distinguished minister, has been presiding elder, and since has preached in Marlow three years, and is now at Sunapee, N. H. The next call was made to Rev. Charles H. Taintor (Congregationalist). Mr. Taintor preached in Wearse, N. H., one year, before locating in Hooksett, and prior to that period was an evangelist. Mr. Taintor's administration, from 1880 to 1882, was a fruitful one. He labored with much zeal and earnestness. The records show more accessions of new members by profession than under any administration of his predecessors. His estimable wife was an earnest colaborer in the cause. Mr. Taintor, after deliberate consideration was very pronounced and earnest, and he did much towards shaping and perfecting the affairs and records of the Congregational Church. Mr. Taintor was called to Milford, N. H., where he labored with his usual success for two years. He is now secretary of the Congregational Church Building Society in the West, with headquarters at Chicago. Mr. Taintor was succeeded by Rev. J. C. Rollins, who commenced to supply the pulpit in November, 1882. He was previously located in Webster two years, supplying the Methodist Episcopal Church. In June, 1883, he received a call from the Union Church to settle with them as their pastor, being ordained and installed June 27, 1883. Rev. C. W. Wallace, D.D., preached the sermon. In the words of one of the council, "the examination was more than satisfactory." During Mr. Rollins' term the church was remodeled inside and out at an expense of about fifteen hundred dollars, and before the close of his work every cent of debt of church, society and Sunday-school was paid in full. Mr. Rollins was called to the pastorate of the Milford Church December, 1884, and was installed February 27, 1885. Mr. Rollins' service in Hooksett was successful, displaying rare talent as a preacher of power and worth. His ministrations in Milford are successful, and large congregations assemble to hear his brilliant pleadings. Since the building of the church numerous improvements have been made. A bell was given the church in the year 1852 by a number of contributors. In the year 1879, Deacon Hiram Austin, Martin L. Otterson and Frank C. Towle were appointed trustees to receive a legacy of five hundred dollars bequeathed to the church by Mary Young. In the year 1882, Jabez Green presented a deed to the society of the parsonage lot and building, valued at about fifteen hundred dollars; also, Mrs. Jabez Green, the same year, donated a silver communion service, costing seventy-five dollars. These monuments of philanthropy speak praises to the noble benefactors, who are still living at this time. The following deacons have served the church: Roger Dutton, Hugh Taggart, Luther Shedd, Hiram Austin, Martin L. Otterson.

Methodist Church.—The earliest recollection of Methodist preaching was between the years 1820-30. An Orthodox sentiment had been established before any organization took place in the Methodist creed. Methodism, with its customs and forms of worship, in the olden times, was somewhat generally ridiculed by believers in Orthodoxy and Presbyterianism. A healthy sentiment had generally become aroused in the Methodist faith, and a large society was organized. The first preaching that was regularly sustained was held in the brick building now owned by George A. Colby. It was then owned by Hall & Rowe. Afterwards meetings were held in the hall of the old tavern-stand, now the residence of Widow Walter B. Jones. After the town-house was built, in 1828, the inside was fitted with pews, and a great many came into possession of members of the Methodist Society. As there was no accessible record, a complete history of the society cannot be given. In the year 1831, Rev. Orlando Hinds was the pastor. In the year 1832, Rev. Nahum Howe supplied the church. Again, in the year 1835, Rev. Mr. Hinds supplied the pulpit. The church was for a number of years supplied from the Methodist Episcopal College at Concord. In the year 1856 there was a great religious revival, conducted by a man by the name of Fox. Many accessions to the church membership took place during this period. In the early history of the church Rev. James Pike supplied the pulpit for two years. While he acted as pastor a camp-meeting was held in the woods formerly standing on the farm of the late Thomas N. Head. It was an important event at that time. In the records, of which there are only some fragments to be found, the names of the following persons as "members of the board" appear: Alvah Colby, George Davis, Nathaniel Mitchel, C. H. Wheeler, J. R. Hall, Simeon Batehelder, Sumner Ordway, Josiah Prescott. In 1857, Joseph Scott and Gilbert H. Winans supplied the church with forty-three members. In 1858, preacher in charge, Rev. Truman Caster; membership, sixty-three. In 1860, Rev. Charles H. Vinton, pastor; membership, sixty-seven. In 1862, Rev. C. R. Haman, pastor; membership, fifty-four. In 1863, Rev. Jos. T. Hand, pastor; in 1864, S. Donaldson, pastor; in 1870-71, Rev. H. H. Hartwell, pastor; in 1872-73, Rev. C. W. Taylor, pastor. In the year 1873 the Methodists joined with the Congregationalists and formed a Union Society. On May 18, 1885, Rev. N. M. Learned, late of Los Angeles, Cal. (Methodist), was engaged to supply the Union Church in Hooksett for one year. He is now the acting pastor, and has met with a kind reception.

Universalist Society.—There was no regular organized society of the Universalists until the year 1858. There were meetings held previously, and such noted clergymen as Rev. Silvanus Cobb and Rev.

Philip Brooks have preached here in earlier days. The first regular settled pastor was the Rev. Samuel Thompson. He was a native of Nova Scotia, and was a preacher of ability. He resided in town until 1863. The meetings were held in the company's hall. The composition of the society embraced many of the best people in town. Mr. Thompson had two sons, who enlisted in the War of the Rebellion, and were credited to this town. There are many residents who are firm believers in the Universalist creed, but worship with other sectarian denominations.

Adventism.—The Advent doctrine has been preached in town about thirty years. In the year 1858 there were a few people in town who prepared for the second coming of Christ. There is no organized society, but preaching has been held publicly in halls, school-houses and groves in different sections of the town. Many remember the local exponents of this doctrine in the persons of Enoch Holt and wife, Orlando Marshall and wife, and, at the present time, Daniel C. Elliott and others. The Bible is their study, and passage after passage can be repeated by the followers of this religious belief.

Catholic.—There is no Catholic Church in town, but there is an estimated population of over six hundred who are followers of this faith. About two miles from Hooksett village is a Catholic Church. It is in the limits of Allenstown, more properly called (South Side) Smecock. In the erection of this church, the expense was approximately borne by the Catholic people in this town. Since the establishment of this church the moral standard has improved, and the whole community is more law-abiding.

Physicians.—The first regular doctor who resided within our boundaries before the formation of the town was Dr. John Dustin, who lived at Martin's Ferry in 1775. His widow lived there in 1818. He was a physician of some note, and traveled considerably to find patients. The next of whom there is any record was Dr. Samuel Huston. He located some time before the town was incorporated, about the year 1817. He had an office in the house of Hon. Richard H. Ayer, and lived in his family. He continued to practice, with great success, until 1824. After the town was incorporated, in 1822, there arose two political factions in the dominant party, called the Ayer and Hall factions. Dr. Huston was an active supporter of Ayer, but through some family trouble he left the house of Ayer and went to William Hall's to live. In the mean time he supported Hall. This bitterness of feeling was carried into politics with much earnestness, which created family feuds. Scandalous reports were soon circulated about an irregular intimacy between Huston and Hall's wife. One morning the fire of the Hall family became extinguished, and as it was the custom in those days to borrow fire, a member went to the house of Henry Moulton to procure the same. A feeling of hatred existed previously between the families. A nephew, whose name was Moulton, who was a blacksmith, accosted the borrower of the fire with the insinuation that Dr. Huston was paying too many attentions to Mr. Hall's wife. This was immediately reported to the Hall family. Soon afterwards William Hall, Dr. Huston and Samuel Roach and other members of the family repaired to the Moulton blacksmith-shop, armed with hoop-poles, to castigate him for circulating such stories. A bloody fight ensued, when more than a dozen men became involved. No lives were lost, but some serious flesh-wounds were made. The result of this fight ended with a complicated lawsuit between the Moultons and Halls. The Halls were embarrassed financially by this litigation, and quietly, in the year 1821, the Halls, Dr. Huston and Samuel Roach disappeared, and were not heard from afterwards. It is supposed that they emigrated to Ohio. This ended the most noted family fight that has ever occurred in Hooksett. Dr. Samuel Huston was called a skillful physician, with a fine physique, affable in manner, and in the prime of manhood when living in town at that time. The next regular physician was Dr. Asa Sawyer. He was born in Sandown, N. H., and educated at the Atkinson Academy, and studied medicine with Dr. Amos Gale, of Kingston. He commenced to practice in Hillsburg, Pa. He practiced there fifteen years, selling out his practice, and came to Hooksett with a competence, and bought the McConnell farm in Bow, on the River road, afterwards purchasing the Hall land in Hooksett. He afterwards purchased the Merrill place, in Pembroke, where he moved to educate his children. He went into business in Pittsfield a short time. He then moved to Keysville, N. Y., where he was engaged in the brewery business, when he died about the year 1859. Dr. Enoch B. Barnes practiced in Hooksett until the year 1834. He was a successful practitioner. Dr. Barnes, like Dr. Sawyer, was a public-spirited man. He held many offices in the gift of the town. He married a daughter of Hon. Richard H. Ayer. A complete sketch could not be made, as information regarding him could not easily be collected. Dr. A. B. Story practiced after Dr. Gale, in the years 1846-66, and was succeeded by Dr. Horace Gage.

Dr. Amos G. Gale was the next established doctor. He was a son of Dr. Amos Gale, of Kingston, and was born in that town February 17, 1807. He was a grandson of Dr. Josiah Bartlett, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence and one of the earliest Governors of New Hampshire after the adoption of the State Constitution. His grandfather on his paternal side was also a physician. For over one hundred years his ancestors were connected with the medical profession, and each of his four brothers were practitioners. The subject of this notice studied medicine with his brother, Dr. Ezra Gale, of Kingston, and Dr. Levi B. Gale, of Boston, and took the degree of M.D. at the medical school connected with Dartmouth College. He commenced practice in Hooksett in 1833 and remained here until 1845.

During his residence in town he married Mary Greene Ayer, a daughter of Hon. Richard H. Ayer. He removed to Manchester about the year 1846, where he was in active practice until his death. Dr. Gale while in Hooksett was beloved by all, was interested in town affairs, was postmaster from 1833 to 1845, and was actively engaged in business with Mr. Ayer. The following appeared in the Daily American on January 25, 1861:

"As a physician, Dr. Gale was among the highest in rank, and was a very successful practitioner. As a man and a citizen, he was upright in all his dealings, and in all his intercourse with others he was remarkably simple in his manners and courteous to all, whatever might be their rank in life. He was always ready to respond to all reasonable demands upon his generosity, and took a lively interest in the prosperity and reputation of the city. In politics he was a Democrat; though liberal in his views and feelings in regard to the abstract ideas of human rights, he was conservative in his opinions relating to questions of public policy. During the last few years of his life his mind was much occupied with matters pertaining to religion, and though he was surrounded with everything which could minister to his personal enjoyment, nothing delighted him so much as to confer with his friends in regard to the nature of the soul and to trace the operations of the Divine law. Though his opinions upon these subjects were not the most popular, they, in no considerations whatever, could deter him from making a candid avowal of his convictions. He never wished to be esteemed beyond his merits, nor sought for the public applause. Now that he is gone, it is but justice to say that our city has lost one of its most worthy citizens, and the poor and unfortunate a loss to be sorely mourned."

Horace Gage, M.D., succeeded Dr. Gale about the year 1845. He was born in Hopkinton, N. H., February 14, 1811. He was left an orphan at the early age of four years. He was bound out to farming a few years and then learned the wheelwright trade. He worked at this business a while in Lowell, Mass., then went on a voyage to the South; was on a whale-ship. He had then a good common-school education, but on his return from sea spent two years at the Hopkinton Academy and in teaching school. In 1835 he commenced the study of medicine; attended a course of lectures at the Berkshire Medical College; also, in 1837, attended a course at the Cincinnati Medical College, and was in the hospitals in that city one year. He afterwards returned to Berkshire College and took another course of lectures and graduated in 1838. He then commenced to practice in Wilmot, N. H.; afterwards settled in East Wear. He settled in Hooksett in the year 1845, where he remained until his death, in the year 1875. He married Miss Louise Putney, of Dumbarton, by whom he had one son, Horace P. Gage, now living. Dr. Gage was all his life a close student, and at the time of his death there were few better read medical men in the State. He was a sympathetic man, industrious, in politics a strong Democrat, and acquired a large practice, leaving a snug little fortune. During Dr. Gage's residence in town a number of physicians located for the purpose of business, but their stay was transient.

On April 7, 1872, Dr. Alvah M. Dam opened an office in town. He was born at Springvale, Me., on February 19, 1851. Graduated at the University of New York (Medical Department) February 21, 1872.

He continued here until the fall of 1873. He was a native of Maine, and a young man of ability. He moved from here to Suncook, where he gained a wide reputation as a temperance orator and agitator. He is now in business in Boston as manager of a medicine company. Ira H. Adams, M.D., bought out the practice of Dr. Dam, and commenced to practice in Hooksett November 17, 1874. He was born in Pomfret, Windsor County, Vt., August 10, 1846; attended the common schools; took a course of study at the State Normal School, Randolph, Vt.; was licensed to teach in that State, and followed the business five years. He again entered school, as a pupil, at Kimball Union Academy, where he graduated in the class of 1872. He studied medicine with Hubert Sleeper, M.D., of Meriden, N. H.; also at the Dartmouth Medical College, from which he graduated in November, 1874. He immediately commenced to practice in Hooksett, where he remained until March 15, 1882, when he moved to Derry Depot, N. H., where he is still in active practice. August 31, 1875, he was married to Louise S. Perley, of Lemper, N. H. They have two children born to them. Dr. Adams was public-spirited, took an interest in public schools and was a valuable man in the community. He has a large practice in Derry. Dr. Adams was succeeded by Francis D. Randall, M.D. Dr. Randall was a native of Deerfield, and was educated at the Penbrooke and New Hampton Academies. He read medicine with Dr. E. S. Berry, of Candia, and graduated from the Burlington Medical College in 1880. He practiced in Deerfield one year, and located in Hooksett in March, 1882. He is considered a skillful physician, and promises to rank high in the medical fraternity. He married Fannie Prescott, of Deerfield.

Schools.—Schools were supported as early as the exigencies of the times demanded. Long before the incorporation of the town, Chester amply supplied the inhabitants within her jurisdiction with school privileges. The early settlers in New England, as long back as November 11, 1647, enacted laws in the interest of schooling. In the year 1759 £10.00 was allowed for the expenses of a school in what is now District No. 1, in the selectmen's accounts of the town of Chester. This was probably the first school established in our locality. In 1770, Joseph Brown was paid £10 10s. for services as school teacher for what is now Hooksett (formerly Chester). In the year 1805 an act was passed authorizing towns to divide into school districts. In the town of Chester (in that part now Hooksett) Districts No. 18, 19 and 21 composed the districts that make now Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 in Hooksett. The first school-house built in No. 1 was probably erected in the year 1805, and was burned in 1808. A tax was assessed of two hundred and fifteen dollars, and the house was rebuilt in 1808. This building was burned in 1839, and a good brick one was built in its place, costing five hundred dollars. About the year 1845 the Factory District was made from No. 1, and a house built in 1848, costing over five hundred dollars. This district was called No. 7. In 1858 another district was made from No. 1, called No. 9, and a house built at a cost of six hundred dollars. In the year 1872, Nos. 7, 9 and 5 were united, and a school building erected at a cost of seven thousand dollars. This includes the whole of Hooksett village. The old buildings were sold at auction, and afterwards fitted into private houses. The original school-house of No. 1 was torn down and a new one erected near the Hooksett Cemetery. The first house in No. 2 was built in the year 1808 at a cost of one hundred and eight dollars. Before that time there was a log school-house near Martin's Ferry that accommodated that part of Chester. In this district at the present time there is a convenient new building recently erected at a cost of about fifteen hundred dollars. In No. 3 a house was built in 1821. There have been two buildings burned in this district. At the present time a convenient house exists. On the west side of the river, near Hooksett Falls, the first school was kept in private buildings. There was a school kept in the old "Locks" house a number of years. The family of Joshua Abbott, the first settler near the falls, had to travel by foot-path through the woods into the town of Bow for school privileges. After the town was incorporated, Joseph Wilkins, of Suncook, deeded a piece of land for a school-house lot and a building was erected. This district was afterwards consolidated with Nos. 7 and 9, and formed the Village Districts, Nos. 5, 6 and 7, which now constitute the remaining districts of the town, have commodious buildings. This territory was formerly Dualarton and Goffstown. The estimated value of the school-houses and lots in town is thirteen thousand five hundred dollars; the number of scholars, two hundred and fifty; and about sixteen hundred dollars is appropriated annually for expenses. The larger portion of the school population in the village is made up of French extraction. They are constantly transient in a place, utilizing all their family quota in the employ of factories, and thus evading the statutes in regard to attending schools.

War of the Rebellion.—The following is a list of soldiers who were mustered into the service during the late Rebellion from Hooksett:

- George H. Clay, Company B, Second New Hampshire Regiment, mustered in June 1, 1861; discharged July 15, 1862.
 Bradley Clay, Company D, Second New Hampshire Regiment, mustered in June 1, 1861; died of disease October 6, 1861.

Of the families in Hooksett, concerning which a war record can be produced, is the Poor family. Samuel Poor was born in Rowley, Mass., December 13, 1758, when that part of the town was called New Rowley, and in 1838 incorporated with the name of Georgetown. He was a brave Revolutionary soldier, and served with General Gates at Saratoga, N. Y., October 17, 1777, when they took General Burgoyne. He settled in what was originally Godstown, and his farm was in the southwesterly part of the town, made, in 1822, from a portion of Dunbarton, Godstown and ancient Chester, and called by the name of Hooksett. He married, October 21, 1781, Anna Bridges, of Rowley, born February 1, 1762; they lived together a long time. He died August 21, 1811. She survived him until she reached ninety one years, dying April 21, 1853. Mr. Poor was a good citizen with sound judgment, and honored with being called to hold office in the management of town affairs. Eri, son of Samuel Poor, was born November 21, 1800; married, April 14, 1825, Susan Siltmarsh, of Godstown. He died January 28, 1874; she in 1879. He was county commissioner three years, and held all the important offices in town. Of his large family of children, he had two sons in the war of the Rebellion. Samuel Poor enlisted in Company H, Second Regiment, New Hampshire Volunteers. He died in the Andersonville prison. At the battle of Bull Run was not wounded, although a man was shot down on each side of him and two bullets passed through his clothes.

Eri Poor, enlisted in Company A, Seventh Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteers, June 14, 1862. Only five men of his company of one hundred and one came home, and he was one of those five. He was in the army four years, and was always on duty there, excepting when he received a thirty days' furlough to come home and visit his family; participated in all the battles of the Seventh Regiment; was a bold soldier, and took the rebel flag at Fort Fisher; was commissioned corporal, and advanced step by step to first lieutenant before he left the service. Governor Natt. Head, before and since the Rebellion, has employed him for his brick burner. (See Poor genealogy.)

Among other families in town with an old war record are the Otterson and Head families (see adjutant-general's report). In the late Rebellion William H. Otterson served in the Tenth New Hampshire Volunteers, and was a good soldier. George H. L. Head rose to the rank of captain, being a brave officer.

In the Wars of the Revolution and of 1812 the true character and history of the participants can only be found in the records concerning the towns from which Hooksett was made. Many residents who live at this time can recall the names of ancestors who took part in those struggles. In the year 1840 pensioners were living in Hooksett as follows: Ebenezer Carrier, aged seventy-seven years, living at home; James Otterson, aged eighty-three; Alice Mitchell, aged seventy-one, living with Joseph Mitchell; Samuel Poor, eighty-two years old; Anna Abbott, aged seventy-three years. Carrier was a son of Thomas Carrier and Sarah Coburn, married a Dresser for first wife, and for second wife Nancy, widow of Eben Blaisdell. James Otterson married Mary Chase, of Sutton; died December 22, 1846, aged eighty-nine; his wife died in 1845, aged eighty-three. He was a soldier in Rhode Island, 1778.

Hooksett responded promptly to the calls for troops during the Rebellion, and furnished nearly one hundred and thirty men. The spirit of true patriotism early in war was the incentive for scores to enlist without any inducements of large bounties. The impulse stirred all alike, and representatives of families of both political parties who were the social and material leaders in forming local history, went to the war. The town was liberal throughout the whole war in providing town aid to soldiers' families and in voting bounties. On August 6, 1862, "Voted that the selectmen be authorized to pay one hundred dollars to each volunteer." On September 26, 1863, "Voted to pay each drafted man or his substitute the sum of three hundred dollars." On December 22, 1863, "Voted to have fifty-six hundred and twenty-eight dollars to pay for our quota of men." "Voted that the selectmen be authorized to pay the recruiting officer four hundred dollars apiece for each man recruited." On the 6th day of August, 1864, "Voted that the selectmen be authorized to hire sixteen thousand dollars to fill the quota under the call of the President for five hundred thousand volunteers, made July 18, 1864." "Voted that the selectmen be authorized to fill the quota and act as agents;" also "Voted that T. B. Wattle and Jesse Gault act with them." On September 1, 1864, "Voted to pay our citizens who may enlist five hundred dollars for one year, six hundred for two years and seven hundred dollars for three years." On December 28, 1864, "Voted that the town furnish volunteer substitutes for any call that may be made upon said town for troops." "Voted, that the town pay one hundred dollars for one year, two hundred dollars for two years, three hundred dollars for three years." "Voted to pay any inhabitant of said town who shall furnish a representative substitute three hundred dollars." On March 11, 1865, "Voted to pay Chase Wentworth, C. W. James, Byron Richardson one hundred dollars as a bounty, if it be legal." "Voted to pay all who never received any bounty the sum of one hundred dollars that have enlisted from Hooksett, if it is legal." The town of Hooksett went to the expense of about twenty-five thousand dollars in defraying the expense of bounties, etc., which incurred a heavy debt, but, by judicious management, the debt has since been wiped out, and in the year 1885 the treasury had a balance in favor of the town. Within a few years the town has voted fifty dollars annually for the decoration of the graves of soldiers who have fallen by the wayside of life's journey since the war, and of those whose bodies were brought from the scene of the great conflict. There was no full company recruited in this town during the Rebellion; but in September, 1862, upon the call made by the President for troops, enthusiastic patriotism pervaded the community and a great number of men enlisted from Hooksett. These men combined together and joined the Tenth New Hampshire Volunteers. A company was formed, and from the Hooksett squad a captain was elected, who was commissioned September 17, 1862. This officer was Warren M. Kelly, captain of Company D. He served throughout the war and commanded the regiment three months the last part of the service. Captain Kelly was a direct descendant of fighting stock, with good war records. He was born in the town of New Hampton, N. H., in 1821; was a grandson of Lieutenant Samuel Kelly, a Revolutionary officer, and a near relative of Captain Thomas Sampson, who commanded a company at Bunker Hill. He was a son of Michael B. Kelly, a member of Light Artillery in the War of 1812. Mr. Kelly has been a citizen of Hooksett twenty-eight years. He was a brave officer, frank and generous, and beloved by all his companions-in-arms. There were twenty-one men who enlisted under Captain Kelly from Hooksett. These men acquitted themselves with honor to their country. On the 10th of September, 1885, the annual reunion of the Tenth New Hampshire Volunteers was held in Hooksett. This gathering of war-scarred veterans, in commemoration of the sad past, and in exchanging kind greetings of the present, was a day long to be remembered by the people of Hooksett. A kind reception was given them, which brought to memory the sad "good-byes" given them when they departed from Manchester on that bright September morning for the seat of war, twenty-three years ago.

Since the formation of the town of Hooksett the local military history is not without interest. Hooksett's quota of men who were liable to do military service were generally given opportunity to train at the annual trainings. The last muster held in town was about the year 1850. It was held north of Hooksett Falls, on the west side of the river. This was under the old military régime. New Hampshire could muster then four brigades of well-drilled militia. Hooksett formerly mustered some crack companies. One of the first companies which displayed merit was the Hooksett Light Infantry. One of its last captains was A. H. Converse; he was a military genius and a thorough disciplinarian. This company was disbanded before 1850. Many recollect their gaudy uniforms. Another company was organized since the war, also called the Hooksett Light Infantry. It had for officers: Captain, George H. L. Head; First Lieutenant, William H. Otterson; Second Lieutenant, Silas T. Goodale. This company was organized in 1866 and became a part of the State militia. It was disbanded in the fall of 1869. In 1859 an engine company was organized, called the Eagle Engine Company. It was composed of the best young men in the village. It paraded on important occasions and did whatever service it had occasion to do at fires.

About the year 1842 there was organized a band called the Hooksett Brass Band. It had at one time for leader Abonzo Bond, who has since become famous as a band-leader and director in Boston. Ex-Governor Head was a prominent member, and was its leader before disbanding.

In the year 1861, in September, a band was organized with sixteen members, under the leadership of Benjamin A. Ham. Five members enlisted in the Tenth New Hampshire Regiment, but it continued to play until 1868, when they disbanded. At one time the band was called one of the best in the State.

October 6, 1884, a band was again organized, which is also called the Hooksett Cornet Band, with twenty-two members. Professor B. A. Ham is the leader and director. The citizens of the town contributed a sum of money to defray the cost of procuring instruments, etc. This association is based on local interest, and the instruments, etc., are always to be kept in town, in the hands of the association.

Temperance reform has more or less been agitated in town since the incorporation. Early in the history of the town Hooksett was called a great place for liquor. There was a number of taverns and dram-shops. In the oldstage-times from ten to fifteen stages arrived every day. Boatmen who plied the river rendezvoused at Hooksett. Dram-drinking, which was a custom in those days, and gambling was carried on to a large extent. Hooksett was sometimes called the "Second Vicksburg." Between the years of 1840 and 1850 a Sons of Temperance Society was formed, which aroused a temperance sentiment. This organization was sustained a number of years. About the year 1854, when the Maine Liquor Law created a wide-spread interest, the sentiment struck this town. Liquor-selling was indefinitely suppressed. Later on the matter was constantly agitated. Savory T. Burbank, a prominent co-worker in the cause, was persecuted by having a large, fine apple orchard girdled by miscreants of the opposite belief. This was in the year 1861. A large gathering of people assembled at his house afterwards, regaled by stirring music from the Manchester Cornet Band, and replaced the orchard. Soon afterwards the interest waned, and during the war reformatory questions were out of order. The suppression of the Rebellion was the main thing in the minds of the people. After the war a space of great business prosperity was enjoyed.

In the year 1875, December 30th, a Reform Club was organized in town. Noted agitators from different parts of the country spoke to the people. The sentiment permeated most every household, until the pledge was signed by over six hundred. Much apparent good was accomplished. Heads of families, who, prior to the movement, had not seen many sober days for years, took the pledge. They became sober men, and from that time until now are respected for their sobriety. A larger portion went back to their cups, becoming again intemperate. The club kept up their meetings for about five years. One of the outcomes of the Reform Club was the Good Templars' Lodge, which was organized April 5, 1876, with Joseph O. Ingalls and wife, C. H. Ingalls and wife, N. C. Gault and wife, E. T. Head and wife, W. H. Robinson, H. P. Gage and others as charter members. They increased their membership up to one hundred and three. This organization flourished for a number of years. They gave up their charter in October, 1883.

In the year 1873 a Patron of Husbandry Grange was instituted with Natl. Head as Master. This society flourished for a season, but soon became defunct. A number of people who reside in town are members of this society in Manchester.

Political.—From the commencement of the history of the town up to the year 1853 the Republican Democratic party was in the ascendancy. Since that time, for thirty-two years, the Republican party, derived from the old Whig and Abolition, has continually ruled the town. After the town was first formed there was not a strong opposing vote against the dominant party.

In the year 1833, Mathew Gault was elected as representative without an opposing vote; William Badger, candidate for Governor, had all the votes but two. Since the Republicans have ruled the town the Democrats have, in the years of 1867 and 1882, been able to elect representatives in the persons of Norris C. Gault and Nathaniel Clark.

In the year 1871, James A. Weston, Democratic candidate for Governor, had more votes than the Republican standard-bearer.

Longevity.—The following is a record of some of the people who have died at age above seventy years:

Thomas Wilcox, died 1833, aged 101; Peter Williams, died 1853, aged 79; Samuel Head, died 1855, aged 77; Sarah Head, died 1855, aged 71; Mary Dodge, died 1858, aged 75; John Davis, died 1860, aged 80; Sam- uel Paper, died 1867, aged 77; John Prescott, died 1861, aged 71; Wil- liam Taggart, died 1861, aged 80; Nancy Kimball, died 1861, aged 74; A. Whittemore, died 1861, aged 79; Elizabeth Collins, died 1862, aged 78; Dolly Prescott, died 1862, aged 79; Josiah Lenoir, died 1864, aged 80; Moses Underhill, died 1864, aged 74; Moses Collins, died 1863, aged 81; Hannah Kimball, died 1863, aged 84; Anna Kelly, died 1864, aged 74;

Sarah Shute, died 1867, aged 72; Polly Abbott, died 1869, aged 81; Betsey Silver, died 1869, aged 77; Nicholas Dellof, died 1869, aged 75; Joseph Fuller, died 1869, aged 86; Eric Poor, died 1871, aged 71; Susan G. Goss, died 1872, aged 78; Mathew Gault, died 1872, aged 79; Dolly Gault, died 1873, aged 79; Lucy R. Morgan, died 1872, aged 73; Wilcox Otterson, died 1873, aged 81; Isaac C. Otterson, died 1874, aged 76; Hannah O. Gilly, died 1875, aged 79; Peter C. Rowell, died 1875, aged 83; Phoebe Taggart, died 1880, aged 76; Joseph Ordway, died 1881, aged 72; J. Clark, died 1881, aged 77; Alden George, died 1882, aged 77; Edwin L. Goodale, died 1883, aged 71; Stephen C. Eastman, died 1883, aged 80; Reza Wheeler, died 1883, aged 76; James Fisk, died 1884, aged 77; Polly O. Morgan, died 1884, aged 86; Burnas Wilson, died 1884, aged 80; Joseph Blanchard, died 1884, aged 87.

Postmasters.—The first establishment of a post-office in town could not easily be ascertained. John Whipple was postmaster in 1822-23; William Hall, 1824; Richard H. Ayer, 1825-29; Hamlin Davis, 1830-31; Dr. Enoch B. Barnes, 1832; Dr. Amos G. Gale, 1833 to September 30, 1842; Richard H. Ayer to April 1, 1843; Amos G. Gale, 1845-47; Seth K. Jones, 1848-51; Samuel Head, Jr., August 31, 1851; Albert S. Rowell, 1855; Walter B. Jones, 1859-61; Joseph T. Goss, 1861-73; Frank C. Towle, 1873-82; George A. Robie, 1882-85; John Wheeler, August 20, 1885. When John Whipple was postmaster, in 1822, the salary for services amounted to $7.32, and in the year 1881 to between five and six hundred dollars. A post-office was established at Martin's Ferry in 1883, with Thomas Blanchard postmaster, which is called Martin's.

Brick-Making.—Brick-making in Hooksett is a very important industry. The composition of the clay and the singular location of this aluminous deposit along the banks of the Merrimack River make it an object of thoughtful study for the geologist. The brick manufactured from clay in Hooksett has gained a reputation for hardness and color not excelled anywhere in New England. Early in the primeval period of the earth's formation the disintegrated crust, through the constant action of the waters, left a decomposition of sandstone, mica and feldspar, which gives us a rich deposit of sand and clay. This valuable deposit of clay, on the east side of the Merrimack, was discovered in the early settlement of the town. About the year 1810 the late Captain Rice Dudley, of Pembroke, who had worked at brick-making in Massachusetts some, prospected, in company with Samuel Head, the clay-banks now worked by Jesse Gault and W. F. Head. Mr. Dudley prophesied that the banks would be developed some time, but Mr. Head scouted the idea, for the reason that it would be difficult to transport them to market. Since that time the clay-banks have been utilized; a railroad, with its side-tracks, has been extended up near the kilns, and it is no uncommon thing to see twenty-five cars of brick loaded in one day.

The first brick made in town was about the year 1820, at the Ayer brick-yard. At that time it was not a special industry, but different individuals united together to make for home use. In the year 1828 a kiln was made, which was used to build the town-house, and the town voted to cut wood from off the town lots to burn the same with. When the city of Manchester commenced to grow, a great demand for bricks occurred.

A Mr. Saltmarsh was the first extensive brick-maker in the Ayer brick-yard. Richard H. Ayer was the principal pioneer in extensive brick-making, employing David A. Leach as his foreman. Millions of bricks have been made from this yard, and the mills in Manchester were erected principally from material manufactured in Hooksett.

In the year 1837, Jabez Green, now living in Allentown, was the pioneer in brick-making in the Head brick-yard. Mr. Green was a native of Westford, Mass., but came from Bedford, prospecting for clay-banks. He had made a contract with a Mr. Lowell, agent of the Amoskeag Company, to supply one hundred thousand bricks. The old Manchester House was made that year with brick furnished in that contract. These bricks were boated to Manchester, loaded above the falls and locked over through the canal. Charles Stark was then lock-keeper. Peter C. Rowell and Henry Saltmarsh took the contract to boat them to Manchester. A Mr. Wallace and Samuel Prescott made bricks afterwards in the yard. Mr. Wallace went to California during the gold fever excitement, and since died there. Mathew Gault and Philip Sargent also operated this yard. About the year 1850 the late ex-Governor Head commenced to operate, and since that time, in company with his brother, W. F. Head, they have gradually developed the capacity, and they make on an average seven million a year. Jesse Gault commenced about the year 1842. He has become a successful manufacturer, and makes annually about six million. About three thousand cords of wood are now annually consumed in burning bricks. The large area of wild woodland that a large portion of Hooksett is made up of has been profitably utilized in furnishing wood for this purpose. The descendants of the early settlers who gained possession of these tracts of land were mostly made affluent by the rise in value of this natural growth. Other brick-makers have done business rather extensively in late years,—Charles Baily, Samuel Head, David A. Kimball, John Shirley and Joseph O. Ingalls. This important industry furnishes labor to about one hundred men annually. The help are mainly French-Canadians. In some seasons it necessitates sending agents to Upper Canada to procure help. Early in the history of this country, when brick-making was profitably done in the vicinity of Boston and New York, the help was principally furnished from the hardy sons of our forefathers. At that time, as well as now, it required specimens of vigorous manhood to stand the strain, and, therefore, it is necessary to procure men with sound constitutions to do this work. The advantages of machine-work have weakened the physical inclinations of the rising generation to perform this service, and it is necessary to look to Canada for reinforcements. There are two men—Nathaniel Clark, the foreman of Head's yard, and Charles Rowell, of Jesse Gault's yard—who have been constantly making bricks for over thirty years.

Mills.—The first mill built at Hooksett Falls was about the year 1770, by Thomas Cochrane, then of Dunbarton. Mr. Cochrane was an extensive dealer in lumber at that time. According to his books, kept at that time, numerous charges for salmon were made to different people. He caught them by the barrel when they would come up into his sluice-way to the mill. This mill was afterwards carried away by a freshet. Rufus Harriman afterwards owned the privilege. William Reside and Isaac Rowell afterwards built two mills, one on each side of the river, which they owned in 1803. William Reside was afterward drowned in the falls. William Otterson afterwards bought and sold to the Hooksett Manufacturing Company, in 1823, when they built a cotton and grist-mill. About the year 1790 the Browns built a mill below where Head's mill is now. In 1790, Nathaniel Head and Dr. James Brown owned it together. In 1802, Nathaniel Head built above the road, and since that time improvements have been constantly made on it, where W. F. Head now owns a complete improved lumber-mill. Probably the first mill built in town was by John Talford, about the year of 1750. This is at what is now the Sawyer place, and, in 1834, Captain Asa Sawyer added a grist and shingle-mill. In 1789, Nathaniel Martin and Laban Harriman built a mill on Lausy Brook. About the year 1790 there was a saw-mill built on the same stream, near Martin's Ferry, by a man named Thompson, for John Stark, a son of General Stark. Benjamin Hall had a mill on the stream just above the Chester turnpike previous to 1800. It passed into the hands of James Sargent and went down. In 1822 it was rebuilt by a Mr. Greer and afterwards burnt. Joseph Whittier built a mill on Dalton's Brook about 1810. The most extensive mill ever erected in town was the steam-mill by Samuel Head; it cost about eight thousand dollars. It contained a grist-mill. About the years 1857 to 1861, John Dennison was largely engaged in kit manufacturing in this mill. This mill was afterwards sold to a Lowell manufacturing company, which they operated a year or two, when the machinery, engine, etc., was removed, shipped to Florida, but lost in the ocean on its way.

Manufactories.—Cotton manufacturing in Hooksett dates back to 1823, when, in July of that year, the Hooksett Manufacturing Company was organized. The original mill is supposed to be the oldest one in the State. Among its grantees were more eminent men than were ever connected with any other cotton-mill in the State. In the organization of the company may be found the names of Governor John Bell, Isaac Hill and Samuel Bell, who have since been Governors, and Hon. Richard H. Ayer, a former resident; these men were some of the most prominent that New Hampshire has ever produced. This mill continued to run, sometimes under difficulties, under the agency of Governor Bell till 1834, he then being succeeded by Hon. John Nesmith, afterwards Lieutenant-Governor of Massachusetts. In 1835 it passed into the hands of the Amoskeag Company, which continued to run it, excepting a short time in the commencement of the late Rebellion, up to the year 1865. In that year it was purchased by Robert M. Bailey and others, of Boston, when it was enlarged and a new mill was finished in 1866. This company has continued to run the mill since, and now owns the entire water-power at this point. The capital of this company is two hundred thousand dollars, and the annual payroll is about eighty thousand dollars. They manufactured in the year 1880 about five million yards of cloth, the annual value of which is three hundred thousand dollars. The company employ about three hundred hands. Among the agents who have been residents of the town and who deserve mention were Jotham D. Otterson, afterward a successful manufacturer in Nashua, mayor of the city and since deceased; Stephen Ballard was agent from 1846 to about the year 1859. Mr. Ballard is now a successful business man in New York City. Thomas B. Wattles was agent afterwards and continued to serve until the company changed hands, in 1865. Mr. Wattles is now agent of the Chicopee (Mass.) Manufacturing Company. In 1866 Charles Nealley became agent; he continued to serve until about the year 1867. Mr. Nealley was a practical manufacturer, and since his removal from town has died. Mr. Nealley was succeeded by Eben H. Nutting, who continues to act and is interested in all questions appertaining to the moral and religious welfare of the town. The company which operates the mills in Hooksett at the present time offer flattering inducements to manufacturers to utilize the unimproved water-power. They will build buildings and furnish power at low rates of rentals.

Granite Quarries.—The manufacture of cut granite and the operation of quarries was formerly carried on to a large extent in this town. Previous to the building of the Concord Railroad it was boated down the Merrimack River to all the large towns below. Some of the old buildings in Boston, especially the Faneuil Hall, was partially erected from granite taken out of our ledges. The most extensive and successful dealer was the late Moses D. Stokes. He commenced about the year 1854, and followed the business a number of years. He constantly employed a large number of men, and did a business of many thousand dollars a year. He was succeeded by a Mr. Gray, who operated up to the year 1875, when the New Hampshire Granite Company was organized with fifty thousand dollars capital. This company operated extensively, with a Mr. Wait as business manager, until the year 1878, when it succumbed to financial embarrassment. The granite ledges are remaining unoperated at the present time. The Amoskeag Company, of Manchester, are owners of the principal quarries that have been worked. On Silver Hill, on the west side of the river, is an important ledge, which has been worked up to within a few years. The time is not far distant when again Hooksett granite will be sought and the industry flourish.

Roads.—In the early history of our forefathers when the settled sections was sparsely inhabited, highways were built in an economical manner, which simply answered for a horse or cart-path, but as the population increased, stage travel was heavier and improved roads were built. Probably the first road that was made through the town of Hooksett was in the year 1726. At a meeting held at Ipswich, September 9, 1726, John Chandler, John Ayer and William Barker were chosen a committee "to go out and clear a sufficient cart-way to Penny Cook the highest and best way they can from Haverhill." According to Bouton's "History of Concord," Ebenezer Eastman, with six yokes of cattle and cart, was the first that crossed the wilderness from Haverhill to Penny Cook. This road, in passing over Hooksett's territory, passed the White Hall, following a direct route alongside of Lakin's Pond, by Head's saw-mill, through Suncook, etc. This was a traveled road to Penny Cook up to 1738.

On January 8, 1762, at the request of Joseph Brown and others, the main road now from Suncook, via Hind's tavern to Chester, was laid out. This road went farther west; and, in 1801, on account of the banks of Peter's Brook being gullied out, it was laid out east of the pond, with a direct course to Lieutenant Joseph Whiteher's house (now the Stearns Hotel). The road leading to Hooksett village from this road was made in 1816. The road leading from Otterson's to the mills in Hooksett was laid out April 4, 1804. The White Hall road, leading from Martin's Ferry to Candia High Street, was laid out December 26, 1805. It was indicted September, 1815, discontinued September, 1816, to evade the indictment, and laid out again as a private way October 13, 1820. The Chester turnpike was incorporated June 19, 1804. It cost twenty-seven thousand dollars. On July 4, 1838, the Legislature passed an act repealing the turnpike, which made a public highway of it. The Londonderry turnpike was built in the year 1806. The Mammoth road was laid out in the year 1831, and it cost the town of Hooksett between three and four thousand dollars. The road leading from the Factory village to Natt. Head's was laid out in 1840. It was impossible to get the dates and facts concerning the highways on the west side of the river. Hooksett has at the present time an improved system of highways, and owns a road-machine.

Hooksett Bridge.—Hooksett bridge was built about the year 1805. In 1836, when the Londonderry turnpike was laid out as a free road, Hooksett bridge was reserved by them, which the town purchased, in 1853, for sixteen hundred and forty dollars. This was a toll-bridge up to that time. On the evening of September 30, 1857, this bridge, with the Concord Railroad bridge, was consumed by fire. It also burned the store building occupied by Joseph T. Goss. This was the most extensive conflagration that ever visited Hooksett. The total loss was about thirty thousand dollars. The bridges were replaced by better and more substantial ones, the town bridge costing seven thousand dollars. On March 20, 1859, this bridge was carried off by an ice freshet. A new one was built at a cost of eight thousand dollars, which remains to the present time.

Friendship Lodge, No. 19, I. O. O. F.,¹ was instituted September 26, 1876, by George A. Cummings, of Concord, Grand Master, assisted by his associated Grand Officers. The petition for the charter of the lodge contained thirty-one names, the most of which were members of Howard Lodge, No. 31, of Suncook. The lodge was instituted in what was known as Company's Hall, and continued to hold its meetings there until the Odd-Fellows' building was completed. The first officers of the lodge were James W. Converse, Noble Grand; George W. Haselton, Vice-Grand; Warren C. Saltmarsh, Secretary; Daniel W. Peaslee, Treasurer. The first lodge-meeting was held in the new hall January 31, 1877, and was dedicated to the business and purposes of Odd-Fellowship, February 20th, by Grand Master A. F. Craig, of Portsmouth. The present membership is one hundred and three. The lodge is free from financial embarrassment and has a cash investment of eight hundred dollars, and five thousand dollars invested in lot and buildings. The men who compose the lodge are properly included among the best citizens of the town. As an organization in the field of benevolent labor, it has few equals, and perhaps none superior in the State. Never were its prospects for future usefulness and honorable position more brilliant than at the present time.

United Order Golden Cross.—On the evening of October 28, 1881, by the earnest effort of C. F. Pressing, D. G. C., a number of residents of Hooksett assembled in the Odd-Fellows' Hall to listen to an explanation of the benefits derived from the United Order Golden Cross, from Sir Knight Joseph Kidder and others, of Manchester. The result of the meeting was the institution of a Commandery with eleven charter members. The officers elected were Ira H. Adams, P. N. C.; John W. Prescott, N. C.; C. Juliette Colby, V. N. C.; Samuel Head (2d), W. H.; Minnie M. Head, K. of R.; David A. Colby, Prelate; W. M. Davis, F. K. of R.; Benjamin J. Gile, Treasurer; W. H. Putnam, W. of I. G.; James B. Ordway, W. of O. G. The membership at the present time is twenty-five. The following members have become Past Noble Commanders: Ira H. Adams, John W. Prescott, Samuel Head (2d), David A. Colby, Warren M. Davis, Jacob F. Martin, George A. Harriman, James B. Ordway, D. Juliette Colby, Minnie M. Head and Nancy M. Davis are Emeritus Past Commanders. The present Noble Commander is Dr. F. D. Randall.

Justices of the Peace.—In the year 1825, Samuel Head and Nathaniel Head were justices of the peace. In 1829, Samuel Head, Foster Towns, Hugh J. Taggart, Enoch B. Barnes, Thomas R. Taggart. In 1833, Samuel Head, Foster Towns, Hugh J. Taggart, Enoch B. Barnes, Thomas R. Taggart. In 1834, Thomas R. Taggart was justice of the peace and quorum. In the year 1840, Richard H. Ayer, Thomas R. Taggart, Samuel Head, Hugh J. Taggart, Nathan Gault, John Parker, Philip Jones, Amos G. Gale, John P. Rowell, Charles Stark.

Lawyer.—Hooksett never had but one lawyer settled in town, and his name was John Whipple; he located in town prior to the incorporation. He was in Hooksett in 1822, '23, '24, '25. He afterwards practiced in Concord, and was there in 1835.

Taverns.—Hooksett has been famous in the early days of this century as having a number of taverns. In the village near the falls were located a number which received considerable patronage from boatmen, who were constantly plying the river. The sale of spirituous liquors was one of the principal sources of income. About the year 1780, Thomas Cochrane lodged people, and his books show a systematic list of charges for liquors, etc. Joshua Abbot, who lived at the head of Hooksett Falls, entertained strangers. He afterwards projected the tavern which came into the hands of John Prescott. One of the first tavern-keepers in the village was a Mr. Jackman. He kept in the house now occupied by Mrs. Walter B. Jones. He was succeeded by a man named Rix. A man named Simmons has kept the house since; also, Ilda Gile, William Hall and Henry Moulton were tavern-keepers in the village. One of the most famous tavern-keepers in town was Samuel Head. "Head's tavern" was known far and near as a model one. It was opened about the year 1805. Mr. Head was the pioneer in building and establishing the same. He continued to run the house until the year 1835. This point was a changing-place for horses on the Boston and Concord stage-line. Mr. and Mrs. Head were widely known as people of worth and great social qualities. Their extensive acquaintance attracted many visitors to the house, and it was the constant scene of great activity. Mr. Head was an active business man, dealing in lumber, speculating in lands, etc., and when he died, in 1854, he was called one of the largest real-estate owners in Merrimaek County. Some time about the year 1848 he projected a large steam mill, which was completed at a cost of about eight thousand dollars. He continued to manage it until September 29, 1854, when he was accidentally killed. He was in the act of reaching for something and fell upon the circular saw. His left hand was sawed in an angle commencing on the lower side near the wrist and ending through the knuckle of the forefinger, which was thrown twenty feet. The right arm was also completely sawed off near the elbow-joint and his right leg cut nearly off directly near the knee-joint. He lived about two hours. Drs. Crosby and Gale, of Manchester, were called, but he was dead before they arrived. His widow survived him until the next November, when she suddenly died sitting in a chair. She was seventy-one years old. Mrs. Head was a lady of sincere piety, kind and generous, with great conversational gifts. Other taverns were kept by William Parker on the River road, also one by Joseph Mitchell.

In the year 1823 the selectmen gave their approbation to the following parties to mix and sell spirituous liquors at their places of business: Captain Aaron Carter, Jacob F. Farum, Gideon Flanders, Josiah Magoon, Benjamin Hill, Israel Ela, Jr., Samuel Head, William Hall, Chase & Rowe, Henry Moulton, Robert Davis was permitted to mix and sell spirituous liquors, at or near Samuel Head's, on the 9th day of March. On June 26, 1824, the selectmen approbated the Hooksett Manufacturing Company to sell spirituous liquors. One of the prominent taverns of recent years is the Clark tavern, or the Branch Hotel. This was the original Whittier tavern. It has been kept by Ebenezer Clark. Horace Bonney leased it of Clark in 1858. It was kept by Bonney & Brother up to 1864, when Mr. Bonney opened the Ayer House, on February 18, 1864. Since, it was kept by Clark, and recent years by John Stearns, and called the Stearns House.

Since the opening of this house Mr. Bonney has continued to be its proprietor, excepting the year of 1883, when it was leased to Mr. Frank Richards for one year. In the fall of 1882, Mrs. Bonney died, which directly was the reason of the change. This house has gained a reputation which is widespread for its excellent management, the cuisine and generous tables and the great hospitality and social enjoyments that the surroundings afford. Mr. Horace Bonney was born in Winthrop, Me., in 1815, which was a part of Massachusetts at that time. He enlisted in the United States army September 26, 1833; was honorably discharged in 1836; afterwards went to Texas and served under Sam Houston; served in Florida about two years, and then went into the dragoon service for five years, with headquarters at New York most of the time. Mr. Bonney kept the American House from 1855 to 1859, in Manchester. The Ayer House is the original homestead of Hon. Richard H. Ayer. During Mr. Ayer's residence, and since, it has been the abode of great social cheer. Many distinguished people visited Esquire Ayer, among whom was Governor Isaac Hill and family, who sustained intimate relations. Another prominent hotel proprietor was Edwin E. Goodale, of the Pinnacle House. Mr. Goodale came to Hooksett in 1840. Previous to that time he was engaged in the teaming business between Canada and Boston. He was proprietor of this house for twenty-five years, and in 1865 took in his sign. During the time between 1843 to 1858 he was proprietor of the stage-route between Pembroke and Hooksett. This Pinnacle House was the old original Hall stand. Mr. Goodale built an elegant hall with an arranged spring floor, which was constantly occupied with balls and dances, being well patronized by people from the neighboring town. Mr. Goodale died November 22, 1883, aged seventy-one years. In June, 1833, President Andrew Jackson, with other distinguished men, passed through this town. He came direct from Nashua, leaving there in the morning and arriving at Inda Gile's tavern about 11 A. M. The party made a short stop at Hon. Richard H. Ayer's, who accompanied them to Concord. At Gile's tavern the horses were changed and six magnificent white horses were hitched up. Mr. Benjamin J. Gile, now a successful business man, was bartender at the time, and he had the honor to make President Jackson two glasses of lemonade. The reception given the President was entirely unconventional. Mr. Jackson stepped into the kitchen, where the cook was frying some doughnuts, and he asked the liberty to eat some. She offered him some cheese, which he took, and stepped to the back side of the house to look at Hooksett Falls. Mr. Jackson was given a rousing reception at Concord, and a committee of reception met the party between Hooksett and Concord. In the summer of 1877, President Hayes, accompanied by a part of his Cabinet, made a short stop at Hooksett. A large crowd of people assembled to see them. Mr. Hayes was introduced by ex-Governor Natt. Head, who, in return, introduced William M. Evarts and David M. Key, members of his Cabinet.

The resources of the town of Hooksett in the year 1880 are as follows: Agricultural products, $125,000; mechanical labor, $108,000; stocks and money at interest, $13,400; deposit in savings-bank, $116,217; stock in trade, $52,816. Among the manufacturers is the harness-shop of B. J. Gile. He established the business in 1837. Mr. Gile gives constant employment to from ten to fifteen men. His goods are sent to all parts of the country. Gile's collars have a reputation for durability that equal any other make. Among the natives of Hooksett who have become prominent was the late Hon. Henry W. Fuller, judge of the Roxbury Municipal Court, Boston; he was the son of David G. and Jane Fuller and was born in this town June 30, 1839. He was a graduate of Dartmouth College, served during the war and was breveted brigadier-general by President Lincoln. He was a member of the Massachusetts State Senate. He died in Boston, in 1884, of pneumonia.

Hon. Richard H. Ayer was born in Concord January 12, 1778; died in Manchester February 5, 1853, aged seventy-five. He settled near Isle Hooksett Falls, within the limits of Dunbarton, in the year 1807. He was a man of great strength of will and force of character. He represented the town of Dunbarton in the Legislature seven years, Hooksett four years; was moderator of Dunbarton from 1812 to 1823; in Hooksett a number of years; Presidential elector in 1816 and 1848; councilor five years; was the first high-sheriff of Merrimack County, from 1823 to 1828; naval store-keeper at Portsmouth from 1829 to 1837; delegate to the convention for amending the Constitution of New Hampshire in 1850. He was the principal agent in organizing the town of Hooksett, and establishing the county of Merrimack. Richard H. Ayer moved from this town, in 1845, to Manchester. He was a good citizen, generous to the poor and public-spirited. He accumulated a large property, and was extensively engaged in the lumber and brick business. He left a legacy of seven thousand dollars to the Unitarian Society in Manchester, of which he was a member. While a resident of Hooksett his house was the abode of good cheer and hospitality. His wife, the daughter of Peter Green, Esq., of Concord, was a very superior woman. He had two daughters, one of whom, Susan R., was the wife of Dr. Enoch B. Barnes, and the other, Mary G., the wife of Dr. Amos G. Gale. Among the prominent men who have resided in this town, and become a part of her history, was David R. Leach. He was born in Londonderry August 8, 1806, and died at Manchester April 1, 1878. His great wealth was founded in Hooksett, where he was a number of years engaged in business. He left a legacy of three thousand dollars to the town of Londonderry for a library. Another man, Seth K. Jones, was a prominent merchant. He moved to Concord in the year 1854, where he has since died. He left a large fortune, part of which was accumulated in Hooksett. Many natives of the town, who have located in different sections of the country, have become noted and wealthy.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

GOVERNOR NATT HEAD.

New Hampshire has raised up within her borders and sent abroad many noble men who, by their character and energy, have reflected honor upon their native State. Among those who have been thus active and deserving and who attained positions of prominence, the subject of this sketch has place. Most men have friends, but few have gone to their graves leaving so many as Natt Head. Wherever he went, among all classes of people, without effort and seemingly without purpose, he won the hearty and lasting friendship of all with whom he came in contact. He had a warm heart and a face always beaming with good humor, and was ever courteous, genial and generous.

He was of Scotch and Welsh ancestry, John and Nathaniel Head, brothers, having emigrated from Wales and settled in Bradford, Mass., afterwards moving to Pembroke, N. H.

James Head, the great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch, became an influential and patriotic citizen of his adopted town. Early in the period of trouble with the mother-country he enlisted in the military service, and served with fidelity and bravery through the war, and was killed at Bennington in 1777, holding the rank of lieutenant-colonel.

His son, Nathaniel Head, born in Bradford, Mass., March 6, 1751, was the grandfather of Governor Natt Head.

When a young man, the son paid his addresses to Miss Anna Knox, daughter of Timothy Knox, of Pembroke. She was of Scotch-Irish blood, and one day, as the father and son were ploughing, the former said, "Nathaniel, do you intend to marry that Irish girl?" The reply was, firmly, but decidedly, "Yes, sir." Added the father, "Then understand you can never share in my property." Young Nathaniel's answer was, "Very well, I can take care of myself." And dropping the goad-stick, he left the paternal roof in a few hours to take up a farm in the wilderness and build a home for himself. The father made good his threat, leaving, at his death, one dollar to Nathaniel and to the other brothers the remainder of his property. Nathaniel built a log house, carrying Anna Knox to it as his wife. He soon rose to position and influence. The reports of the battle of Lexington show him to have been a second lieutenant in the Ninth Company of Volunteers from New Hampshire at Winter Hill, in the cold season of 1775-76; ensign in Captain Sias' company, Colonel Nichols' regiment, in the expedition to Rhode Island in 1778, and captain in Colonel Reynolds' regiment in 1781. After the close of the war he became prominently connected with the State troops and was colonel of the Eleventh Regiment.

His seventh son, born May 30, 1791, was the father of the subject of this sketch. He remained at the homestead, being associated with his father in the works of the farm and mill, and after his death, by purchasing the interest of his brothers, succeeded to the estate. He inherited the military spirit of his father and was elected lieutenant-colonel of the Seventeenth Regiment. Colonel Head married Anna Brown, whose home was near his. She was a woman of great energy and executive ability, a member of the Congregational Church in Pembroke and was much beloved by all who knew her. Her father was a sea-captain who made numerous voyages round the world.

By the death of her husband, August, 1835, the widow was left in the management of a large and valuable estate, as well as the care of a family. She died April 3, 1849, leaving five children—Hannah A., Sallie B., Natt, John A. and W. F., the latter the business partner of Natt, who for many years carried on a successful business in the manufacture of bricks, and also a very heavy lumber trade. Inheriting military traits from his father, we find Natt following in the footsteps of his distinguished ancestors. He was one of the first members of the Hooksett Light Infantry, which was one of the best in the State. He served four years as drum-major of the Eleventh Regiment, being elected September 1, 1817. He was an original member of the "Governor's Horse Guards" and chief bugler during the existence of the corps. He was many years commander of the Amoskeag Veterans of Manchester, an honorary member of the Boston Lancers, also an ex-sergeant of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery. He was chief on the staff of Governor Joseph A. Gilmore and the Head Guards of Manchester. A military organization formed at the close of the war was named in his honor. When the Soldiers' Asylum was burned at Augusta, General Head was appointed to the charge of the institution during the illness of the Deputy Governor, and subsequently he rebuilt the establishment. He built several miles of Concord and Portsmouth Railroad between Suncook and Concord and also the branch line from Suncook to Pittsfield. He was elected to numerous town offices and commissioned deputy sheriff and representative in the Legislature from Hooksett in 1861-62.

In 1863 he married Miss Abbie M. Sanford, of Lowell, Mass., an accomplished and educated lady, who ever dispensed, with her husband, the generous hospitality of their home and ever encouraged him in all good work. Three children were born to them,—Annie Sanford, Lewis Fisher and Alice Perley,—of whom the eldest only remains. Lewis having died in 1870, at the age of four years, and Alice in 1879, at the age of nine years.

In 1864 Natt received the appointment by Governor Gilmore of adjutant inspector and quartermaster-general of the State, which position he filled with acceptance until 1870. During his term of office as adjutant-general he accomplished the work which was to him the proudest and noblest of his public life, and in this capacity he made his most brilliant and enduring record. The war had already lasted three years when he was called to that office, and the nation was in one of the most important crises of its history. The loyal North was straining every nerve to answer the President's proclamation for more men to recruit the depleted ranks of the Union army. New Hampshire had up to that time sent to the front twenty-six thousand soldiers, and yet not a complete set of the muster-rolls of a single organization could be found in the adjutant-general's office, nor was there any record of the heroic deeds of New Hampshire's sons upon the battle-fields of the South, which had won for them and her imperishable renown.

General Head brought to his work a natural love of the military and everything connected with it, as well as business methods formed during his life of activity in the marts of trade, which he brought to bear in bringing "order out of chaos" in his new field of labor. Entering at once upon his duties, he employed three clerks upon his own responsibility, procuring the necessary outfit, trusting in the Legislature to reimburse him, which it promptly did, and made liberal appropriations for continuing the work. It is scarcely possible to conceive the magnitude of the task which General Head had undertaken, nor its apparent hopelessness. He had no data from which to work, no record, no files of correspondence. Beginning at the very commencement of the war, the records of every officer and every enlisted man was persistently hunted up, special clerks were dispatched to Washington, and after repeated rebuffs, overcome only by the persistency of the adjutant-general, permission was obtained from the War Department to copy from its records the needed information, and for several weeks these clerks labored in season and out of season until they had secured the records sought. This information was compiled in the office at Concord, corrected as far as possible, and now appears in four volumes for the years 1865 and 1866. These reports give the name and the military history of every officer and soldier who went from New Hampshire to serve in the Union army from 1861 to 1865. They also contain biographical sketches of all the field officers from the State who were killed in service or who died from disease or wounds during the war, brief sketches of all the regiments and battalions in which these men served, their date of departure, principal movements, battles engaged in and date of return home and final "muster-out." These reports are invaluable, not only as a contribution to history, which the State could not afford to lose, but also to the thousands of soldiers, their wives and children, as a positive help in securing the information necessary for the procurement of pensions and bounty-money. Had his labors ended here, Natt Head would have richly earned the warm feelings of admiration and love which every true soldier entertains for his memory. But he supplemented the clerical labors of his position by active and earnest personal work in behalf of the soldiers and their families during the latter part of the war and at its close; and he took a pardonable pride in gathering all the precious relics of "the bitter struggle" which he could obtain, and placed them under the dome of the State-House in Concord.

The significance of the labor of love was fully recognized by Governor Smyth at the time, and in his valedictory address to the Legislature in 1867 he paid General Head the following tribute:

"In the difficult adjustment of our military affairs, you will agree with me in a warm approval of the energy and efficiency of the adjutant-general, whose work has been, in all cases, well performed. When it has been my grateful duty to extend a welcoming hand, in behalf of the people of this State, to our brave returning soldiers, he has forwarded my purpose with unflinching interest and zeal. You will not forget that around his department all the memories of the contest now cluster. The long roll of honor is there. There are gathered the blood-stained battle-flags and there will always be found those associations which should inspire us with love of country and an appreciation of those who gave their lives and shed their blood for the blessings which God bestowed when he gave us the victory."

In addition to the compilation of the Civil War records General Head, not satisfied with what he had accomplished, proceeded to compile the military records of the State from 1823 to 1861, and amid discouragements that would have deterred one less persistent, the records were completed and published in the report for 1866. This part of the report is a valuable contribution to the military history of the State and nation, and of priceless worth to posterity. In 1867, General Head conceived the idea of issuing the "Soldier's Certificate" to the honorably discharged soldiers of the State, and to the families of those who had fallen, and to-day thousands of these memorials in many homes bear mute but touching testimony to the truth and earnestness of the love born by the defenders of the flag by that generous and patriotic heart now stilled in death. Nothing ever pleased him more than to be present with the comrades of the Grand Army at their social gatherings. He would sacrifice every other engagement to meet them.

He had a personal acquaintance with Generals Grant, Sherman and Sheridan, and was several times invited to join them in their trips through the country. In the financial world Governor Head stood high, and he had established for himself a reputation for energy and tact in business which gave him at all times the confidence of the people. Associated with his brother, William F. Head, and Frank Doust, of Manchester, the firm have taken some of the heaviest building contracts ever made in New Hampshire. In the financial world Governor Head was chosen to many responsible positions. He was director of Suncook Valley Railroad, First National Bank, Manchester, also of Merrimack River Savings-Bank, Manchester. He was a prominent member of several secret organizations and was especially active in Free-Masonry, being a member of Washington Lodge, Mt. Horeb Royal Arch Chapter, Admiral Council and Trinity Commandery of Manchester.

He was also a member of the Supreme Council, having received all the degrees of the "Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite" and all in the Rite of Memphis; also a member of the Massachusetts Consistory, S. P. E. S., 32, Boston. He was a member of Friendship Lodge, Hooksett, Hibernth Encampment, of Suncook, I. O. O. F., Oriental Lodge, K. of P., Alpha Lodge, K. of H., of Manchester, and had been Master of Hooksett Grange, Patrons of Husbandry. As a leading member or president of the State Agricultural Society, he labored zealously to promote its interests, and originated the plan of holding farmers' conventions, the first one being held in Manchester in 1868.

In 1875 he was a candidate for the State Senate, when the controversy occurred over the spelling of his name upon the ballots. He was, however, elected to that body in 1866-77, in the latter year becoming the presiding officer, discharging the duties of that office with admirable tact and ability. This position added to his popularity and gave his name such a prestige that in September, 1878, at the Republican gubernatorial Convention, he was nominated on the first ballot by a decided majority and was elected for two years, being the first Governor to serve in the biennial term, and so was not a candidate for re-election. During his term of office there were many important questions which arose whose consideration demanded good sense, wisdom and impartial judgment, and it was generally acknowledged by all that his term was eminently successful, creditable alike to his own ability and fidelity and to the fame of the State in which he so honorably served.

The well-known Buzzell murder case, which finally became one of the most celebrated in the criminal records of the world, had been tried twice when Governor Head took the executive chair. His Excellency gave a long and patient hearing to counsel for State as well as defense, and denied the prayers of the petitioners for a commutation of his sentence. Buzzell suffered the "extreme penalty of the law," and the conclusion in his case was sustained alike by legal and public opinion. The project of a new State prison, inaugurated by his predecessor, was successfully carried forward to its completion. The commissioners selected to superintend the work consulted with the Governor at every step, and the building stands to-day, in thoroughness of structure and excellence of arrangements, second to none in the country. During his term of office Governor Head made many official trips, and wherever he traveled he received marked attentions, which he personally, and as chief executive of the State, merited. He was usually accompanied by his staff officers, of whom he was justly proud, as they were all gentlemen of high standing and of irreproachable character. Their names were Colonel W. X. Dow, of Exeter; Colonel D. L. Jewell, Suncook; Colonel Charles E. Balch, Manchester; Colonel F. C. Churchill, Lebanon; General B. F. Rachley, Dover; General J. W. Sturtevant, Keene; General C. B. Burns, Wilton; General Cruft, of Bethlehem; and Generals A. D. Ayling and J. H. Gallinger, of Concord. Among other occasions, the Governor and staff were present at the inauguration of President Garfield, the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of Boston, and military encampments in different States. It was also his pleasure to entertain Governors Talbot and Long, of Massachusetts, Governor Van Zandt, of Rhode Island, as well as many other distinguished persons, being invited to join in traveling, at different times, Generals Grant, Sherman and Sheridan, Admiral Farragut and others.

And so, although he seemed to have almost every office of any value in the State, the work which he had done as adjutant-general seemed to make him the happiest, so dearly did he love the soldiers. The many years of public life and close attention to business gradually impaired his health, and the last two years of his life were marked by weariness and inability to attend fully to business. Physicians of known ability were called to prescribe, kind friends and loving ones at home cared tenderly for him, but of no avail. He passed away November 12, 1883, at the age of fifty-five years. His funeral was largely attended by people from Concord, Manchester and adjoining towns, and many hundreds came to look for the last time upon the face of one "who had many friends."

The most distinguished citizens of the commonwealth were present and joined with neighbors and friends in expressions of sorrow for the departed. Different Masonic bodies were present, and Sir George P. Cleaves, of Mt. Horeb Commandery, officiated as funeral director. At twelve o'clock the sad rites began. The remains rested in a rich casket of black, stationed in the lower hall-way. Upon the casket were the Templar chapeau and sword of the deceased. Beautiful floral offerings were about the casket. Mrs. Head's tribute was a large wreath bearing the word "Husband" in the centre, while from the daughter Annie, was a handsome pillow with the inscription "Father."

Colonel and Mrs. Balch sent a crescent, General Sturtevant a bouquet, employes of Head & Doust an anchor bearing the word "Rest," and many others from friends.

Rev. Mr. Rollins, of Hooksett, performed the services, consisting of a touching prayer, and a male quartet furnished the music. The singers were J. J. Kimball, D. J. Hurlbert, J. F. Gordon, F. Y. E. Richardson. The selections were of a Masonic character: "Our days on Earth are as a shadow," "Heavenly Father, wilt thou lead us?" "Peace to the memory of the dead! Many Masonic organizations were present and delegations from different parts of the State joined in the funeral procession to the cemetery, about a half-mile from the house. At the grave Trinity Commandery conducted the Masonic burial service, the office being performed by Sir B. G. Cunnner, E. C., and Sir. L. F. McKinney, Prelate. The pall-bearers were selected from Trinity Commandery, and were Sirs Daniel F. Straw, David O. Fernald, John Hosley, George S. Holmes, David B. Varney and James S. Briggs.

And so passed away one who had many friends. Letters of sympathy and kindly expressions of the worth of the departed were received by Mrs. Head, but space allotted here will not allow their publication. The editorial of Colonel John B. Clarke, of the Manchester Mirror, is perhaps an expression of the people generally throughout the State, which we quote below,—"Other men may have been greater and stronger than he; may have lived longer and accomplished more; have died and been respectfully buried. Their death has been counted a loss to the State, to the profession in which they were leaders; but it caused no deep grief among those who were not bound to them by family ties. They are remembered as Governors, Senators, millionaires, not as men, and when once their places are filled and their estates distributed they have been well-nigh forgotten. The hold they had was upon the brain, not upon the heart. It was not so with Natt Head. People who knew him loved him while he lived and mourn for him because he is dead."

Colonel Moore, editor of the Manchester Union, one of the leading Democratic organs of the State, in alluding to his death, spoke of him as one "generous to a fault." His life was flavored with that quality in all those relations where he touched the concerns of others and in his attitude towards all public institutions that encompassed the betterment of society. He never did anything by halves, and that cause which attracted his support received the benefit of his able and untiring efforts. As a public officer, he could say with Othello, "I have done the State some service and they know it." No man in New Hampshire knew so many people personally, and few, if any, had so strong a hold upon the popular good-will. His word needed no writing to make it good.

He is survived by a widow and one daughter, Annie S. Head.

WILLIAM FERNALD HEAD.

According to a tradition of the family, the Heads are descendants of Welsh ancestry. They originally settled in this country, in Bradford, Mass. Tradition also asserts that the pioneers were two brothers, John and Nathaniel Head. Certain it is that at least two families of the name had settled in Pembroke some years before the Revolution. On the northerly side of Pembroke Street, and to the west of a cross-road leading to the site of the old town-house, is a field on the side hill in which stood the Head garrison-house, one of the four of the town, where the inhabitants sought protection from marauding bands of savages in the old French and Indian Wars. James Head was in command of the post and was of a military turn of mind; for, some years afterwards, we find him commissioned lieutenant-colonel in the forces under General John Stark. He was killed at the battle of Bennington while doing noble service for his country.

Nathaniel Head, son of Colonel James Head, was born in Bradford, Mass., March 6, 1754. On arriving at man's estate he married Anna Knox, and settled in what was then a part of Chester, now in Hooksett. Here he built a log house, cleared a farm and commenced life's battle. At the breaking out of the Revolution his patriotic zeal was aroused, and the old muster-rolls of the State-House show that he was at Winter Hill, as second lieutenant, during the siege of Boston; as ensign in Captain Sias' company, Colonel Nichols' regiment, in the expedition to Rhode Island in 1778; and as captain in Colonel Reynolds' regiment in 1781.

With the return of peace his fondness for military pursuits led him to take a deep interest in the militia, and he rose in rank to the command of a regiment. His military ardor, however, did not interfere with his business. He soon became extensively engaged in lumbering, at the same time carrying on his large farm. He was a justice of the peace, which in those days was an office of high trust, responsibility and honor, and was held in the highest esteem by his neighbors and fellow-citizens.

John Head, seventh child of Colonel Nathaniel and Anna (Knox) Head, was born May 30, 1791; married Anna Brown, daughter of William Brown, a ship-master, famed for his early voyages. The military fever developed in John Head, and he, too, became colonel, having command of the Seventeenth Regiment. At the death of his father he bought out the other heirs, and carried on the home farm and the lumber business inaugurated by his father. He died in the prime of life, August 7, 1835, leaving his family and large property to the care of his widow. She accepted the responsibility, and with fidelity and conscientiousness attended to the duties until her death, April 3, 1849. She was a member of the Congregational Church of Pembroke, and took a deep interest in religious and educational affairs.

William F. Head, son of John and Anna (Brown) Head, a brother of Governor Natt. Head, was born in Hooksett, on the old Head homestead, September 25, 1832. In early childhood the boy lost his father, and was guided through the perils of boyhood by his mother's care. Well he repaid her, for he was a dutiful son, eager to please her. He attended the district school in the little red school-house, and pursued his studies for a few months at the Pembroke Gymnasium; but his education as a man has been acquired by contact with men and reading,—a fondness for books all through life being a trait. His mother died when he was seventeen; but the character which she had moulded was founded on good principles, and the habits of industry, acquired in youth under her teaching, were well established. At the age of twenty years—in 1852—he went into business with his brother, Governor Natt. Head, and for over thirty years this business relation existed, or until the death of his brother and partner.

Mr. Head is a quiet, unostentatious business man,—a man who plans great business enterprises and successfully executes his undertakings. He has men at work in his brick-yards, in his mills, in his fields, in his woods and on extensive contracts; each carry out the ideas of their employer, who directs them for the common good; yet, to meet him on the cars, in his office, on the street or in his library, one would suppose he was retired from active business, so little do his cares wear upon him.

In 1859, Mr. Head was chosen selectman, and was re-elected the following year. He was chosen to represent the town in the State Legislature in the years 1869-70, and in 1876 was a member of the Constitutional Convention. He is a director of the Suncook Valley Railroad Company, and a trustee of the Merrimack River Savings-Bank, of Manchester; also trustee of the New England Agricultural Society.

Mr. Head has been for many years prominently identified with the Masonic fraternity. He joined the Eagle Lodge, of Manchester, in 1863, and was a charter member of the Jewell Lodge, of Suncook. He is also a member of the Council, Chapter and Encampment, at Manchester.

The mansion where Mr. Head resides occupies the site of the log cabin where his grandfather settled with his bonnie Scotch-Irish bride. The home-farm, of some two hundred and fifty acres, extends along the banks of the Merrimack River for about half a mile, and includes rich intervals and fertile hill-side fields. The chief crop is hay, of which two hundred and fifty tons are cut annually. There are kept on the farm seventy-five head of neat stock and twenty horses.

The lumber business, commenced many years ago by the grandfather, Colonel Nathaniel Head, has grown to large proportions, under the firm-name of Head & Doust. Mr. Head has been engaged in many large building contracts. In times past he has bought many hundred acres of forest-land, from which he has cleared the timber and cord-wood, and still owns the land, utilized for pasturage or for producing a second growth of trees.

On the home-farm are the celebrated Head clay-banks, from which six million bricks are made annually.

Mr. Head was married, November 4, 1858, to Mary H. Sargent, of Allenstown, daughter of Major Sterling Sargent. Their children are Eugene S. Head, now actively engaged in business with his father and Sallie Head, who is being educated at Lasell Seminary in Auburndale, Mass.

HON. JESSE GAULT.¹

Hon. Jesse Gault was born in Hooksett, N. H., September 20, 1823, and is a direct descendant, in the fifth generation, of Samuel Gault, who was born in Scotland, and emigrated to the northern part of Chester, now included in Hooksett, and settled on the "Suncook Grant," so called. Matthew Gault, who was born in 1755, on the old Gault homestead in Chester, and who married Elizabeth Buntun, was the grandfather of the subject of this sketch. They had twelve children, nine living to be married, of whom ¹Written by J. E. Pecker.

Jesse, the second son, who was born October 22, 1790, while the family was temporarily residing in Springfield, N. H., and who died in Hooksett September 25, 1855, aged sixty-five, was the father of Hon. Jesse Gault. He was a successful farmer and a man of property, and his homestead was one of the finest in his town or county. He married Dolly Clement, who was born in Pembroke April 21 1794, and died March 30, 1873, her father being Joshua Clement, who was born in Goshen June 12, 1764, and died in Concord December 26, 1840. Mr. Clement was a clothier, and was many years in business in what is now Suncook, where he was a large owner of real estate, including considerable water-power. He married Abbie Head, daughter of General Nathaniel Head, of Pembroke, September 26, 1790, and on the maternal side was of English descent.

Jesse Gault, Sr., had four children, two sons and two daughters. Matthew, the older son, was born September 23, 1817, and died December 2, 1846. Of the daughters, Almira C., born December 2, 1819, and died February 20, 1853, married Harlan P. Gerrish, of Boscawen. She left a son, John C. Gerrish, now living in Missouri. The remaining sister, Martha H., was born July 3, 1828, and died April 23, 1853.

Hon. Jesse Gault was brought up on his father's farm, and his opportunities for obtaining an education were the public school and Pembroke Academy. At the age of sixteen he began teaching in his own district, where he taught the winter school for four consecutive years, working on the farm in summer. Subsequently he was an instructor in Suncook and Hooksett village. On reaching twenty-two he left home to commence life's work for himself, and went to Baltimore, Md., where he engaged as a book-keeper and surveyor for the Messrs. Abbott & Jones, ship lumber merchants. His health becoming impaired, he was forced, in less than a year, to relinquish his situation, which had already become a most promising one, and returned home. After regaining his strength he, upon the solicitation of his aged parents, consented to remain in Hooksett. April 23, 1846, he married Miss Martha A., daughter of Isaac C. Otterson, of Hooksett, whose wife was Margaret Head, an aunt of ex-Governor Nathaniel Head. The same year Mr. Gault opened a brick-yard in Hooksett on a small scale, which he has developed until its production is about six millions yearly, affording employment to sixty men. This extensive business necessitates the purchase of large tracts of woodland for obtaining fuel, while the lumber is sold in the market. In this way he has bought some three thousand acres of forest domain. In addition, he owns several farms, the one upon which he lives cutting seventy-five tons of hay annually, and producing largely of other crops. His residence on the old stage-road from Concord to Haverhill, Mass., was built some five years ago, and is one of the most expensive in that section.

Mr. Gault was early active in civil affairs. After filling various local positions, including chairman of the Board of Selectmen for many years, he was chosen delegate from Hooksett to the Constitutional Convention of 1851, being the youngest member of that body. Mr. Gault was then a Whig, and Hooksett was at that time Democratic by more than two to one. In 1857 and 1858 he represented his town in the lower branch of the Legislature, and in 1867 was elected a railroad commissioner for a triennial term, being chairman of the board the last year. In 1870 he was a delegate to the Republican National Convention at Cincinnati, and has, for many years, been a member of the Republican State Committee. He was chosen from the Londonderry District to the State Senate in 1885, and was chairman of the committee on claims, and a member of those on the revision of the statutes and the asylum for the insane. Mr. Gault, by great industry and perseverance, has accumulated a large property, and is extensively interested in ownership and officially in railway, banking and other corporations. He is a regular attendant at the Union Church in Hooksett, is universally respected in private life for the purity and uprightness of his character, and is a member of the Masonic fraternity. Of the five children, (two sons and three daughters) born to Mr. and Mrs. Gault, four have died, the oldest, a son, reaching sixteen. The surviving child is the wife of Frank C. Towle, a young business man of Suncook. Senator Gault is a gentleman of commanding personal presence, is a fine speaker, and often presides over public assemblages. Possessing executive abilities of the highest order and excellent judgment, his opinion upon important matters, both private and public is often sought. Although, as will be seen above, he has already filled many responsible civil offices, yet his host of friends are confident that higher political honors will hereafter be bestowed upon him. His home, presided over by his refined and accomplished wife, is widely known, no less for its elegance than for its generous hospitality, and attracts many visitors.

HISTORY OF HOPKINTON.

BY C. C. LORD.

CHAPTER I.

Geography of the Town.—The town of Hopkinton is located in the southern portion of Merrimack County, touching its southern border in a middle position. Hopkinton is bounded on the north by Warner and Webster, on the east by Concord, on the south by Bow, Dunbarton and Weare, and on the west by Henniker. The area of Hopkinton is said to be 26,967 acres. The town lies nearly square. Its surface is irregular, but undulating rather than rugged. Its scenery partakes more of the picturesque than of the sublime and grand. Near the geographical centre of the town is an elevated ridge of land, about three miles in length, running somewhat northeasterly and southwesterly, and having a slight depression in the middle, making two brows, the southerly of which is known as Putney's Hill, the northerly being called Gould's Hill. In the eastern part of the town, and partly included in Concord, is another ridge, somewhat parallel to the first, and which is known as Beech Hill. These two ridges afford the highest elevations of land in the town. The scenery from many points of these elevations is very attractive and beautiful. The view from Putney's Hill, on a clear day, showing land in every county of the State, is extensively known to and admired by tourists. There are numerous minor elevations in the township.

The soil of Hopkinton is granitic, and for the most part fertile. In the northern portion of the town is some sandy, plain land of inferior quality. The soil is well watered. The Contoocook River enters the town of Hopkinton near the middle of its western boundary, traversing it in a tortuous course and passing into Concord near the north-eastern corner of Hopkinton. On its way, this river receives numerous tributaries, the most important of which are the Warner and Blackwater Rivers on the north, and Paul and Doldorf's Brooks on the south. Numerous acres of valuable intervale land lie on the Contoocook River in Hopkinton. There are several natural ponds in this town, as Smith's Pond, near the centre, and Clement's and Clough's Ponds, in the northwest. Most of the natural drainage of Hopkinton finds its way into the Contoocook River, which, with its tributaries, affords a large supply of water power. Most of the surface of this town is underlaid with a hard, clayey subsoil, and in various portions there is a small distribution of granular iron. There is much less solid rock in Hopkinton than in many other New Hampshire towns.

Hopkinton is to-day pre-eminently a rural town, and its surface is principally devoted to agricultural purposes, being divided mainly into field, pasture and forest land. All the staple crops of New Hampshire are raised here. We shall speak further of the industrial and popular situation of the town hereafter.

Primitive Facts.—Previously to the occupation of the territory of Hopkinton by white settlers, there was little primitive life that was locally distinctive. There were heavy forests of mixed growth, in which oak, ash, beech, birch, chestnut, maple, pine, hemlock, spruce, etc.,—trees everywhere indigenous to New Hampshire,—were in various degrees of admixture intermingled. Upon the lower, plain lands there was a greater predominance of the softer woods. There was also more or less wild grasses of inferior quality. The streams and ponds abounded with fish. The streams were also in some instances larger than now. All the wild beasts and birds indigenous to our State probably roamed more or less over this local wilderness. The same may be said of reptiles, among which the rattlesnake was the only venomous one.¹

The wild red man was also here before the advent of civilization. The regular Indian inhabitants of this locality appear to have belonged to the tribe of Penacooks, or Pawtucket. They had their favorite local haunts. On the intervale land of the Warner River, near its entrance into the Contoocook, was a famous resort. Numerous Indian relics have been recovered from this locality. On the northern bank of the natural outlet of Smith's Pond (now known as Chase's Brook), at a point near the present main village of the town, was formerly a huge rock, cleft in such a manner that an additional rude contrivance afforded considerable shelter from the weather. It is said that here was a somewhat favorite winter resort of some of the Indians of this vicinity. Scattering Indian relics have been picked up in various parts of the town, but, upon the whole, the local traces of the past uncivilized human life are meagre.

White Settlement of the Town.—The town of Hopkinton was settled by virtue of an act of the "Great and General Court or Assembly for His Majesty's Province of Massachusetts Bay, in New England." On Thursday, January 15, 1736, Edmund Quincy, for a committee of both Houses, rendered a report "on the Petitions for Townships." Among others, the "Petition of Hopkinton" is mentioned in this report. The climax of this matter, so far as it relates to the township now known as Hopkinton, N. H., is expressed in an act of which the following is a record:

"AT A GREAT AND GENERAL COURT, Held in Boston, the Twenty-fourth Day of November, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Thirty-six, the following Vote Passed the Two Houses, and was consented to by the Governor, viz: 'That, That John Jones, of Hopkinton, Esq., be and he only is fully authorized and Impowered to Assemble and Convene the Grantees, or Proprietors, of the Township Number Five, lying in the Line of Towns between the Rivers of Connecticut and Merrimack, in such Place as they shall be Notified and Warned to Convene and Assemble at, in Order to Chuse a Moderator and Clerk, and Committee to Allot and Divide their Land, and to Dispose of the same, and to Pass such Votes and Orders as by them may be thought Conducive for the Speedy fulfillment of the Conditions of the Grant, and also to Agree upon Methods for calling of Meetings for the fut. use; Provided, none of their votes Concerning the Dividing or Disposing of their Lands shall be Passed while they are under the Direction of the Committee of this Court shall be of force before they are Allowed of by said Committee.'"

Township Number Five was one of a line of townships extending in a line from Rumford (now Concord) on the Merrimack River, to the Great Falls, on the Connecticut. Each township was decreed to be six miles square. Briefly expressed, the conditions imposed upon the grantees by the court's committee were as follows: There were to be sixty settlers in a township, bonded to the committee for the performance of certain conditions, as that each grantee build a dwelling-house eighteen feet square, and of seven feet stud at the least, on his lot, and fence in for plowing, or clear and stock to English grass, five acres of land within three years after being admitted to settlement; and the grantees together were to build and finish a suitable meeting-house, and settle a learned and orthodox minister within the same number of years. In every sense of the term, settlements were to be actual.

In pursuance of the conditions above described, a meeting of the proprietors of Number Five was held at the tavern of James Morris, in Hopkinton, Mass., on the 14th day of February, 1837. Captain John Jones was chosen moderator; Charles Morris, clerk; Ebenezer Kimball, treasurer. It would seem that at this time the township had been surveyed and located; but the several lots of the grantees had not been established. The proprietorship was for some time occupied with the preliminaries of settlement. On the 31st day of May, 1737, a gratuity of five pounds each was voted to Daniel Claffin and Richard Potter, provided that they settled before winter. There is a tradition that Potter was the first one of the grantees to begin domestic operations in the new territory. A call for a meeting, dated at Hopkinton, September 30, 1738, declares,—

"These are to Notify all the Proprietors of the New Township Number Five, bordering on Rumford, to meet at the house of Mr. Henry Mellen, in the said Township, near the Meeting-house Spot, on Thursday, the nineteenth day of October next ensuing, at nine of the Clock in the morning, there to act on the following articles," etc.

This call evidently anticipates the first public meeting in the new township Number Five, which soon began to be euphronously known as New Hopkinton and to be indicated in the public records as "New Hopkinton (so called)." A prefatory note to the incorporating charter declares as follows:

"This Township was taken up to be settled, after it was granted & laid out by Order of the General Court of the Province of Massachusetts Bay, by the inhabitants of Hopkinton, in said Province, under the name of Number five in the Line of Towns, and was by them called New Hopkinton."

The following is the list of the original bonded proprietors of Number Five:

John Jones, John Jethards, Henry Mellen, Ebenezer Locke, Elias Haven, Jacob Gibbs, James Lock, John Brewer, James Nutt, Josiah Watkins, Thomas Mellen, Thomas Blake, Richard Potter, Rev. Mr. Sam'l Baxter, David Foster, Sam'l Haven, Thomas Walker, Henry Walker, Caleb Claffin, Charles Morris, Jason Walker, John Bowker, Elsha Haven, Ebenezer Collier, Samuel Streater, Joseph Collier, Matthew Taft, John Walker, John Weston, Nat'l Smith, David Burnap, Edmund Bowker, Eleazer Gile, Daniel Mellen, James Morris, Joseph Haven, David Woodwell, Matthew Lasky, Robert Claffin, Joseph Gould, James Wilson, Daniel Claffin, Mark Whitney, Joshua Claffin, John Quarles Eben's Claffin, Jedediah Haven, Benj's Carril, Paul Langdon, George Carril, Samuel Watkins, Samuel Frial, Joseph Holton, Peter Row, Simpson Jones, Jabez Potter, Daniel Claffin, jun., Cornelius Claffin, Ebenezer Kimball, Isaac Whitney.—90.

Troubles Incident to the French Wars.—The new settlement in Number Five was early subjected to various trials. One of these was incident to the prosecution of the so-called French Wars. The conflict known as King George's War lasted from 1744 to 1748; that sometimes called the Seven Years' War from 1754 to 1763. The English residents of the New England colonies were involved in an interest adverse to the French nation, in common with the mother-country. Consequently, in addition to the liability to active military service, the colonies were subjected to attacks from the Indians, instigated by the French, in the hope of securing captives, to be redeemed by their friends, thus aiding the treasuries of the French captors. The St. Francis Indians performed an important part in the work of securing English captives. These Indians were located upon the border of, or in, Canada.

In anticipation of predatory incursions by Indians, three forts, or garrison-houses, were early built in Number Five. They were Kimball's, Putney's and Woodwell's garrisons. The first of these was located about a mile from the present village of Hopkinton, on the road to Rumford, near the present residence of Mr. James K. Story, and was built by Aaron and Jeremiah Kimball. The second stood upon the top of Putney's Hill, near the present house of the descendants of Moses Rowell, and was erected by Samuel and John Putney. The third occupied a spot about half a mile from the present village of Contoocook, in the north part of the town, and near the present residence of Mr. Ebenezer Morrill, and was constructed by David Woodwell. The situation in Number Five during the period of the French Wars was more or less unsettled. On this account, important changes were made in the plans of some of the proprietors. Doubtless, some transferred their interests; some settled and then returned to Massachusetts; others stayed in the new township. One thing is certain: domestic and social life were never suspended wholly in the new settlement, though individual circumstances, doubtless, were in many instances modified. In consequence of the disturbed condition of affairs, there are no proprietary records extant for the years from 1743 to 1750, inclusively; nor for 1752; nor from 1754 to 1756, inclusively; nor for 1759; nor for 1762 to 1764, inclusively.

The inhabitants of Number Five also suffered personal violence at the hands of their Indian enemies. On the 22d of April, 1746, Woodwell's garrison was surprised by a party of Indians and eight persons were taken captive. The captives were David Woodwell, his wife, two sons, Benjamin and Thomas, and a daughter, Mary; Samuel Burbank, and Caleb and Jonathan, his sons. Woodwell and three children returned to Boston under a flag of truce. Mary Woodwell was held captive three years and was then redeemed, after spending six months with the French, at Montreal, waiting for a passport. Samuel Burbank and Mrs. Woodwell died in captivity. Jonathan Burbank was redeemed, but was afterwards killed by the Indians, who mistook him for the famous Robert Rogers. Mary Woodwell, in 1755, married Jesse Corbett, of Exbridge, Mass., and they settled in Number Five (or New Hopkinton), on the scene of the capture of 1746. In 1759, Mr. Corbett was drowned in the Warner River, then called Ambsbury River. In 1761, Mary Woodwell Corbett married Jeremiah Fowler, who died in 1802, and his widow immediately joined the Shaker community at Canterbury, when she died in 1829, in the one hundredth year of her age. By her first marriage, Mary Woodwell had two sons, and by her second, five children. A detailed account of the capture at Woodwell's garrison was written by the late General Walter Harriman and published in vol. iv., No. 6, of the Granite Monthly. On the 10th of November, 1746, a Mr. Estabrooks, of Number Five, was killed by Indians, on his return from Rumford, where he had been for the medical services of Dr. Ezra Carter. Estabrooks was killed about a mile from the present Concord Main Street, on the present highway to Hopkinton.

On the morning of April 13, 1753, Abraham Kimball and Samuel Putney was captured by Indians.

Their capture occurred on the eastern slope of Putney's Hill, not far from Putney's garrison. Kimball and Putney were both young men. They were taken to Contoocook (afterwards Bosawen), on their way to Canada, when, on the next day after the capture, the Indians were surprised by some famous Indian hunters of the name of Flanders, and both the captives escaped. Putney escaped by the aid of a dog that seized the neck of an Indian who attempted to tomahawk Putney. Abraham Kimball was the first white male child born in Number Five, he being a son of Jeremiah Kimball.

The military records of colonial New Hampshire, during the period of the French Wars, contain the following names of residents of Number Five, though the identification of the parties is not sure:

Joseph Eastman (probably of Rumford), Stephen Hoyt, Matthew Stanley, Ebenezer Eastman, Joseph Putney, John Annis, Enoch Eastman, John Burbank, Wilbur Peters, Nathaniel Smith, Simpson Coley, Isaac Chandler, Thomas Merrill, Samuel Barrett, James Lock, John Nutt, John Jones, Thomas Eastman.

The Mason Claim.—A second source of trial to the proprietors of Number Five resulted from the Mason claim. The original royal patent, given to Sir Ferdinando Georges and John Mason, embraced all the line of the Atlantic coast between the Merrimack and St. Lawrence Rivers, and extended many miles inland. The country was named Laconia, and the patent was given in 1622. Subsequently, Mason obtained a second patent of a considerable territory lying between the Merrimack and Piscataqua Rivers, and which he called New Hampshire. Having attempted settlement and a development of resources, Mason failed, and, dying, his heirs at length realized nothing but the naked soil. In the year 1691, the Mason estate passed into the hands of Samuel Allen. The original title became involved in dispute, and subsequently, by a fiction of law, that the estate might be under the command of the King's Court, the land was assumed to be in England, and, by the connivance of the Massachusetts colonial authorities, John Tufton Mason, lineal descendant of John Mason, laid claim to the whole. John Tufton Mason was successful, and at length sold out to twelve leading men of Portsmouth for fifteen hundred pounds.

The new proprietors were liberal in disposition, and made regrants of townships upon favorable terms, usually reserving fifteen rights for themselves. The conditions upon which Number Five was regranted are briefly expressed as follows:

The township was granted in equal shares to Henry Mellen, yeoman, Thomas Walker, cooper, and Thomas Mellen, cordwainer, all of Hopkinton, in the county of Middlesex.

A reservation of one-fifth, to the westerly part of the township, was set off for the proprietors.

One whole share in the remaining four-fifths was to be set off to the first settled minister, to be his in fee simple.

One whole share of the said four-fifths was to be set off for the use of the ministry forever.

One whole share in the said four-fifths was to be set off for the use of a school forever.

That thirty acres of land, and the necessary water privilege be reserved for a saw-mill, "at the place where the old saw-mill stood," and that the grantees and their associates build a saw mill within two years at their own cost.

That there be thirty families in the township, within three years, each house being at least sixteen feet square, and provided with a cellar, and that there be five acres of land cleared and fitted for mowing or tillage in each case.

That there be sixty families within seven years, with other conditions as before mentioned.

That a meeting-house be built within three years, and constant preaching be maintained at the expense of the grantees.

That all the suitable pine trees be reserved for His Majesty's use.

That in case of an Indian war occurring within any time limited for the performance of conditions, the time should be extended to the close of the war.

That in case Bow took any territory from the township, the loss be made up from other and ungranted lands.

The foregoing conditions were by an act of the Mason proprietors on the 30th day of November, 1750. The reservation of one-fifth in the western part of the township suggests the remark that the earlier settlements had not extended far in that direction. The reservation ultimately reverted to the inhabitants of the township, but upon what specific terms the writer does not know.

In November, 1762, the following parties were declared legal grantees under the conditions of the Mason grant. The figures given indicate instances of a plurality of shares in possession:

John Jones, Esq. (2), Joseph Haven, Esq., Rev Samuel Haven, John Haven, Thomas Byxly, Peter Bow, Joseph Haven, Timothy Townsend, Elder Joseph Haven, Sampson Jones, Esq., Isaac Prattis, Jedediah Haven, Mark Whitney, Nathaniel Gibbs, Isaac Gibbs, John Jones, Jr., Benjamin Goddard, Eleazer Howard, John and James Nutt, Daniel Mellen, James Lock, David Woodwell, Nathaniel Chandler (heirs), Samuel Osgood, Daniel and John Amis (2), Aaron Kimball, John Chadwick (2), Thomas Eastman, Timothy Clement, John Rust (heirs), William Peters, Ebenezer Eastman, Jacob Straw, Samuel Putney, Joseph Putney, Jonathan Straw (2), Thomas Merrill, Joseph Eastman, Jacob Potter, Matthew Stanley, Abraham Colby, Sampson Colby (2), Isaac Chandler, Jr., Abner Kimball (heirs), John Burbank, Caleb Burbank, Samuel Eastman, Peter Bow, Jr. (2), Enoch Eastman (2), Stephen Hoyt, Isaac Whitney, Enoch and Ezra Hoyt, Deacon Henry Mellen (3), Thomas Walker, Thomas Mellen (4), Isaac Chandler, Joseph Eastman, Jr.

The Bow Controversy.—The reader will remember that, in discussing the Mason grant, an incidental mention was made of Bow. The Bow controversy agitated the residents of Number Five during a period of years. The origin of the trouble will be briefly stated. We have already seen that Number Five was originally granted by the authorities of Massachusetts Bay. Bow was granted to Jonathan Wiggin and others, in 1727, by the government of New Hampshire. A conflict of boundaries ensued between Bow and Number Five. Bow was also in controversy with several other townships upon the subject of boundaries. Bow claimed a section of Number Five in the southeast part of the township. The disputed section was wedge-shaped, with its apex lying very near the present village of Hopkinton.

The contest between Bow and Number Five was, in a sense, a conflict of colonial governments. It was but natural that both Massachusetts and New Hampshire should be zealous of their prerogatives. All the boundaries involved in this controversy were not adjusted before 1765. Adjudged in the New Hampshire courts, the controverted points seemed to be decided in favor of the local colonial interest. It seemed as if Bow was to win her case. This was the condition of things on the 7th of May, 1761, when Deacon Henry Mellen, Adjutant Thomas Mellen and Timothy Clement were chosen a committee of Number Five, "to go down to the land proprietors and the proprietors of Bow to see if the matter can be agreed upon." However, largely by the activity of the inhabitants of Rumford, the matter was brought before the King's Court. At the Court of St. James, on the 29th day of September, 1762, the King and his counselors reversed a judgment of the Inferior Court of the Common Pleas of the province of New Hampshire, of the 2d of September, 1760, and also one of the Superior Court of Judicature, of the second Tuesday in November, 1760, and the principle was established that defeated Bow and gave the other townships their land.

In 1763, on the 13th of December, an act of the New Hampshire Legislature joined the following persons and their estates to the "District of New Hopkinton," thus acknowledging the validity of their claim as residents of the disputed territory of Number Five:

Abel Kimball, Timothy Kimball, Timothy Clements, Eliphalet Colby, Green French, John Chadwick, Abraham Kimball, Jeremiah Kimball, James Kimball, Moses Straw, Jonathan Straw, John Eastman, William Peters, Hezekiah Foster, Jeremiah Kimball, Jr., Thomas Jewett, Reuben Kimball, Daniel Watson, Obadiah Perry, Joshua Bailey, John Kimball, John Jewett, Parker Flinders, Isaac Colby, Thomas Hoyt, Widow Susanna Kimball.

In 1772, in consequence of the incorporation of the county of Hillsborough, of which Hopkinton was a part till 1823, it became necessary for the provincial authority of New Hampshire to enact that the portion of Hopkinton formerly claimed by Bow should be disannexed from Rockingham County, of which Bow was once a part, and annexed to the new county.

HOPKINTON—(Continued).

Incorporation of Hopkinton and Incidental Matters.—The legal incorporation of Number Five, by the name of Hopkinton, was effected in 1765. The incorporating act passed the New Hampshire Provincial Legislature on the 10th of January. The approval of the Council and the consent of Governor Benning Wentworth were given the next day. Hopkinton was a town with all the implied legal rights and privileges. The subject of the legal incorporation of the township was agitated as early as 1757. On October 27th of that year a petition for incorporation was addressed "To His Excellency, Benning Wentworth, Esq., Captain-General & Governor-in-Chief in and over his Majesty's Province of New Hampshire, and to the Hon^{ble} his Majesty's Council in the Province aforesaid." This petition was signed by the following persons:

— Samuel Putney, Joseph Eastman, Aaron Kimball, Joseph Putney, Enoch Eastman, John Putney, Daniel Voss, Caleb Burbank, Peter How, Joseph Ordway, Matthew Stanley, Abraham Colbe, David Woodwell, Joseph Eastman, Jr., John Chadwick, John Ordway, John Burbank, Jonathan How.

There were probably not more than a few hundred people in Hopkinton at the time of the incorporation. Let us consider some of the conditions of local society at this time. Although nearly twenty years had passed since the original grant of the township, yet the originally implied conditions of the grant were not all fulfilled. Part of the neglect was due to the troublous scenes through which the inhabitants had passed. A minister had been settled. Rev. James Scates was ordained on the 23d of November, 1757.¹ No meeting-house had been built, though numerous votes to build had been passed. Rev. Mr. Scates was ordained at Putney's garrison, which was a place of regular public worship. A meeting-house lot and a minister's lot had been located. Land had been set apart for educational purposes, but there is only slight evidence that a school had been taught. In March, 1765, the town voted to have a school two months of the ensuing year.

Local society was in a very primitive state up to the time of the incorporation of Hopkinton. The incident of Mr. Estabrooks, in 1746, leads to the inference that there was no physician in this town. Of lawyers there were apparently none. There are no data of the conditions of trade at this time. A vote of the early proprietors, passed February 14, 1737, appropriating twenty pounds for clearing a road from Rumford to the new township, and also for clearing other roads as far as the sum would allow, suggests that Rumford was a dependence for commercial supplies. There was probably no tavern in Hopkinton, though there may have been people who had special accommodations for travelers or visitors. A hint is afforded upon this subject by the action of the town in anticipation of the ordination of the Rev. Mr. Scates. It was voted to provide entertainment at six places,—the houses of Aaron Kimball, Matthew Stanley, Stephen Hoyt, Peter How, Samuel Putney and Joseph Putney. Some progress had probably been made in the erection of framed houses. In 1737, the proprietors voted a gratuity of twenty-five pounds to any one who would build a saw-mill near the "reservation," the mill to be completed by the next December. Subsequently the same gratuity was offered to Henry Mellen personally, and, still later, the inducement of thirty pounds was made general. It is believed that Henry Mellen erected a saw-mill on Paul Brook, in the westerly part of the town. The existence of such a mill provided lumber for building. The first framed house is said to have been built near Kimball's garrison. The ancient Rowell house, now standing on Putney's Hill, near the site of Putney's garrison, was built for the Rev. James Scates. A grist-mill may or may not have been in operation in town previously to the incorporation, but, in 1765, Nathaniel Clement was allowed a gratuity of eighty acres of land, on the north side of the road to Rumford, so long as he kept a corn-mill in repair. The site of the Clement mill is just east of Hopkinton village, at the outlet of Mills' Pond, so called. Money was apparently plenty, though the currency was depreciated, being largely in provincial bills of credit, sometimes called "old tenor." The town appropriated four hundred and fifty pounds for the expense of the Rev. Mr. Scates' ordination, but this sum was probably worth no more than two hundred dollars in hard money.

Previously to the incorporation, the township had limited political privileges. It had a representative power at the General Court. In 1738, October 23, Isaac Whitney, Thomas Walker and Ebenezer Goddard were made a committee to present the votes of the proprietors at the seat of provincial government. In 1749, the township became a part of New Hampshire. Local meetings were called by special committees. Jacob Gibbs and Charles Morris were the first committee to call meetings. The first meeting in the new territory was called by Joseph Haven Isaac Whitney and Thomas Walker. The township could not take its own inventory, which was taken by the selectmen of some corporate township. In 1761, the selectmen of Boscaawen were paid five pounds for taking the inventory of Number Five.

The incorporation of Hopkinton gave a decided impulse to local public enterprise. Affairs seemed to assume a new and substantial basis. Various improved conditions resulted. A church was built in 1766. The edifice was fifty feet long, thirty-eight feet broad and the posts were twenty-two feet. The expense of its erection was five hundred pounds, old tenor. The same year it was voted to have two schools in town. In 1768 it was decided to build two school "houses"—one near Esquire Townsend's and the other in the centre, between Jonathan How's and Moses Gould's,—but this act was afterwards rescinded. Educational matters progressed, however, and, in 1784, a provision was made for dividing the town "into eight parts for schooling." In 1766 a vote was passed to build a boat in the Contoocook River for the accommodation of people passing between Hopkinton and New Amesbury (now Warner), said boat to be as large as Deacon Merrill's boat in Concord. In 1772, an appropriation of thirty pounds was made for a bridge across the Contoocook. The same year the town obtained possession of two lots of land where the people had begun to bury their dead, and public legal cemeteries were established.

¹A church was organized at the same time. The following were the original members: James Scates, David Woodwell, Aaron Kimball, Jonathan Straw, William Peters, Joseph Eastman, Jr., Peter How, Abraham Colbe, Matthew Stanley, Enoch Eastman, William Peters was afterwards made the first deacon.

Hopkinton, being incorporated, soon became a thriving and prosperous town. The business centre was at the site of the present village of Hopkinton. The church was built there, its site being identical with that of the present Congregational house. This was the situation of public affairs on the eve of the Revolution.

The first selectmen of the incorporated township were Captain Matthew Stanley, Ensign Jonathan Straw and Sergeant Isaac Chandler.

The Revolution.—The people of Hopkinton were alive to all public events anticipative of the great struggle called the Revolution. At a town-meeting on the 18th of July, 1774, Captain Jonathan Straw was chosen a delegate to the Exeter Convention of the 21st of the same month, which was called to succeed the Assembly dispersed by Governor John Wentworth, and which also chose Nathaniel Folsom and John Sullivan delegates to the Provincial Congress. On the 9th of January, 1775, Joshua Bailey was chosen delegate from Hopkinton to a second convention at Exeter, which convention chose John Sullivan and John Langdon as delegates to another Provincial Congress. On the same day the town voted "to accept what the Grand Congress has resolved." On the 11th of December, 1775, Captain Stephen Harriman was chosen a representative to Exeter for one year, in anticipation of the convocation of the 21st of the same month, designed for the elaboration of a plan of civil government.

In 1775, in compliance with the demand of the local colonial authority, an enumeration of people and of war materials was taken in Hopkinton. The following is the official return:

Males under 16 years of Age	342
Males from 16 years of Age to 50 not in the Army	100
Males above 50 years of Age	30
Persons gone in the Army	12
All females	519
	1085

"Guns that are wanting are fifty-six.

"Powder, six pounds in town.

"The above account taken by us, the subscribers, is true, errors excepted.

"JONATHAN STRAW, } Selectman
"ISAAC CHANDLER, } for Hopkinton"

On the 4th of March, 1776, Major Chandler, Joshua Bailey and Moses Hill were made a local Committee of Safety. On the 14th of the same month, the Colonial Congress passed a resolution, recommending that all assemblies, conventions, councils or Committees of Safety immediately cause all persons "notoriously disaffected to the cause of America" to be disarmed. In view of compliance, Mesech Weare, chairman of the New Hampshire Committee of Safety, issued a circular, requesting the signatures of all males over twenty-one years of age, "Lunatics, Idiots and Negroes excepted," to the "Declaration on this Paper," and also desiring the names of "all who shall refuse to sign the same." This circular was dated April 12, 1776, and was presented to the selectmen of towns. The selectmen of Hopkinton returned one hundred and sixty-one names subscribed to the declaration, and the names of fourteen who "refused to sign."

On the 14th of January, 1777, the town voted to procure shovels, spades, one hundred pounds of gunpowder and lead and flints. An existing law required each town to maintain a regular supply of one barrel of gunpowder, two hundred pounds of lead and three hundred flints. On the 31st of March an appropriation sufficient to raise twenty-six men for the army was voted. On the 14th of April it was voted that service already done should be considered equal to service to come; on the 30th of June, that militia should have the same pay as soldiers; on the 15th of January, 1778, that the selectmen be agents to provide for the families of non-commissioned officers and soldiers; on the 1st of March, 1779, that the soldiers "should be made good as to the depreciation of money;" on the 20th of November, 1780, that soldiers' rates should be payable in corn as well as in money; on the 5th of February, 1781, that Major Chandler and the commissioned officers have authority to employ soldiers and hire money for the purpose. The following votes, passed on the 15th of May, 1777, shed some light upon the price paid for Revolutionary soldiers from this town:

"Resolved, to accept the raitt that is already made for the warfare.

"Resolved, to allow to those Persons which hired men for three year before there was any Committee Chose in Town for to hire men for three year Equal month with those which the Committee hired at Ninety Dollars the three year."

At home and in the field, Hopkinton did her part well during the trying Revolutionary times. A number of the soldiers from this town lost their lives in the service. Hopkinton men were in nearly, or quite, every important campaign of that war. Their names are now only imperfectly remembered. In attempting to recover the names of the Revolutionary soldiers of Hopkinton, we have been greatly assisted by Hon. George W. Nesmith, of Franklin, to whom we are indebted for many of the particulars given below.

The following were at Bunker Hill, June 17, 1775, in Captain Gordon Hutchins' company: Nathaniel Clement, Abraham Kimball, William Darling, Thomas Mathews, Jonathan Judkins, John Gordon, Elisha Corliss, Nath. Perkins and Micha Flanders are of doubtful residence, though some of them were probably from Weare. Most of the Hopkinton men at Bunker Hill were enrolled in the company of Captain Isaac Baldwin, of Hillsborough, who was killed upon the field, and whose command devolved upon Lieutenant John Hale, of this town, who served with the following others: Second Lieutenant Stephen Hoyt, Sergeant Moses Kimball, Corporals Moses Bailey, Moses Connor, Reuben Kimball and Moses Darling; Moses Trussell, John Putney, Samuel Hildreth, Peter Howe, Timothy Clements, Daniel Cressy, Joseph Putney, Clifford Chase, Richard Straw, Thomas Eastman, Thomas Hills, Benjamin Stanley, John Stanley, Enoch Eastman. Trussell lost an arm on this field, as well as his coat and knapsack. Hildreth, Hills, Chase and Thomas Eastman lost a coat each. Lieutenant Hoyt and John Putney each lost a coat and a knapsack. Caleb Smart was also at Bunker Hill, in Stark's regiment, and was wounded.

The following privates were enlisted August 2, 1775, and served under Captain John Parker, of Litchfield, in the northern campaign: Samuel Smith, John T. Connor, Ebenezer Collins, James Judkins, David Clough, Jedediah Jewett, Daniel Murray, Joseph Stanley.

In Colonel Benedict Arnold's regiment, that cut through the wilderness of Maine to Quebec, in 1775, in Captain Henry Dearborn's company, were Lieutenant Nathaniel Hutchins and a private named Carr.

In the latter part of 1775, thirty-one companies of soldiers were sent from New Hampshire to reinforce General Sullivan at Charlestown. The officers of the Twentieth Company were Timothy Clements, Hopkinton, captain; Joseph Chandler, first lieutenant; Amos Gould, second lieutenant.

The following enlisted in Colonel Pierce Long's regiment on the 8th of August, 1776, and served four months, or one hundred and twenty-one days: Captain Timothy Clements, Sergeant Moses Darling, Daniel Blaisdell, Isaac Clements. Lieutenant Nathaniel Hutchins also belonged to this regiment, being promoted to captain, and on the expiration of the term of enlistment, in the spring of 1777, recruited a company and joined Colonel Joseph Cilley's regiment in April. Captain Hutchins retired from service in January, 1781.

The following soldiers were enlisted into the Continental service by the authority of Colonel Stickney, generally for a service of three years. The enlistments began early in 1777. In Scammel's regiment, in Captain Daniel Livermore's company, were Sergeant Samuel Smith, Joseph Bickford (died June 20, 1778), B. Sargent, Samuel Judkins; in Cilley's regiment, in Captain James Gregg's company, Ebenezer Blaisdell, Jr. (died August 15, 1777); in Captain Hutchins' company, Sergeant Eben Collins (wounded October 7, at Stillwater, and died October 26, 1777), Sergeant John Chadwick, Moses Colby, Daniel Cressy, John Eastman (killed July 8, 1777, at Hubbardton), James Edgerly, William Hodgkins, Jonathan Judkins, Samuel Stocker, Enoch Hoyt, David Smith (died August 4, 1778), Caleb Smart, Elijah Smart, Jonathan Sawyer, Benjamin Williams, Joseph Eastman (died October 30, 1777, at Saratoga). Most of these men were enlisted in April, some for less than three years.

The following men were with Captain Joshua Bailey, of this town, at Bennington, being enlisted on the 20th of July, 1777, and discharged at Stillwater on the 20th of the next September: Quartermaster Joseph Stanley, Second Lieutenant Timothy Farnum, Second Sergeant Joshua Gile, Fourth Sergeant Peter Howe, First Corporal John Burbank, Fourth Corporal Ebenezer Eaton, Christopher Gould, Richard Smith, Samuel Howe, David Howe, Jonathan Straw, Jr., Stephen Harriman, Jr., Jonathan Hunt, Josiah Corbet, Moses Emerson, Moses Jones, Daniel French, Abraham Kimball (severely wounded), Caleb Burbank, Ebenezer Rider.

The following men were enrolled in Captain John Hale's company, Colonel Henry Gerrish's regiment, called out to reinforce General Gates, enlisted in August, 1777; they performed twenty-eight days' service: Captain John Hale, Sergeant Daniel Flanders, Corporal Jacob Straw, Jonathan Chase, Stephen Hoyt, Philip Greeley, Jacob Hoyt, Nathan Sargent, Richard Carr Rogers, Joseph Chadwick, Moses Hills, Thomas Hills, Samuel Farrington, David Fellows, Joseph Corbett, Enoch Long, David Kimball, Moses Burbank.

The following men enlisted in a company commanded by Captain Joshua Bailey, and served twenty-five days in August and September, 1778, in Rhode Island: Lieutenant Thomas Rowell, Sergeant Moses Darling, Sergeant Abner Chase, Corporal Reuben Kimball, Corporal Levi Hildreth, Oliver Dow, Moses Hills, Joseph Hastings, Jacob Choat, Jonathan Straw, Ezekiel Straw, Samuel Hoyt, Timothy Darling, David Kimball, Samuel Chase, Richard Smith, William Putney, Timothy Farnum, David Howe, William Barnard, Joshua Morse, John Clement, William Ayres, Moses Clark, Joseph Carrier, Moses Clement, Jacob Tucker, Ezekiel Goodwin, Ira Waldron. These men were in the regiment of Colonel Moses Kelley, of Goffstown. Corporal John S. Farnham enlisted into the army on the 5th of May, 1779; John Eaton and Timothy Farnham, on the 5th of April, 1781; they were all discharged in December, 1781. Benjamin Cressy enlisted on the 6th of April, 1781, and was discharged on the 17th of March, 1782; he was claimed by Henniker. The following men were new levies from and for Hopkinton, enlisted before or during 1781, and distributed among different Continental regiments: Sergeant Isaac Clement (died December, 1780), Richard Smith, Ebenezer Dustin, David Howe, Daniel Eaton, Alvaro Carrier, Moses Chase, Jonathan Howe, Daniel Stickney, Moses Flanders, Benjamin Quimby, Samuel Howe, Ephraim Hildreth.

The following are additional names of Hopkinton men engaged in the Revolutionary War: Abram Carrier, Samuel French, Michael Stocker, John Robinson, Moses Flanders, Benjamin Flanders, Daniel Kimball, Stephen Putney, Jeremiah Tyler, William Stocker, Isaac Walker. Captain Jonathan Straw was at Cambridge in 1775, and drew a pay-roll of £60 17s. 9d.

During the Revolutionary period the people of Hopkinton were zealous of the public honor and impatient of the conduct of the Tories. The following act, passed in 1776, illustrates the prevailing state of mind:

"Resolved, that our Representative Should Use his Influence that the two Greens Should Be Put Down from their office and that if any Person Should go to Peter Green to get a Rat he Should Be Looked upon as an enemy to his Country."

In common with the rest of the people of the American colonies, the residents of Hopkinton suffered in consequence of the depreciation of the colonial currency. In 1775, the Continental notes were nearly at par with gold, but very soon fell to a most insignificant value. The effect of the collapse is amply attested in the records of this town. At a town-meeting in 1781, it was voted that the price of a day's work by a man on the highway should be thirty dollars; the price of the same, by a yoke of oxen, also thirty dollars; the price of a plow and cart one day, ten dollars each. The salary of the Rev. Elijah Fletcher, minister of the town, was voted to be four thousand dollars for the year, but the reverend gentleman preferred to accept seventy-five dollars in gold. The success of the American cause and the establishment of the public credit restored and promoted prosperity.

The Project of Constitutional Government.—The War of the Revolution was succeeded by a conflict of ideas. It is not difficult to ascribe a cause for this conflict. The colonies had thrown off the yoke of Great Britain. Every form of action seems to exhibit a tendency to reaction. Nor is the whole truth expressed when we say that the dominant sentiment of the colonists favored a republic. In casting off their allegiance to the mother-country, the colonists experienced a reaction against monarchical government that threatened an abnegation of a necessary constitutional political compact. Hence it became hard for the masses to agree upon any effective form of government. Hopkinton bore its part in this exigency. It is probable that the local governmental reactive tendency was gradual in its manifestation. The colonial Articles of Confederation, implying a weaker compact between colonial sections, seems to have excited no special opposition in this town, since they were accepted at once and for all on the 13th of January, 1778; but, on the 14th of January, 1788, Lieutenant Morse was chosen a delegate to the convention designed to consider the eligibility of the Constitution of the United States, and was supplied with instructions to "Reject" the same, though on the 11th of the following June the town formally conceded his right to act as he thought best for the public good. Very much hesitancy was shown towards the idea of accepting a State-Constitution. On the 25th of May, 1778, Captain Harriman was chosen a delegate to the approaching Constitutional Convention; but, on the 23d of July, 1779, the town "Tried a vote for receiving the Plan of Government—none for, but one hundred and six against it." On the 30th of May, 1781, Joshua Bailey was chosen a delegate to the Constitutional Convention of that year. A number of attempts were made to decide the attitude of this town towards the work of the convention before a final result was reached. On the 3d of June, 1782, it was voted to pass over the article taking cognizance of the matter. On the 11th of November, the work of the convention was rejected. This action was reversed on the 23d of the next December. On the 3d of March, 1783, Joshua Bailey, Deacon Kimball, Captain Moore, Mr. Aaron Greeley and Mr. Nathan Sargent were chosen a committee to examine the plan of government and report to the town, which accepted the plan on the 8th of the following September. Esquire Greeley, on the 8th of August, 1791, was chosen a delegate to the Constitutional Convention of that year, but the work of the Assembly was rejected in toto on the 7th of August, 1792. It is a singular fact that both on the 7th of May and on the 21st of the same month, 1792, the town appears to have considered proposed amendments to the Constitution, but there is no record of the result.

The Constitutional Convention of 1781, which was in existence two years, proposed to strengthen the arm of State government by creating the office of President. It was not until an amendment to the original plan made the chief executive elective by the people that the work of the convention was accepted by the State. In 1783, under the new condition of affairs, Mesech Weare, of Hampton Falls, was elected President of the State of New Hampshire. The vote of Hopkinton that year was fifty-six for Josiah Bartlett, of Kingston, two for Timothy Walker, of Concord, but none for Weare. The great struggle with the problem of local constitutional government was apparently over. The records of the town give few hints of the actual objections to the various phases of constitutional plans during the period from 1778 to 1792. Our conclusions upon this point are general. They are already expressed.

Controversy over the Meeting-House.—The local events recounted in the last division of this sketch cover a period in which an excited controversy over the meeting-house occurred. The meeting-house was a town institution; consequently, the entire population was interested in its location, erection and management. As we have seen, the meeting-house was erected in 1766, or about twenty years after the grant of the township by the Legislature of Massachusetts. In the first instance, it was intended to locate the meeting-house as near the geographical centre of the town as was practicable. "Meeting-house lot" was laid out on Putney's Hill. The "minister's lot" was also located there. The minister's house was there erected. However, in the year 1766 the tide of circumstances and events had apparently located the business centre of the town at the site of the present village of Hopkinton, where the meeting-house, as we have seen, was erected.

A public act often incurs controversy, and a public controversy is a hard thing to quell. The meeting-house, being erected, became a constant source of dispute. The subject of a new location was at length mooted. On the 2d of February, 1789, a select committee of the town reported upon the subject in controversy. The committee were Nathan Sargent, Samuel Farrington, John Jewett, John Moore, Isaac Chandler, James Buswell, Benjamin B. Darling, Enoch Eastman and Joshua Morse. The following is their report:

"After we have considered the matter respecting the meeting-house we have examined the rates, and we find the east end of the town pays about eight pounds in fifty in the minister tax more than the west end, and is eight parts in number more. Also, the travel is thirty-six miles farther to the common lot on the hill, so called, than where it now stands, according to our computation. As these two places are the only ones picked upon by the committee, therefore we think the meeting-house ought not to be moved."

Three days after the presentation of this report a young man set fire to the meeting-house and it was burned to the ground. The meeting-house destroyed, the old controversy revived afresh. In three days more the town held a meeting at the public-house of Mr. Babson, which meeting, it is presumed to accommodate the attendance, was adjourned to the "bar-yard." By this time at least four sites were proposed for locations for the meeting-house. The town voted to refer the matter to the "chairmen of the selectmen" of the towns of Gilmanton, Linesborough and Washington. These gentlemen,—being Peter Clark, Ezekiel Hoyt and Jeremiah Bacon,¹—on the 20th of February, reported that they had examined four spots,—“the Common near Mr. Burbank's, the Hill, the Spot by the School-House and the old Meeting-House Spot,”—and decided that they were “unanimous of the opinion that near the Spot where the old Meeting-House stood will be the most Convenient Place for you to build a Meeting-House upon.”

The meeting-house controversy practically ended here. The new building was promptly erected upon the old site. The edifice was sixty-two feet long and forty-six feet wide. A tower twelve feet square stood at each end. There were seven entrances to it,—two in each tower and three in front. Inside were a high pulpit, a sounding-board, a gallery on three sides and pews built square. A few front pews, designed for the use of church dignitaries, were of better finish than the others. About 1811, a belfry and bell were added. In 1829, the structure was remodeled into the present church, and a clock was put in the steeple.

¹ Peter Clarke was from Lyndeborough, Ezekiel Hoyt from Gilmanton, and Jeremiah Bacon from Washington. There seems to be a doubt that in each particular instance the members of the committee were chairmen of their respective Boards of Selectmen, though they may have been.

During the time in which there was no meeting-house, on account of the fire of 1789, the church worshiped in the barn of Benjamin Wiggin, on the premises now between the Episcopal Church and the old post-office building, and in front of which are the two largest clus in Hopkinton village. In front of these premises, in the open air, on the 25th of February, 1789, the Rev. Jacob Cram, the third minister in the town, was ordained.

The meeting-house was used by the town for its public meetings till the 1th of March, 1799, when a meeting was adjourned from the meeting-house to the “upper Part of the Town-house in Said Town, to meet at that Place again in one hour.” The “town-house” in this instance is identical with the old Hillsborough County court-house.

CHAPTER III.

HOPKINTON—(Continued).

The Beginning of a New Century.—The United States census of the year 1800 found the population of Hopkinton to be two thousand and fifteen, thus demonstrating a decided advancement in public prosperity since the complete legal establishment of the township. A number of circumstances combined to produce this prosperity. Hopkinton occupied a position upon a great line of travel. It was one of the most important stations between Boston, in Massachusetts, and Montreal, in Canada. It was also an important place of trade. Besides being a local commercial centre, it was an important point of trade and market exchange to the more northern townships that were less advanced in local privileges. It was, further, an important judicial location. Upon the incorporation of Hillsborough County, Hopkinton became one of its shire-towns. A court-house was built here, occupying the site of the present town-house. Hopkinton had also become a political centre. When the State of New Hampshire had no fixed capital town the Legislature met here four times,—in 1798, 1801, 1806 and 1807. In anticipation of State legislative needs, an addition was made to the court-house. At the beginning of the present century Hopkinton had become a point of attraction for persons of all professions and callings, as it were, and a fair number of them had here found a residence. The local business enterprise had also become fairly distributed over the town. The present village of Contoocook, once known as Hill's Bridge, was in a progressive stage of growth. Contoocook largely resulted from the water-power there afforded by the river of the same name. About 1787, Eliphalet Poor built the first mill at this place. In time, Poor succeeded by numerous others. Population, trade¹ and other forms of enterprise followed as a matter of consequence. Previous to 1791, Abraham Rowell had a mill on the Contoocook River, at the place now known as Rowell's Bridge, but now more commonly called West Hopkinton, where there is a hamlet resulting from the continued utilization of the water power at this point. Lastly, there were various mills, taverns, shops, stores, etc., of greater or less importance, in various sections of the township. Upon the whole, Hopkinton, at the beginning of the present century, was advancing to a degree of prosperity of which we shall say more after noticing an occurrence of particular importance.

The War of 1812. The War of 1812 aroused the patriotism of the people of Hopkinton to deeds of sacrifice and valor that made the public record creditable. The war had hardly begun when public steps were taken for a vigorous prosecution of local warlike preparation. On the 6th of July, 1812, the town voted to allow a compensation of seven dollars a month to all soldiers detached from their regiments as a relay corps, by order of the government. It will be remembered that at this time all able-bodied males of military age were enrolled and regularly marshaled and trained as militiamen of the State. Ten dollars of each man's wages was to be paid in advance by the town to each detached soldier, who was to receive two dollars upon "signing his name." On the 5th of October, 1814, twelve dollars a month was voted to all soldiers put under special governmental requisition, with two dollars upon entering actual service. The last clause of this provision, however, was afterward rescinded.

Numerous Hopkinton soldiers were engaged in the service during this war. The First Regiment of New Hampshire Infantry, commanded by Colonel Aquilla Davis, of Warner, went into camp at Concord early in February, 1813, and early in the spring marched to Burlington, Vt., in anticipation of service on the northern frontier. On its way to Burlington this regiment marched through Hopkinton. In this regiment were Hopkinton soldiers, as follows:

Thomas Bailey, drum-major. In Captain Joseph Smith's company were Jeremiah Silver (musician), Charles Colby, Zadoc Dow, Stephen G. Eaton, Moses C. Eaton, David Hardy, James Hastings, Richard Hunt, Isaiah Hoyt, Ezra Jewell, John Morrill, Samuel G. Titcomb, all enlisting on the 1st of February, 1813. In Captain Elisha Smith's company were Moses (?) Eastman, Amri Foster, James Hastings, Samuel Straw. Eastman died in the service. These men were probably also enlisted on the 1st of the same month of February, and, like the others, for a service of one year. We remark, in this connection, that the above names of Hopkinton soldiers of Captain Elisha Smith's company do not appear in the roll of the company published in the report of the Adjutant-General of New Hampshire. The names were given us by an aged resident of this town, Mr. John M.

Bailey, who remembers the fact of their enlistment and the location of their command.

The First Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteers was soon disbanded. On the 29th of January, 1813, Congress repealed the Volunteer Act, and the soldiers enlisting under it were re-enlisted into the regular United States army, or returned into new regiments, to serve till the time of their enlistment expired. The soldiers of the First New Hampshire Regiment who were not re-enlisted into the United States army were consolidated in Colonel Denny McCobb's regiment from Maine. The following Hopkinton men were in this regiment:

In Captain Benjamin Bradford's company were Isaiah Hoyt and Stephen G. Eaton, corporals, enlisted December 15, 1813, for one year; Jonathan Burbank, April 15, 1814, for the war; Henry T. Hildreth, January 24, 1814, one year; James A. Hastings, December 15, 1813, one year; John Morrill, December 15, 1813, one year; Benjamin Putney, February 28, 1814, for the war, and died in service; Buswell Silver, March 23, 1814, for the war; Moses Tenney, January 14, 1814, one year.

The record of enlistments in Colonel McCobb's regiment appears to show that some Hopkinton soldiers renewed their obligations before their original terms had expired, while others were recruits.

The operations of the British fleet off the Atlantic coast of the United States during the winter of 1813 and 1814 created much alarm. On the night of June 21, 1814, an alarm at Portsmouth, occasioned by a report that the British were landing at Rye, induced the Governor of New Hampshire to order out detachments from twenty-three regiments for the stronger defense of Portsmouth, when the detachments were organized into a brigade of five regiments and one battalion, under the command of Brigadier-General John Montgomery. The following Hopkinton soldiers were in Lieutenant-Colonel Nathaniel Fisk's First Regiment, in Captain Jonathan Bean's company: Thomas Town, first lieutenant, acting quartermaster from September 18th; Moses Gould, sergeant; Robert A. Bradley, Samuel Burbank, Barrach Cass, David C. Currier, Amos Eastman, John J. Emerson, Ebenezer Morrill, John Morey, Isaac Pearce, Hazen Putney, Jacob Straw, William Wheeler. These men were all enlisted for a term of ninety days from September 11, 1814.

The following men from Hopkinton were in Lieutenant-Colonel John Steele's Second Regiment, in Captain Silas Call's company: Nathaniel Morgan, sergeant; Jacob Chase, Amos Frye, John Johnson, John Hastings, Alvin Hastings, Francis Stanley, James Eastman, Amos Sawyer, Jonathan Gove, William M. Crillis and John Buraham. These men were all enlisted on the 2d of October, 1814, to dates running from November 8th to November 19th. Stanley died in service.

None of the men ordered from this town to Portsmouth were called into active engagement with the enemy.

The Acme of Local Prosperity.—We have already mentioned the progressive prosperity of Hopkinton from the time of the complete legal establishment of the township to the beginning of the present century. We also noted the causes of this prosperity. We will now observe with reference to its culminating point. Hopkinton once became what it had never been, as well as what it is not now. In 1830, the United States census found the inhabitants of Hopkinton to be 2774. In 1767 there were only 473. The increase till 1830 appears to have been constant, but since then there has been apparently almost a steady decline. In 1880 there were 1836.

In the time of Hopkinton's greatest prosperity there were multiple signs of activity and enterprise. In the main village were as many as seven stores, with a corresponding number of miscellaneous shops. Some of these stores were places of wholesale trade. Among them were the business-houses of Towns & Ballard, Nathaniel Curtis and Thomas Williams. Wholesale trade and barter were extensively carried on in Hopkinton village. The teams of those who came from other places to traffic often filled the large village square. The position of Hopkinton as a seat of county judicature, a position it held till the formation of Merrimack County, in 1823, made it an important centre of legal professional interest and influence. Here lived Baruch Chase, John Harris, Matthew Harvey and Horace Chase, lawyers. The local prosperity also demanded places of public entertainment. There were several hotels in the village, kept by Bimsley Perkins, Theophilus Stanley and others. Bimsley Perkins' tavern, which stood on the now unoccupied site just west of the village square, was one of the best-known public-houses in the State. There was also about this time a tavern in Contooscook, kept by Daniel Page, and soon after another erected by Sleeper & Wheeler. On Putney's Hill was a famous rustic tavern, kept by Joseph Putney. According to the demands of this busy time, post-offices were established. The first post-office in town was established in 1811. John Harris was the first post-master. A post-office was established in Contooscook in 1831. Thomas Burnham was the first postmaster. During this prosperous period a bank existed in Hopkinton a few years. This institution was known as the Franklin Bank and was incorporated in 1833. The grantees were Horace Chase, Nathaniel Gilman, Isaac Long, Jr., William Little, Joseph Stanwood, Matthew Harvey, Andrew Leach, Moses Gould, Ebenezer Dustin, Timothy Chandler, Stephen Darling and James Huse. The management of this bank seems to have been of a bungling character, and the institution finally settled with its creditors at a discount. The Franklin Bank occupied the old post-office building.

At the time of which we speak, there were three churches in existence in Hopkinton village. They are also now in existence. We have already given some account of the Congregational Church, which ceased to be under the special patronage of the town about 1811. A Baptist Church had been formed in 1769.¹ A meeting-house was partially completed in 1795. It stood about a mile southwest of the village, near the present residence of George W. French. In 1831, the present Baptist Church was built. An Episcopal Church was formed here in 1803. It was known as Christ's Church, and the congregation worshipped in the court-house. In 1827, a new organization, known as St. Andrew's Church, was formed. The same year, the erection of the present church was begun, and the edifice was dedicated in 1828. In 1823, a Free-Will Baptist Church was organized at Contooscook, and a church was erected in 1827. About 1803, a West Congregational meeting-house was built at Campbell's Corner, but no regular society appears to have been formed. This meeting-house stood but a few years. The Universalists had an active foothold in Hopkinton in its most prosperous period. In 1836, a small church was built in the west part of the town, near the present residence of Charles Barton. In 1837 a second church was erected in Contooscook. There appears to have been no regular church membership in either instance.²

In its palmy days, Hopkinton had a creditable educational record. In the earlier part of the present century, considerable attention was paid to improved public instruction. Select tuitional schools were frequently taught in the old court-house. A famous select school of about twenty-five years' duration was taught in Hopkinton village by John O. Ballard, better known as Master Ballard, who lived and taught in the house now used as a Congregational parsonage. Master Ballard was a native of Warner, who came to Hopkinton and engaged in trade, and, in consequence of the war of 1812, failed in business, and thereafter devoted himself to teaching. The branches taught in his school were mostly English, but something of the classics was introduced in later years, when he was assisted by his son, the Rev. Edward Ballard, a late widely-known Protestant Episcopal clergyman of ¹The Baptist Church was gathered by Dr. Hoz-Kiah Smith, and was a branch of the Haverhill (Mass.) Church. It became independent in 1771. In consequence of a laxness of doctrine, it separated from the State Association. In 1822, Rev. Michael Carlton became its pastor and called the Calvinistic element, by which it has since been identified.

²This church was the result of a schism in the original Baptist Church in this town. The Free-Will Baptist movement was inspired by Deacon Jonathan Fowler, son of Maty Woodwell, by his second husband.

³In 1831, Deacon Amos Bailey, of West Hopkinton, left a legacy to be paid to any Congregational Society worshipping in the west part of the town. A society was organized with headquarters at Contooscook, but it did not legally appear that Contooscook was in the part of the town included in the bequest. The Second Congregational Society kept up a nominal existence till about 1851.

⁴The Rev. J. F. Withers, a resident Universalist minister at Contooscook, in company with Rev. J. Sargent, of Sutton, for a time published the Universalist Family Friend, a monthly periodical of twelve pages of a common tract size. The first number was issued in April, 1841.

Brunswick, Me. Master Ballard's pupils came from far and near, and his school was of repute abroad as well as at home. John O. Ballard died April 27, 1854, aged eighty-six years. His remains lie in the old village cemetery of Hopkinton.

Hopkinton Academy was established in 1827. The first organization of trustees was as follows: Ebenezer Larned, president; Abiram Brown, Stephen Sibley, Matthew Harvey, Phineas Clough, Roger C. Hatch, Michael Carlton. The old court-house was remodeled and its upper story reconstructed for the use of the academy. The first term of school began on the first Wednesday in May. Hopkinton Academy was incorporated on the 26th of the next June. The first teacher was George Peck, who remained but a short time. The catalogue of the fall term announced the following board of instruction: Jeremiah Russell, A. B., preceptor; Mr. Jeremiah Gates, assistant preceptor; Mr. Luther Cross, lecturer on chemistry. The whole number of pupils was seventy-three,—gentlemen, forty-seven; ladies, twenty-six. The next year separate male and female departments of instruction were established. The catalogue of the fall term then announced the following instructors: Rev. John Nash, A. M., preceptor; Miss Judith D. Peabody, preceptress. The students were: Gentlemen, forty-five; ladies, thirty-two,—total, seventy-seven. Hopkinton Academy advanced rapidly in success and popularity. In 1830, there were one hundred and thirteen students; in 1831, one hundred and fifty-nine; and in 1835, one hundred and sixty-two. In the list of teachers were Enoch Colby, Enoch L. Childs, Mooly Currier, Miss Caroline Knight, Miss Mary L. Childs, Miss Lucy Adams, Miss Mary Y. Bean and many others; in later times, M. B. Stebbins, Dyer H. Sanborn, William K. Rowell and others. In 1843, Hopkinton Academy experienced a heavy reverse, its financial affairs showing a deficit of over seventeen hundred dollars, arising from bad notes and expenditures above the income. The institution took a new lease of life in 1851, when a new charter was secured; but the old and famous institution succumbed again to modern innovations in public educational plans, and the structure it occupied went up on the wings of flame in March, 1873.¹

Incidents of the Prosperous Period.—For the sake of the convenience of the narrative, we will say that Hopkinton was in her palmy days from 1790 to 1840. The turning-point of the tide of prosperity was the effect of an act of the New Hampshire Legislature of 1811, the progressive result of which was the location of the State capital at Concord. Hopkinton had hoped for the honor of becoming the seat of State government. The organization of Merrimack County, in 1823, and the location of the county-seat at Concord, was another blow to Hopkinton's prosperity. Yet this town exhibited many of the traits of an active and prosperous community for years after its population began to decrease.

One of the incidents of the prosperous period was the improvement of the accommodations afforded by public highways. In 1805, an important accommodation was effected by constructing the present main line of highway from Hopkinton village to Putney's Hill, greatly improving the traveling connection between the two villages, Hopkinton and Contoocook. In 1815, the so-called turnpike was constructed, being a part of a main line to Concord, avoiding toilsome Dimond Hill on the east and north. In 1827, the so-called new road from Hopkinton to Dunbarton was built to accommodate a stage-line from Boston, Mass., to Hanover, N. H. The Basset Mill road, from Contoocook to Weare, was made in 1836. The so-called new road to Concord was opened about 1841, to shorten distance and also avoid Dimond Hill on the south and west. Hopkinton was upon the routes of several important stages till the introduction of the railroad, of which we shall speak hereafter, and many of its roads were projected with reference to this fact.

Though Hopkinton has been a centre of judicial and legislative influence, this town can hardly be said to have had a local political history of very great importance. In the early days of the independence of the United States, Hopkinton conceived a preference for the Republican, or Jeffersonian party, and the principles of that party were dominant in all State questions till 1865, when a majority vote was given to Walter Harriman for Governor. Till this time, whether called Republicans, as at first, or Democrats, as in later times, the reactionary party never yielded in Hopkinton, except upon mere local or subsidiary questions. The agitation caused by the repeal of the Missouri Compromise seriously affected the old Democratic majority, but the War of the Rebellion was in its last year before Hopkinton gave a majority to an anti-Democratic candidate on the State ticket.

Since we had occasion to speak of the part this town has borne in earlier wars, we may now say something of the local militia. In the year 1792, a State law was enacted for the government of the State militia, and, with some modifications and amendments, it continued till the abolition of the old militia system, in 1851. In 1819, the militia of Hopkinton was classed in a Twenty-First Regiment; in 1812, in a Fortieth Regiment. There were, in the palmy days of this town, two companies of infantry, with uniformed officers. There was also a company of uniformed riflemen and another of uniformed infantry, known in later times as the "Cold Water Phalanx." There was also a section of uniformed cavalry, known as "The Troop," of the same regimental classification as the other town militia. During the existence of the local militia, training-days and muster-days were notable occasions to the populace. A large number of military titles were locally incurred. Some of the militia officers developed considerable efficiency in a peaceful way. A few of the old commanders are now living. Perhaps the oldest of these is Captain Moses Hoyt. Jonah Campbell was celebrated as a drummer of the former days; he died in May, 1880, at the age of eighty-four years. George Choat, a celebrated lifer, is now living at an advanced age.

There are several financial incidents that may be mentioned in this connection. One of these was the purchase of the town poor farm, in pursuance of a vote of the town, in 1833. This purchase was made by a committee consisting of Stephen Sibley, John Silver and Daniel Chase. The poor farm was the former property of Mr. Chase, of the committee, and was located on Dimond Hill, where now lives Walter F. Hoyt. The town sold the property in 1872. In 1837-38, Stephen Sibley, a committee for the town, received the "surplus money," being paid $2.17 for his services the first time and $4.31 for the same the second. The sum of about six thousand dollars accrued from the two installments.

In the earlier part of this sketch, we mentioned the appropriation of lands to religious and educational purposes. There was also a tract near Putney's garrison that was laid out for a training-field. In time, all these lots became of no practical utility; but, since the town could not sell what was perpetually devoted to a particular use, each lot was leased in practical perpetuity, or for nine hundred and ninety-nine years, or "as long as wood shall grow and water run." The school land was leased in 1786, the training-field in 1796 and the parsonage land in 1798. In the end, the funds from these leases worked into the public treasury, though, for a time, the interest was devoted to the respective public uses indicated by the original intention of the town. The "literary fund" from the State accumulated till 1857, when the schools began to take the principal, continuing till it was gone.

A great temperance reform was effected in Hopkinton during the period of its greatest public prosperity. Drinking had been an almost universal habit. Liquor was sold at all public places at all times. On holidays and other occasions of public gathering, the sales were enormous. There was a time when thirty-six hogsheads of rum were put into one store in Hopkinton village in one week, but a portion of this quantity was doubtless disposed of at wholesale and went out of the town again. A radical change was effected, and liquor-selling was abolished. The conflict was vigorous and prolonged, but temperance principles triumphed.¹ Among the staunch local apostles of temperance during this reform were Rev. Roger C. Hatch, of the Congregational Church, Rev. Michael Carlton, of the Baptist Church, Rev. Arthur Caverno, of the Free-Will Baptist Church, and Dr. James A. Gregg.

Hopkinton can hardly be said to have ever been a manufacturing town, but in the days of its highest prosperity there were many mills of various kinds within its limits. The most important of these were at Contoocook, where, for many years, Joab & David N. Patterson (brothers) manufactured woollen cloths. Abram Brown and John Burnham manufactured lumber, and ground corn and grain. Hamilton E. Perkins also manufactured lumber. There were numerous smaller works at Contoocook.

This town having been a seat of county jurisdiction, there are some interesting penal facts that may be mentioned here. The county jail was located on the South road, so-called, a short distance out of the village towards Weare. The same building is now occupied as a residence by Benjamin O. Kimball. There was also a stocks and whipping-post on the village square in earlier times. In 1818, Captain Benjamin Pierce, of Hillsborough, publicly whipped a culprit in Hopkinton. This was the last instance of the kind in town. On the 6th of January, 1826, Abraham Prescott, convicted of the murder of Mrs. Chauncey Cochran, of Pembroke, was executed upon the gallows in Hopkinton, the execution taking place on a lot just north of the village, now owned by George W. Currier and occupied by him as a pasture. The execution being public, a large concourse of people was assembled.

During the period under remark, there were various local enterprises of minor mention. The Hopkinton Engine Company was incorporated in 1814; it existed about fifty years. The Contoocook Village Engine Company was incorporated in 1831; this organization is still in existence. The Hopkinton Aqueduct Association was incorporated in 1840. The village aqueduct is supplied with fresh, pure water from several springs on the eastern slope of Putney's Hill.

We must not omit, in this connection, a reception to General Lafayette, given in 1825, under the two huge elms in Hopkinton village already mentioned, when the distinguished guest of the United States was making a tour of the county. Very few particulars of this reception have been locally preserved. Miss Betsey P. Eaton, a school-teacher in Hopkinton village, is entitled to credit for preserving so much of a relation as is embodied in the following memorandum:

June 25, 1825. Keeping school in this village this summer, and Esquire Chase called at the door, saying Lafayette was here, and wished me to denounce the school, that we might all have the pleasure of shaking hands with so distinguished a personage. His aids were Benjamin Sargent and Peter C. Brooks, citizens of Boston.

Miss Eaton afterwards became Mrs. Stephen B. Sargent, and later, Mrs. John Brockway.

The Masonic fraternity was influential in Hopkinton in the earlier part of the present century. In 1807, Trinity Chapter was formed, being the second in priority in the State. In 1825, Masonic Hall was dedicated. It occupied a position on the corner of Main Street and South Road, its site being on the lot now occupied by Willard T. Greene. Trinity Chapter was transferred to Concord in 1847, and Masonic Hall was soon afterwards moved to Fishersville (now Penacook).

The Railroad.—The Concord and Claremont Railroad passes through this town. Its chief business station is at Contoocook, where there is a junction with the Concord and Peterborough line. Cars first ran regularly to and from Contoocook in the fall of the year 1850, in anticipation of a line of travel that at first extended only to Bradford on the one hand and to Hillsborough¹ on the other. There was a day of great festivity in Contoocook on the opening of local railroad travel. A subscription was raised, a public dinner provided and music and artillery employed. A thousand persons sat down to eat. The tables were spread under a temporary shed. A free ride to and from Concord was given by the railroad officials. The Warner Artillery came with music and one gun to do the military honors. The gun was posted on the intervalle on the north side of the river and just below the railroad bridge. Speeches were made, the band played, the cannon thundered and people were happy.

Many people of this town paid dearly for this enjoyment. The assessments on original stock made an indescribable consternation. To be rid of their obligations, stock was disposed of at ruinous rates. Disappointment and chagrin was on every hand. Yet the railroad has been a public benefit, though a part of its introductory management was disastrous.

CHAPTER IV.

HOPKINTON—(Continued).

The War of 1861.—Fort Sumter was bombarded April 13, 1861, and the North flew to arms to suppress the great Rebellion. The town of Hopkinton sustained its share of the excitement of the time. Bells were ring, flags suspended, processions formed and speeches were made. When President Lincoln asked for seventy-five thousand volunteers, a response was heard from Hopkinton. Joab N. Patterson, of Contoocook, a volunteer, soon began enlistments in town. The first man he enlisted was James B. Silver; he was enlisted in Deacon Nathaniel Evans' store, where Kimball & Co. now trade. One or more parties from Hopkinton had already enlisted in Concord. Patterson enlisted a considerable number of men, who were stationed at Contoocook till they were ordered to the camp of the New Hampshire Second Regiment, at Portsmouth. The Hopkinton Cornet Band escorted them to camp. Previously to departing by a special train, the volunteers marched through the main street of Contoocook from the square to the Free-Will Baptist Church and remarched to the depot. Their departure was witnessed with many tears by a large collection of people.

During the progress of the war, Hopkinton did her part towards maintaining the cause of the Union. On the 29th of October, 1861, the town adopted the provisions of an act of the State Legislature of the previous June, authorizing towns to assist the families of volunteers. On the 26th of August, 1862, the town voted to pay one hundred and fifty dollars each to all soldiers who had enlisted for the war since the last call for troops; to all who, subsequently to the 1st of August, had enlisted to fill up the quota, two hundred dollars each; to all who would enlist for nine months, seventy-five dollars each; and to all who would from that date enlist for three years, or during the war, two hundred dollars each. By two calls in July and one in August, the government had asked for six hundred thousand men. On the same 26th of August, a vote was passed to assist the families of soldiers to an extent not exceeding twelve dollars a week,—a sum equivalent to four dollars for a wife and the same amount to each of not more than two children. Soon after, Patrick H. Stark and Daniel E. Howard were made enlisting officers. On the 2d of October of the same year, another vote was passed, giving one hundred and fifty dollars each to all soldiers enlisting for nine months, or two hundred dollars if the entire quota was filled. In 1864, during the intense concern for the Union then prevailing, the town voted, on the 1th of June, to raise forty thousand dollars for the encouragement of voluntary enlistments, and also to pay three hundred dollars each to drafted men or their substitutes. The last public action of the town, in anticipation of the future needs of the war, was on the 8th of November, 1864, when the town authorized the selectmen to enlist or otherwise procure men in prospect of any call.

The sums appropriated by this town during the war, excluding benefits to soldiers' families, amounted to something over one hundred thousand dollars. The report of the Adjutant-General of New Hampshire for 1875, volume ii., thus states the summary of Hopkinton's war record: Enrollment, April 30, 1865, 180; total of quota under all calls from July, 1863, 86; total credits by enlistments or drafts, 115; surplus, 29.

In endeavoring to recover the names of the actual residents of Hopkinton who were engaged in military service during the war of 1861, we have met many difficulties. The imperfect nature of the records within our reach, the doubtful location of some individuals, and the difficulty of resuscitating facts that have passed into only a little more than twenty years of history, make the work of identification irksome and partially fruitless. The records of New Hampshire soldiers, so far as they are officially published, are found in the reports of the Adjutant-General of the State, and these reports are so accessible that we refrain from the labor of reproducing personal notes in full. In the list of names we give, it is proper to remember that not all of them are of soldiers officially credited to Hopkinton, nor have we admitted into our list the names of non-resident substitutes. The names we give are classified with sufficient distinctness to guide the search of those wishing to investigate further personal histories. The following list of Hopkinton soldiers is approximately correct:

Later Facts and Incidents.—The town of Hopkinton is to-day, in an eminent sense, a rural one. Possessing a soil favorable to cultivation, its agricultural standard is a high one. The proximity of the markets afforded by Concord and Manchester and their suburbs has encouraged specialties in products. The dairy interest of this town is a prominent one. The farmers of Hopkinton have adopted most or all of the improved kinds of stock, implements and varieties of produce that are adapted to this soil.

There is very little manufacturing in Hopkinton at the present time, if we exclude the various mills and shops that are always considered necessary appurtenances of a complete rural community. There are a machine-shop, a grist-mill, a hub-factory and a lumber-mill on the water-power at Contoocook, and a kit and pail manufactory is there run by steam. There is also a kit-mill and hub-factory on the water-power at West Hopkinton. In 1873, a fire was very disastrous to the manufacturing interests of Contoocook, in burning all the works on the south side of the river. The Contoocook water-power is now owned by Colonel Edwin C. Bailey, who, in 1883, built a new dam across the river.

The proximity of Hopkinton to large markets affects local trade to its damage. There are two general stores in Hopkinton village and four general and special ones in Contoocook. There is one hotel in Contoocook. There are three post-offices in the town,—Hopkinton, Contoocook and West Hopkinton. There are three railroad stations in town,—Contoocook, West Hopkinton and Tyler's. There is a telegraph-office at Contoocook, first opened in 1866. There are two telephone-offices,—at Hopkinton village and Contoocook, opened in 1881.

There is a Congregational, a Baptist and an Episcopal Church at Hopkinton village, and a Free-Will Baptist, a Swedenborgian and a Methodist at Contoocook. A Swedenborgian Church was organized in Contoocook in 1857,¹ but it is not now active. A Methodist Church was organized in Contoocook in 1871.²

A grange was organized in Hopkinton in 1875; a lodge of Odd-Fellows in Contoocook in 1876; a lodge of Good Templars in Hopkinton in 1878; a Grand Army post in Hopkinton in 1882; a Rebecca Degree lodge in Contoocook in 1884. These societies are all now active.

In June, 1880, the Hopkinton Times, a weekly newspaper, was started in Hopkinton village by H. Sumner Chase. In the fall of the same year the office was moved to Contoocook. In January, 1885, the paper was consolidated with the Kearsarge Independent, of Warner. A job printing office is still at Contoocook.

The Contoocook Library, founded in 1871, has over one thousand volumes. The Hopkinton Village Library, established also in 1871, has nearly nine hundred volumes. The New Hampshire Antiquarian Society, incorporated in 1875, has its headquarters in Contoocook, where it has very many thousands of antique and curious articles, besides numerous volumes of books and also pamphlets and papers. In Jones' building, where this society has rooms, there are nearly fifty thousand collected articles of all kinds.

Among the present residents of Hopkinton are Joseph Barnard, commissioner of forestry for Merrimack County; Herman W. Greene, solicitor of Merrimack County from 1876 to 1881; Carlos G. Hawthorne, formerly assistant United States provost-marshal and attorney for the board of enrollment at Dubuque, Iowa, during the late war; John Stevens Kimball, register of deeds for Merrimack County from 1879 to 1881. In Contoocook are Colonel Edwin C. Bailey, formerly a proprietor and editor of the Boston Herald; Edward D. Barham, member of the Executive Council in 1875; Captain Governor A. Curtice, State Senator from 1881 to 1883, and member of the Executive Council from 1883 to 1885; Walter S. Davis, State Senator; John F. Jones, treasurer of Merrimack County from 1881 to 1883.

The inventory of Hopkinton, taken in the spring of 1885, showed 397 horses, 177 oxen, 780 cows, 355 neat stock, 710 sheep. The total value of real estate was $765,050; of stock in trade, $12,776; of mills and machinery, $12,776; of cash and miscellaneous investments, $115,798. The total valuation of the town was $1,006,335.

HOPKINTON.—(Continued).

Biographical Sketches.—JAMES SCALES, being the first minister of Hopkinton, is entitled to further mention. He was a graduate of Harvard College in 1733. He came from Boxford, Mass., to Rumford, where he was received by letter into the Congregational Church in 1737. He afterwards became town clerk of Canterbury. Being licensed to preach, in 1743, he was paid twenty pounds for preaching in Canterbury. Being ordained in Hopkinton in 1757 he continued here as minister till 1770, and is said to have died in 1776. He was of versatile mind, and practiced, with greater or less regularity, both medicine and law. Being public-spirited, he was prominently influential in securing Hopkinton's charter of incorporation, being paid twenty-five pounds by the town for his services. In his later years he preached in Henniker. His remains are said to lie in the old cemetery on Putney's Hill, in this town.

James Scales had a wife, Susanna. In the clerk's record of this town are the following data of their children:

John, born in Rumford, August 4, 1737; died at Canterbury, August 13, 1752. Joseph, born in Rumford, April 15, 1740; died July 19, 1749. Stephen, born in Rumford October 16, 1741. Susanna, born in Canterbury, October 26, 1741.

Rev. James Scales' first salary in Hopkinton was the equivalent of sixty Spanish milled dollars. While in Canterbury in 1746 he was twenty-three days in the colonial military service, under Captain Jeremiah Clough.

JOHN CLEMENT was the first public physician in Hopkinton. He was a former resident, and perhaps a native, of Haverhill, Mass. The site of his first Hopkinton home is on Putney's Hill, a few rods south of the graveyard, on the opposite side of the road. It is indicated by a slight depression and a quantity of stone. Later in life, Dr. Clement, in connection with a son, built a two-storied house on the western slope of the hill, on the road from Hopkinton village to West Hopkinton, a little farther north than his first residence. He seems to have been a popular physician, as his practice is said to have extended to fourteen towns. He had five sons.—John, Timothy, Phineas, Benjamin and James; also four daughters,—Ruth, Polly, Sally and Betsey. Socially, he is said to have been genial and mirthful. His wife, Molly, was probably from Salisbury, Mass. Dr. Clement died November 20, 1804, aged sixty-one. His wife died February 12, 1817, aged seventy-two. Their remains lie in the old cemetery on Putney's Hill.

BARUCH CHASE was probably the first lawyer resident in Hopkinton. He is said to have been a native of Cornish. He came to Hopkinton before 1785. He was solicitor of Hillsborough County from 1808 to 1817. He built the house now occupied by Mrs. Louisa A. P. Stanwood, next east of the Episcopal Church. He married Ellen, daughter of Benjamin Wiggins, of Hopkinton. Two sons lived to old age,—Samuel died March 12, 1875, aged seventy-one; Benjamin Wiggins, January 6, 1878, aged eighty-two. Baruch Chase was an uncle of the late Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase. He died March 5, 1841, aged seventy-seven. His wife died March 17, 1868, aged ninety-two.

BENJAMIN WIGGIN was the most noted of the early taverners of Hopkinton. His tavern stood next building west of the Episcopal Church. He began business here as early as 1744, coming from Stratham. He was landlord, merchant, justice and public servant generally. He gave the site of the old Hillsborough County court-house, where now is the Hopkinton town-house. In a time of scarcity, he sold corn cheaply to favor his poorer neighbors and townsmen. He was twice married. His first wife was Elizabeth Clement; his second, Mrs. Sarah Holt. He had children,—Timothy, Benjamin, Mary, Ellen, and Joseph and Elizabeth, twins. He died October 31, 1822, aged eighty; his first wife, May 24, 1782, aged thirty-one; his second, October 31, 1824, aged sixty-five. Mrs. Ellen C. Greene, now living, is a grandchild of Esquire Wiggins. Herman W. Greene is his great-grandchild.

JOSHUA BAILEY has already been mentioned as a captain in the Revolutionary War. Captain Bailey was a native of England, and was born about 1738. He came to Hopkinton from Massachusetts, and lived about a mile east of Hopkinton village, where now resides Carlos G. Hawthorne. He was one of the most useful citizens of the early times, holding nearly or quite every important office within the gift of the town. He seems to have been twice married. The following were children of Joshua and Anna Bailey: John, born February 23, 1769; Joshua, born November 13, 1770; Elijah, born February 27, 1773; Betty, born May 8, 1780; Rachel, born August 16, 1782; Esther, born March 18, 1785.

Joshua Bailey died April 9, 1806, aged sixty-eight years. Sarah, his wife, died January 29, 1816, aged sixty-four years.

Mrs. Seth Webber, now living, is a grandchild of Captain Bailey.

WILLIAM WEEKS was a native of Greenland, where he was born in 1755, being a son of William and Eleonor Weeks. He was a graduate of Harvard College, and adopted the life of a merchant and farmer. He came to Hopkinton about 1792 and remained there till he died, in 1843. He was a soldier of the Revolution, entering the army as a quartermaster and leaving as a major. During a considerable portion of the time he was an aid-de-camp of General Washington. In Hopkinton he built a house that is now standing in the district known as Farrington's Corner. Deacon Thomas J. Weeks, a son, is now living in the same neighborhood. Major Weeks was twice married. His first wife was Abigail Rogers, whom he married in 1780; his second wife was Sally Cotta Cotton Weeks, daughter of Dr. Ichabod Weeks, of Greenland. There were thirteen children of Major Weeks. Their names were William, George, Charles, Abigail Rogers, Mary, Jacob, Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Sarah Ann, Susan, Hannah, Emily, John.

EBENEZER LERNED, a native of Medford, Mass., was born October 6, 1762, being a son of Thomas Lerved and Hannah Brooks. He graduated at Harvard College in 1787; studied medicine with Dr. E. A. Holyoke, of Salem, Mass.; received the degree of M.D. from Dartmouth College. He practiced a short time in Leominster, Mass.; and then came to Hopkinton, where he practiced medicine and pursued trade. He was the first delegate to Dartmouth College from the New Hampshire Medical Society, of which he was vice-president at the time of his decease, in 1831. He founded the New Hampshire Agricultural Society and was its first president. He was active in all the public interests of the town of Hopkinton, and left bequests to its schools and to its poor, and to the town itself. He was the first liberally educated physician in town. He was twice married. His first wife was Mary Hall, of Londonderry, whom he married in 1802. They had four children,—Louisa, Mary Eliza, Margaret, Brooks Holyoke. His first wife died November 22, 1813, aged thirty-two. His second wife was Catharine, daughter of Timothy Perkins and Hannah Trowbridge, whom he married in 1814. They had five children,—Catharine Crosby Perkins, Edward Augustus, Hannah Brooks, Lucy Ann, Elizabeth Trowbridge. His second wife died September 30, 1869. Mrs. Mary Eliza Flanders, his daughter, is living in this town. Misses Catharine C. P., Hannah B. and Lucy A., his daughters, occupy his former residence in Hopkinton village.

JOHN HARRIS, a native of Harvard, Mass., was born October 13, 1769, being a son of Richard Harris and Lydia Atherton. He graduated at Harvard College in 1791; read law with Simon Strong, of Amherst, Mass., and Timothy Bigelow, of Groton, Mass. In 1794, he came to Hopkinton; in 1799, he married Mary Poor, a native of Hampstead, and daughter of Eliphalet Poor and Elizabeth Little. They had four children,—George, Catharine, Eliza Poor, Ann. Catharine became the wife of Timothy Wiggin Little, of Hopkinton. John Harris lived in the house now occupied by Reuben E. French. In 1810, he was made captain of the Fourth Company of the Twenty-first Regiment of New Hampshire Militia. He was the first postmaster in Hopkinton, holding office from 1811 to 1825. In 1816, he was made a trustee of Dartmouth College. He was solicitor of Hillsborough County from 1817 to 1823, judge of probate from 1812 to 1823 and the same of Merrimack County from 1823 to 1843. He was associate justice of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire from 1823 to 1833. The probate laws of Hillsborough County were revised by Judge Harris and Charles H. Atherton, the commission being established in 1820. In June, 1814, Judge Harris was made chairman of a committee of the Legislature to locate a state capital. He was a prominent Free-Mason. He was the founder of Trinity Chapter in 1807. He was also founder of Tyrian Council and of the Mount Horeb Commandary of Knights Templar. He was Grand Master of the Grand Lodge, Grand High Priest of the Grand Chapter at its formation, in 1819, and first Grand Master of the Grand Encampment of Knights Templar of New Hampshire at its formation in 1826. He was one of the subscribers to the ecclesiastical constitution of Christ's Church in 1803, and was one of the first wardens of St. Andrew's Church in 1827. He was a skillful farmer. Judge Harris died on the 23d of April, 1845; his wife died March 6, 1843, aged sixty-four. There is no descendant of theirs living.

SAMUEL GREENE, son of Nathaniel, was born in Concord, March 7, 1770. He read law with his brother Peter, and began practice in Concord in 1793. He was associate justice of the New Hampshire Supreme Court from 1819 to 1840. He came to Hopkinton about 1833 and remained here till about 1837. After leaving the justice's bench he accepted a clerkship in Washington, D. C., where he died in 1851, aged eighty-one. His remains are buried in Hopkinton village, in the old cemetery. He was thrice married. One wife, Ann N., who died in 1831, is buried by his side. Herman H. Greene was a son of Judge Greene, and was born in Concord in 1802. In early life he entered the counting-room of Alexander Ladd, of Portsmouth. Soon after he became a sailor, rising to the command of an East Indiaman. He left the sea about 1838, and then traded in Bangor, Me., a few years, and next came to Hopkinton, where he died in 1862. In 1851, he took a company by sea to California in the ship "Leonora," also taking along the first steamboat used on the California coast. In California, Captain Greene gave attention to mining, but made one trip to Australia. He returned to Hopkinton after four or five years. He married Ellen C. Wiggin, of Hopkinton, in 1837, who is now living. Herman W. Greene is his son.

MATTHEW HARVEY, a son of Matthew, was born in Sutton, June 21, 1781. He prepared for college under the tuition of Rev. Dr. Samuel Wood, of Boscowen, and graduated at Dartmouth in 1806. He studied law with John Harris, was admitted to the bar in 1809 and opened an office in Hopkinton. He was thirteen years a moderator of Hopkinton's town-meeting. In 1814, he was elected a State representative from Hopkinton, and continued one for seven successive years; was Speaker of the House from 1818 to 1820. In 1821, he was sent to the United States House of Representatives, where he served four years; he then entered the State Senate and served three years, being president of that body the whole time. In 1828 and 1829, he was a member of the New Hampshire Executive Council. In 1830 he was Governor of the State, and was the same year appointed a United States district judge. He was a prominent member of the Episcopal Church, and was a trustee of Hopkinton Academy. He was vice-president of the New Hampshire Historical Society from 1829 to 1831, and its president from 1832 to 1834. Judge Harvey moved from Hopkinton to Concord about 1850, and died there April 7, 1866, aged eighty-five. His wife was Margaret Rowe, a native of Newburyport, Mass. They had two children. His only daughter, Margaret Elizabeth, died in 1836; his only son, Frederick, in Louisiana, in 1866.

GRACE FLETCHER, noted for her personal beauty, and celebrated in being the first wife of Daniel Webster, is said to have been born in Hopkinton in 1781. Her Christian name was Gracia. She was the daughter of Rev. Elijah and Rebecca Fletcher. Her father was a native of Westford, Mass., and the pastor of the Congregational Church in Hopkinton from 1773 to his death, in 1786. Grace Fletcher's Hopkinton home was about a mile east of the village, on the road to Concord, the ancient house being now occupied by Mrs. Stephen Abbott. Grace was educated at Atkinson Academy, leaving that institution in 1801, her mother having married the Rev. Christopher Paige. Grace married Daniel Webster at Salisbury in 1808, while making a home with her sister Rebecca, the wife of Judge Israel Kelly. Her monumental record at Marshfield asserts that she was born January 16, 1782, and died January 21, 1828.

HORACE CHASE was born in Unity, December 14, 1788. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1814. He studied law with Matthew Harvey, of Hopkinton, and opened an office in Goshen in 1818. He returned to Hopkinton in 1821 and formed a law partnership with Matthew Harvey. He represented Hopkinton in the Legislature in 1829, and was assistant clerk of the House from 1830 to 1832. He was postmaster of Hopkinton from 1829 to 1850. He was judge of probate of Merrimack County from 1833 to 1855, and published the Probate Directory in 1845. He was cashier of the Franklin Bank. He was prominent in Free-Masonry; he was made a Master-Mason in 1815, a Royal Arch Mason in 1817 and a Knight Templar in 1826. He was Grand Recorder of the Grand Commandery from 1860 to 1870. He compiled and published the records of the Grand Lodge from 1789 to 1856. He died March 1, 1875. He was thrice married. His first wife was Betsey Blanchard, of Hopkinton, by whom he had four children,—a daughter and three sons. His second wife was Lucy Blanchard, sister of his first. His third wife was Mrs. Ruhama Clarke, of Manchester, who is now living. His only daughter, Mary Elizabeth, died in 1843, aged twenty-one years. Samuel B. and Charles C., his sons, reside at Wright's Grove, Ill.; Horace G., also his son, resides in New Haven, Conn.

CARLTON CHASE, the son of Charles Chase and Sarah Currier, was born in Hopkinton January 20, 1794. He finished preparation for college at Salisbury Academy in 1813, and graduated at Dartmouth in 1817. While in college, he became an Episcopalian. After leaving college, he studied theology with Bishop Griswold at Bristol, R. I. In 1818, he was ordained a deacon at Bristol, and, in 1820, a priest, at Newport. He first became rector of Immanuel Church, Bellows Falls, Vt., in 1819, where he remained about twenty-five years. He received the degree of D.D. from the University of Vermont in 1839, and was subsequently admitted ad eundem at Bishop's College, Lenoxville, Canada. In October, 1843, he was chosen bishop of New Hampshire, and was consecrated in Philadelphia in October, 1844. His diocesan residence was at Claremont, where he had accepted the rectorship of Trinity Church, and which he held till 1863. He died January 18, 1870. Bishop Chase married Harriet, daughter of Dr. Cutter, of Bellows Falls, in 1820, by whom he had eight children.

DYER H. SANBORN, a native of Gilmanton, was born July 29, 1799, being a son of David E. Sanborn and Hannah Hook. He was educated at Gifford Academy and Dartmouth College, from which he received the degree of A.M. He followed the profession of a teacher the larger part of his life, assuming numerous responsible positions in New Hampshire and Massachusetts. He came to Hopkinton as the preceptor of Hopkinton Academy in 1854, and he resided here till his death, in 1871. He held numerous civil offices. He was commissioner of schools of Sullivan County in 1850 and 1851. He represented Sanborn in the Legislature in 1845 and 1846, and also Washington in 1850, being also a member of the Constitutional Convention of that year. He was many years a local Methodist preacher. He was chaplain of the New Hampshire House of Representatives in 1846. He was a Royal Arch Mason, and chaplain of the Grand Lodge from 1849 to 1856. In 1836, he published an "Analytical Grammar," which passed through seven editions in ten years; in 1846, he published a "Normal School Grammar," which passed through eight editions in five years. He was postmaster of Hopkinton from 1858 till his death. During the Presidency of Franklin Pierce, he was for a time a clerk in the Interior Department of the government. Professor Sanborn was twice married. His first wife was Harriet W. Tucker, of Deerfield; his second, Mrs. Abigail Glidden, of Sanborn Bridge (now Tilton). He had one son by his first wife; he died at Washington, in 1852, aged ten years.

FRANKLIN W. FISK, a son of Ebenezer Fisk and Hannah Proctor, was born in Hopkinton in 1820. He lived in Hopkinton till the age of thirteen. From 1835 to 1841, he was a student at Phillips Academy, Exeter, being at times a teacher. He was in Yale College from 1845 to 1849; in Yale Theological Seminary from 1849 to 1852; tutor in college in 1851 and 1852. He was licensed to preach in 1852; was a student in Andover Theological Seminary a portion of 1853; traveled in Europe the same year. While abroad he was appointed to the position of professor in Beloit College, Wisconsin; was professor of rhetoric and English literature from 1854 to 1859. He was ordained to the ministry in 1859. He was Wisconsin professor of sacred rhetoric in the Chicago Theological Seminary from 1859 to 1869. In 1871-72, he visited Europe again and attended lectures three months at the University of Berlin. He has the degree of D.D. from Olivet College, Michigan. He is now professor in the Chicago Theological Seminary. Professor Fisk married Mrs. Amelia Allen Austin, of Woodstock, Ct., in 1854; she died in 1881; they had three children.

JOAB N. PATTERSON, son of Joab Patterson and Mary Lovering, was born in Contoocook January 2, 1835. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1860. In 1861, on the breaking out of the war, he enlisted and took out papers as an enlisting officer. He enlisted a company of men at Contoocook and took them to Portsmouth, where they were massed in the Second Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteers. Patterson was commissioned a first lieutenant; in 1862, he was promoted to captain; in 1864 to lieutenant-colonel; in 1865, to colonel; in 1865, also, he was made brevet brigadier-general of United States Volunteers. In 1866, he represented Hopkinton in the State Legislature; in 1867, he was appointed United States marshal of New Hampshire. In 1866-67, he was colonel of the First Regiment of New Hampshire Militia, and was brigadier-general of the First Brigade from 1868 to 1870. He became colonel of the First Regiment of the New Hampshire National Guard in 1878. General Patterson married Sarah Cilley Bouton, daughter of Rev. Nathaniel Bouton, D.D., of Concord, in 1867, and by whom he has three children. He has resided in Concord since 1868.

SILAS KETCHAM, a native of Barre, Vt., was born December 1, 1835, being a son of Silas Ketcham and Cynthia Doty. In 1851, his father moved to Hopkinton, where the son learned the trade of a shoemaker, following it till 1858. He then entered Hopkinton Academy and began a course of intellectual study, which he continued till his death, in 1880. He was prevented from entering college by ill health, but he graduated from Bangor Theological Seminary in 1863, pursuing the full course and supporting his family by his trade. He studied higher mathematics and acquired a knowledge of French, Spanish and Italian. He was first settled at Wardsborough, Vt., and also occupied pastoral charges in Bristol, Maplewood, Mass., and Windsor, Ct. He at one time resided in Brattleborough, Vt., and was associated editorially in the conduct of the Vermont Weekly, and Semi-Weekly Record, and the Vermont School Journal, leaving Brattleborough to go to Bristol. He was chaplain of the Grand Lodge of Free-Masons of New Hampshire from 1871 to 1875. He was an omnivorous reader and collected thousands of books and pamphlets. He was connected with various societies devoted to benevolence and the promotion of historic and genealogical research, and published numerous discourses and pamphlets. He was the founder of the New Hampshire Antiquarian Society and was its president a short time before his death. He left an unfinished "Dictionary of New Hampshire Biography." Rev. Mr. Ketcham died in Boston, Mass., while on a temporary visit to his friend, Rev. Harlan P. Gage. His remains were buried in Contoocook, where his brother, George H. Ketcham, now lives. In 1860, Silas Ketcham married Georgia C., daughter of Elbridge Hardy, of Amherst, N. H., by whom he had two sons, - George C. and Edmund. Mrs. Ketcham now resides in Newport.

FREDERICK G. SANBORN, a native of Sanborton Bridge (now Tilton), was born January 22, 1836, being the son of Eliphalet and Abigail Glidden. His father dying, his mother afterwards became the second wife of Professor Dyer H. Sanborn. Frederick Glidden received an academic education and became a clerk in a store in Hopkinton and afterwards a book-keeper in Chicago, Ill. Again he became a clerk in Sherbrook, Ct., and a commercial agent for a commission-house in Portland, Me. Upon the event of the war of 1861, he enlisted in the Fifth Maine Volunteers, and was promoted through all the grades of non-commissioned officer to the position of captain. He was detailed as brigade inspector and adjutant-general of the Second Brigade, First Division, Sixth Corps, and was in all the principal battles of the Army of the Potomac. In 1864, in autumn, he had charge of eighty men in Tennessee, getting timber of the Cumberland River for General Sherman's bridges. He was in the First Battalion of Massachusetts Cavalry in the winter and spring of 1865, and was transferred, by order of the Secretary of War, to the United States army, and detailed for duty as clerk in the Surgeon-General's office at Washington, D. C. He was wounded at Gaines' Hill and Cold Harbor. Since the war, Captain Sanborn has resided much of the time in Hopkinton. In 1880, he married Sophia W. Rogers, of Hopkinton.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

CAPTAIN PAUL R. GEORGE.¹

The New England of the early part of this century, and its men and events, are naturally subjects of a sort of filial regard to its resident sons, as well as to the men of New England descent in whatever part of this broad land they may be citizens; for New England, to borrow the phrase of Hawthorne, is to all intents and purposes the "Old Home" of a vast fraction of the energetic population of the Western and Middle States. To them it is historic soil, in which lies the dust of their ancestors, and whither they make pilgrimages of sentiment and recreation.

The New England of the first part of this century was a homogeneous community. Its people were mostly of English stock, but with such peculiarities and traits as generations born and reared in a New World environment would naturally take on and exhibit. There was not then the constant intercourse with Europe which is now so seriously sophisticating and affecting a multitude of Americans. In the early part of the century there was the genuine Yankee, pure and simple, the true son of the New World soil. Immigration had not then seriously diluted the population, which was socially, morally and intellectually of a higher average than any other community ever attained. It is no wonder, then, that this old-fashioned New England and its noteworthy men have become the subjects of so much historic and biographic thought. They were then, indeed, New Englanders who were racy of the soil. Every section of Yankeeland then produced its quota of remarkable characters, who deserved commemoration; for old-fashioned New England was as rich and fertile in its productions of such original characters as Scotland has been at any period of its history.

It is the duty of the ready writers of to-day to see to it that every such character of native growth shall have its due meed of biographic notice, so that future generations may know what manner of men preceded them on this Novanglian soil, who have made it famous by their genius, thrift, energy and enterprise.

Prominent in this class of New England men was Captain Paul Rolfe George, who was born in Concord, N. H., on the 25th of August, 1807. He was named for Paul Rolfe, son of Benjamin Rolfe, both very prominent citizens in the early days of Concord. The latter married Sarah, eldest daughter of the Rev. Timothy Walker. After his death his widow married Benjamin Thompson, widely known as Count Rumford.

Captain George's father, John George, Esq., lived in early life in the adjoining town of Hopkinton, where he was born May 26, 1780. His grandfather moved to that town after the middle of the last century from Haverhill, Mass., to which place his ancestors had emigrated from England in the preceding century. Early in the present century his grandfather, having in 1784 moved to Warner, N. H., located in Topsham, Vt., then a wilderness, with such of a large family as were then too young to be self-supporting. He cleared and subsequently cultivated a large farm on what is known as "George's Hill," in that town, where he died February 1, 1822. Captain George's paternal grandmother was the daughter of Captain Harriman, a retired sea captain, who settled in Hopkinton from Salem, Mass., about the time his father came from Haverhill. These ancestors, on both sides, were noted for self-reliance, persistence and force of character.

Captain George's mother, Ruth Bradley, was a descendant of one of the representative families of the early settlers of Concord, from whom he inherited, with a somewhat delicate constitution, a quickness and brightness of intellect and clearness of perception which became in after-life his almost marvelous characteristics.

His father was from childhood thoroughly self-dependent. Learning the hatters' trade, he followed that vocation through his early life. He was also for many years an inn-keeper, a director of a leading bank, a deputy-sheriff, an administrator of estates and a practical farmer, displaying in all his business affairs great energy, fidelity and unswerving integrity. He had by his first wife three children,—Paul Rolfe, the subject of this sketch; Clarissa Bartlett, wife of Hon. Hamilton E. Perkins; and Susan Emery, who died in early life. By his second wife, Mary Hatch, he had one son, John Hatch, who still resides at the family homestead. He died at Concord, N. H., where he had lived for nearly fifty years, January 9, 1843.

Captain George was educated in the public schools of Concord, but he was too nervously restive in his boyhood and early youth to devote himself to study. His love of trade, embracing in its subjects his jack-knife, clothing and boots in daily use, as well as the most valuable property he possessed in after life, was a passion with him. An intimate friend and associate of his youth says that after he was fifteen years old he had scarcely ever the same suit of clothes or pair of boots two days in succession. Many ludicrous anecdotes are told of this marked peculiarity, which was apparently founded not so much in a desire for gain as in the love of trade. Among his purchases and swappings before he was twenty-one years of age could be reckoned, besides almost innumerable horses, carriages and various kinds of other property, an entire circus and its accompanying paraphernalia.

Soon after he came of age he leased the old Columbian, then the most noted hotel in Concord, which he himself kept for a considerable time. His clerk was Nathaniel White, and Charles H. Norton had charge of his stable. The former subsequently became one of the proprietors of the United States and Canada Express, distinguished alike for his great wealth and liberality, while the latter was owner for many years of the principal livery stable in Concord. Messrs. White and Norton were through life intimate friends and neighbors, and it is not exaggeration to say that no two citizens of Concord ever died more generally beloved or more sincerely lamented. Their affection for Captain George was lifelong and unwavering, and was heartily reciprocated.

Soon after the sale of his interest in the Columbian Hotel he removed to Lowell, then rapidly growing in importance as the chief manufacturing locality of New England, and there opened a large dry-goods store in company with his cousin, Charles L. Emery, under the firm-name of George & Emery. Subsequently his health began to fail, and he disposed of his store, and by the advice of his physician went South to avert the tendency to pulmonary consumption, with which he was seriously threatened, and from which his pluck and will-power alone rescued him. He spent several months at Washington, where he made the intimate acquaintance of many men of prominence from all parts of the country. Upon his return he was appointed to a position in the Boston custom-house, under the collectorship of Hon. David Henshaw.

Captain George had a natural taste for politics, and a special love for the excitement incident to political controversy; and the bitter quarrel which followed the veto of the bank charter by President Tyler gave him the special opportunity to display his peculiar power. He became an ardent defender of the President and the intimate of Caleb Cushing, Henry A. Wise and other young and vigorous statesmen who constituted what was then known as the Tyler Guard. He was appointed by the President naval store-keeper at Brooklyn, N. Y., a position which he held until his active and openly-expressed sympathy with the employés of the navy-yard, in their opposition to an official order that a government vessel should be sent elsewhere for repairs, caused a quarrel with the department which resulted in his removal from office. Subsequently, in company with Caleb Cushing, Robert Rantoul and a few other intimate friends, he made the journey up the Mississippi River to the present sites of St. Paul and Minneapolis, then a wilderness with scarcely a single white inhabitant. They also visited St. Croix Falls, and continued their friends and associates of his boyhood and youth. It was his farewell visit to his birth-place. Soon after his return home he was taken suddenly ill, and on the 29th of February he closed a life of constant activity at his farm in Hopkinton, surrounded by his relatives and friends, in the fifty-seventh year of his age. He was buried in the family lot, in Blossom Hill Cemetery, in Concord, where a fine granite monument marks his resting-place.

Such is a brief account of the life, and some of its incidents, of the subject of this sketch. It will be seen that Captain George's career was a checkered and varied one, full of the variety of pursuit, speculative ventures and political incidents which mark the career of an able and energetic American during the period in which he lived. But, after all, he was chiefly interesting on his own personal account, and for himself, for he was, in his psychological organization, a man of genius. He had an element of striking individuality which differentiated him from everybody else. There was no mistaking him for any other person than himself. His conversational powers were remarkable, and as a talker on the current men and politics of his time he could not be surpassed. His talk was like the effervescence of champagne. It sparkled with wit, sarcasm and irony.

But he was not merely an eloquent and most interesting talker. He was full of practical sense and knowledge, the result of a life's experience in both peace and war. He was the intimate friend and associate of such remarkable public men as Franklin Pierce, William L. Marcy, Caleb Cushing, Levi Woodbury, Robert Rantoul, David K. Cartter, Henry A. Wise, Isaac Hill and B. F. Butler, and it is not too much to say, that though they were his superiors in reputation and in social and political influence, they were under special obligations to him for suggestions and advice which his almost intuitive knowledge of the state of public feeling at any given emergency enabled him to give, and which they fully appreciated. He was in every way qualified to be the "guide, philosopher and friend" of great political and party leaders, for he thoroughly understood the varying moods of the people, being a man of the people himself. He was not debarred from popular intercourse by too much personal greatness and conceit of himself. His wit and brilliant conversational powers made him a favorite in all places of popular resort: thus he knew the masses from his own knowledge, and not at second-hand.

A list of his life-long friends and associates will best convey a proper idea of the appreciation and estimation in which he was held by those intimate with him. In addition to the distinguished men already mentioned, the late Theodore H. Sweetser may be instanced, who, in his day, had no superior at the Massachusetts bar. Mr. Sweetser's face was wont to be lighted up with a glow of pleasure whenever Captain George was a visitor at his office. He would listen with delight while the captain indulged in his brilliant arrow-flights of comment on current men and events, if he happened to be in one of his effervescent moods, which, indeed, constituted his normal mental state.

Richard S. Spofford, of Newburyport, himself also a man of brilliant intellect, and therefore well qualified to appreciate intellectual brilliancy in his associates, cherishes the memory of his whilom friend, Captain George, with peculiar tenacity and warmth of recollection and regard.

Among his intimate friends still living, whose youthful recollections of Captain George are cherished with special tenacity, the names of Charles Levi Woodbury, of Boston, Sidney Webster, of New York, and Daniel S. Richardson, of Lowell,—all representative men of marked capacity,—should not be omitted.

Among his friends and associates, who, like himself, have departed to that "still country whither all are bound," may be mentioned Charles H. Peaslee, member of Congress, and Ira Perley, chief justice, of New Hampshire; James S. Whitney, remarkable for his political as well as business capacity; the genial and witty Isaac O. Barnes, whose intimacy with Captain George left a doubt in the minds of their personal friends which excelled in brilliancy of conversational powers; Tappan Wentworth, prominent as a lawyer and member of Congress; and Fisher A. Hildreth, the cool, philosophic politician,—all of Massachusetts.

Captain George's life covered a period of only fifty-seven years, but it was a most eventful one in the history of the country. He was born in the administration of Thomas Jefferson, and died during that of Abraham Lincoln. When he reached his majority John Quincy Adams was in the White House. Meantime in his childhood had occurred the War of 1812 with Great Britain. He began to take personal interest in political affairs during the administrations of Jackson and Van Buren; but during the administration of John Tyler he was himself a power in federal politics. He lived to see the agitation of the slavery question culminate in a gigantic civil war, near the close of which he ended his career. The United States, as it was in the early part of his life, is now a tradition; for what may be called the better and purer as well as the younger days of the great republic were over in 1845. We are as a nation unspcakably greater, richer and more populous and powerful than we then were; but greatness of wealth and power is by no means synonymous with popular happiness and national honor.

HON. WALTER SCOTT DAVIS.¹

Captain Francis (4) Davis, "The Pioneer," was born in Amesbury, Mass., October 26, 1723. He was the son of Francis (3) and Joanna Davis, who was the son of Francis (2), who was the son of Philip (1), who, when a lad of twelve years of age, sailed from Southampton, England, for New England, April 24, 1638, in the ship "Confidence," of London, Eng., John Johnson, master, as servant of John Binson, of Caversham, Oxfordshire, Eng., husbandman.

Francis (2) Davis took the oath of allegiance and fidelity at Amesbury December 20, 1677.

Captain Francis (4) Davis married Elizabeth, daughter of Jonathan and Sarah Ferrin, who was born February 20, 1724, and their children were Gertrude, born December 22, 1746; Zedulon, born June 2, 1748; Jeremiah, born October 22, 1751; Wells, born March 22, 1753; Ichabod, born February 21, 1755; Francis, born May 27, 1757; Elizabeth, born February 1, 1759; Aquila, June 27, 1760; Paine, born March 28, 1762; Nathan, born November 9, 1764; all born in Amesbury, Mass. Captain Francis (4) came to Warner amongst the earliest settlers, and located at what is now known as Davisville, and was the foremost man in that town from the time of his arrival to the time of his death. His name appears upon almost every page of Warner's history from 1768 until 1785, being prominent in all town affairs, in church matters, and in all industrial, mechanical, milling and landed interests. He was the foremost military man of the town, his commission as captain of the militia being dated A. D. 1773, and signed by John Wentworth. He had three sons in the Revolution, two of whom were at Bunker Hill.

He was a man of the strictest integrity, and possessed the confidence of his fellow-townsmen in a remarkable degree. His was the first grist-mill in the town-ship. He was one of the committee to secure the incorporation of the town, which was incorporated in September, 1774, and assisted in the division of the lots of the township, and was chairman of the Committee of Safety in 1775. In Harriman's "History of Warner" is this paragraph: "In this first legislative body, chosen by the suffrages of a free people, Francis Davis appears the accredited representative of the town of Warner. It is a distinction and an honor to be remembered with pride by his numerous descendants."

Captain Davis was at this time in the vigor of his manhood, being fifty-three years of age. The Legislature was composed of men of rare ability, John Langdon being Speaker of the Assembly, and Meshach Wear, president of the Council. In 1781 he was chosen delegate to the Constitutional Convention which framed the Constitution which was in force, with slight amendments, until 1878, a period of ninety-four years. He was chosen representative the last time in 1784, and served in two sessions in that Legislature, one at Concord in June, the other at Portsmouth the October following, and whilst on his way home from this session he lost his life, which date was November 26, 1784. A heavy rain-storm had swollen Beaver Brook, in Derry, so much that the bridge, which was safe at nightfall, had been swept away when he arrived, later in the evening. The horse which he rode plunged into the stream, and Mr. Davis was drowned. When the body was found, several days later, a mark on the temple showed that the horse had struck him with his foot while struggling in the water; otherwise he would undoubtedly have swam ashore, as he was an expert swimmer. He was buried at Davisville, and just one hundred years after his death a monument was erected at his grave, bearing this inscription, "Captain Francis Davis, the Pioneer, and Warner's First Representative. Born Oct. 26, 1723; Died Nov. 26, 1784." This monument was erected by some of his great-grandchildren, principally by Walter Scott Davis and his uncle, Charles Davis, who, in the summer of 1883, agreed to erect it upon the one hundredth anniversary of his death. Charles died suddenly before the work was begun, but at his funeral his heirs agreed that the work should be done, which was finished agreeably to the original design.

Captain Francis Davis had five sons, amongst whom was Aquila (5), who was born in Amesbury, Mass., June 27, 1760, and came to Warner with his father. He enlisted as a soldier of the Revolution at the age of seventeen years, and saw much hard service, being present at the surrender of Burgoyne, and was honorably discharged May 10, 1780. After the Revolution he took an active part in the State militia, commanding the Thirtieth Regiment from 1790 to 1807, and was brigadier-general of the Fourth Brigade from 1807 to 1809, and in 1812 raised the first regiment of men for one year enlisted in the State, of which regiment he was chosen colonel. He was a man of sound judgment and of marked ability, and was often chosen a representative from his town. He resided in the homestead built by his father, his new brick residence not being completed at the time of his death, which occurred February 27, 1835, while on a journey to Sharon, Me., where he had large landed interests. He was buried at Davisville with Masonic honors.

His wife was Abigail Stevens, daughter of Theodore and Abigail (Watt-) Stevens, of Concord. Abigail Watts was a cousin of the celebrated Dr. Isaac Watts, and the general's wife possessed and exemplified the Christian virtues to a degree that would have done honor to her celebrated relative, Sally Watts, a sister of Abigail, lived many years and died at the general's. A brother, John Watts, was killed in the Revolution.

The general's children were Paine, born 1786, died 1822; Sarah A. (married a Virgin), born 1788, died 1822; Abigail W. (married a Davis), born 1790, died 1869; Theodore S., born 1792, died 1835; Nathaniel A., born 1794, died 1866; Persis H. (married a Currier), born 1796, died 1841; Nathan, born 1799, died 1841; female child, born and died 1801; Charles, born 1803, died 1883; Aquila, born 1806, died 1866; James, born 1809, died 1842.

Nathaniel (6) A., married Mary Clough, of Bos-wagen, and their children were Stephen C. and Lucretia A., born 1830; Walter (7) Scott, born 1834; Gilman, born 1836; Lucretia A., born 1842; Mary E., born 1844; Stillman C., born 1846; Henry C., born 1850. Lucretia (1) died in 1849, and Gilman who was killed in California in 1883; the others survive.

Nathaniel A. was of a roving disposition in his earlier years, and having learned the trade of a silversmith, he made a tour of the United States, working at his trade in the largest cities, making gold beads and silver spoons. Passing through Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, Alabama and Louisiana, as far as New Orleans, he retraced his steps to Mobile, and then turned northward and remained some time at Nashville, and whilst at work at the forge at this place he was attacked by a drunken half-breed Indian, and only saved his life by using in his defence a heated bar of silver. He was at Louisville and Cincinnati several years, and then returned, in 1824, to his native town, and engaged in the lumbering business. After the death of his father the mills owned by him were distributed amongst his sons, and Nathaniel, with his brother James, became owners of the saw-mill.

Amongst the most interesting and important subjects which the historian in New Hampshire is called upon to investigate and chronicle is the early occupation, later development and improvement of the numerous water-powers contained within the borders of the State.

Though not the greatest, yet, in some respects, as remarkable, perhaps, as any in the county, is the water-power at Davisville. The use, occupation and ownership of this power has been in the uninterrupted possession of the Davis family for one hundred and twenty years, although portions of the property have at times been in the hands of other parties; at the present time, and for several years past, the whole falls have been in the possession of this family. Among the earliest industries at these falls were the saw-mill erected by Francis Davis in 1763, a grist-mill built by him in 1768, a clothing-mill built by Moses Carleton in 1796, afterwards occupied by Nicholas Fowler, and carried away by the August freshet of 1826. An iron foundry was also carried away at the same time, and other property destroyed by that rise of water were the bridge and the blacksmith-shop, and the lower dam, built by Charles and one other son of General Davis. There was also a mill for grinding lead, a plaster-mill, a brick-yard and a tannery near by. A woolen-mill was contemplated at one time at the eddy; a dam was built and a canal partly dug, but upon the death of the general the scheme was abandoned. The grist-mill was rebuilt, together with the old house erected by Captain Francis before the Revolution, making it a tavern. James died before the work was completed, and Nathaniel took the whole and carried on the work to completion.

The grist-mill was a model for the times, and its reputation for making good flour was widespread.

The saw-mill was sold to Samuel H. Dow, who operated it extensively for several years, and sold it to Daniel Milton, who operated it several years as a custom mill, and finally disposed of it to the Messrs. Davis. The grist-mill was sold to Henry C. Carter for a paper-mill, who operated it as such until it was burned, in 1869.

Nathaniel A. Davis was of a judicial mind, and made the laws of the State a practical study, and no man ever enjoyed the confidence of a community for honesty and good judgment to a fuller extent than he. As an administrator of estates, a justice in petty trial cases, a conveyancer and drawer of legal documents, a guardian of minors and unfortunates, and an adviser in legal proceedings, especially of the estates of deceased persons, he was largely sought. His inherent love of justice, and belief in the equality of all men before the law, were so outraged by the barbarisms of slavery which he had observed in his travels through the South, that he became a pronounced Free-Siler and consistent Abolitionist. His sympathy for the oppressed rendered more substantial aid than cold sentimentalism would offer, and to him the consummation of the age was the proclamation of Abraham Lincoln of January 1, 1863. He moved from the Fowler house to the old homestead of his ancestors in 1843, and died there October 24, 1866, from the effects of a fall from a pile of lumber, which dislocated his neck. His widow survives and lives on the old place.

The subject of this sketch, Walter Scott Davis, was born in Warner July 29, 1834. In his early boyhood days he was a lad of prominence amongst his associates, full of life and good humor, and became a leader in all boyish sports,—roguish in the extreme, without any thought of malice, yet doing many things that subjected him to a free application of the birch from his ever-faithful parents; but the inbred generosity and honesty of his heart never suffered the punishment to ramor in his bosom for a moment, and the justice of his father's punishment was never questioned by him. Born and reared in close proximity to the river, it was natural that he should be in the water about as much as out of it, to the constant terror of his mother's life, who often followed him with unremitting vigilance in his aquatic sports, securing his clothes at one time and marching him home without them, amidst the jeers of his comrades.

When four years of age a circumstance happened that came near proving the fallacy of the adage "that a Davis could not be drowned." The saw-mill had been rebuilt, and a plank was laid to pass from it to the shingle-mill, directly over the flume. Making an excuse to get some oven-wood for his mother, he passed his Uncle Nathan, who was at work on the front of the mill, and crossing the plank, was unseen by him. Shortly after, the uncle hearing a splash in the water, went below to see what produced it. Seeing nothing, he returned to his work; but, feeling uneasy, went down again, and was just in time to see the boy fast sinking out of sight, and was undoubtedly sinking for the last time when rescued; and when taken to his home, his mother, to show that her word must be obeyed, as he had already been in the river once that morning, and was promised a whipping if he ventured in again, kept her promise, though it seemed quite hard on the lad who had come so near drowning; but he never laid it away in his little heart, but loved his mother all the more for her watchful care over him.

His inventive genius began to develop at a very early age, mending his mother's dust-pan with a piece sawed from the handle of the barn shovel, for which act another punishment was his. He was strong, robust and healthy, though tall and slim, and was proof against the usual epidemics so prevalent amongst children, never having them at all; or, if at all, in so slight degree as never to be noticed. In his youth he was a good scholar; not studious, because his mind readily retained the lessons set before him, so that he did not require so much study, but was always ready to do his part, mindful of the discipline, assisted in this to a large degree, perhaps, by the admonition of his father as to what would take place at home if he was punished at school; for he knew exactly what his father meant, for with "Squire Nat" his word was sufficient, as all knew who knew him. His father being extensively engaged in milling and lumber business, his sons were not kept steadily at work, but were brought up under as perfect an example of honesty, fidelity and justice as was ever set by a father to a family of children, and not the least prevarication or dishonesty was allowed, and although no ceremonial forms of religion were inculcated, yet the cardinal virtues of Christianity were rigidly adhered to, as in the home of the most pharisaical, devout professor. From the age of three to thirteen the summer and winter terms of the district school were attended by Walter, supplemented by several terms in the High School at Contoocook, after ten years of age.

The summer he was fourteen years of age he worked on a farm at seven dollars per month, and earned money enough to pay the expense of a term at Gilmanston Academy the same fall of 1848. Teaching school in winter after he was sixteen years of age, working at haying in the summer and tending the grist-mill the balance of the year, he was enabled to attend school one term at Washington Academy, in 1850, a term at Thetford, Vt., in 1852, and three terms at New London in 1853 and 1854.

This finished his schooling, but not his education. He has been a constant student, as his Cyclopedia, Dictionary, Geography and mathematical books show the marks of every-day usage. He has a remarkable faculty for mathematics, every rule and formula being as fresh in his mind as though he had the books before him; and yet, he cannot repeat a single rule of arithmetic, and never wishes a child of his to learn one, his policy being to establish the principles of analysis, fixing in the mind the proportions which certain things bear to each other, storing the mind permanently with as many stubborn facts and figures as can readily be recalled, as, for instance, the weight of a cubic foot of water, the specific gravity of the more common metals, the pressure of the atmosphere, etc., and let the rules be manufactured as they are needed.

Mr. Davis had excellent success as a teacher, but discontinued teaching at the age of twenty to enter business for himself, forming a partnership, in the winter of 1854-55, with Samuel H. Dow, under the firm-name of Dow & Davis, for the purpose of carrying on the bark, lumber and wood business, and they were in partnership ten years, their business being large and successful, with the exception of 1860, which proved disastrous. The general depression in business, and loss incurred from investing in a large tannery in Lowell, Mass., resulting in a law-suit, in which B. F. Butler and William E. Chandler were counsel, swept away all the savings for the five years previous, leaving him penniless, with a wife and young child to care for; but without a murmur, and no one but himself knowing the extent of his loss, he kept steadily at work, and when the partnership ended had recovered what had been lost. In 1865 he formed a partnership with Paine Davis, under the firm-name of W. S. Davis & Co., for the purpose of carrying on the same business, with farming added. In 1866 the old mills at Davisville were taken down, and a large circular saw mill was erected, with machines for sawing clapboards, shingles, laths, etc. This mill was burned in 1869, and a new one was immediately erected. This firm was dissolved in 1872, W. S. Davis retaining the mills and Paine Davis the farm. In 1871, Mr. Davis formed a partnership with George W. Dow, of Bristol, under the name of Dow & Davis, purchased the ruins of the burned paper-mill at Davisville, and erected a straw-board mill capable of making two thousand five hundred pounds of board per day in the summer-time, drying it in the fields by sunshine. This business, so dependent upon the season and the weather, and requiring so much help at certain times and so little at others, proved very unsatisfactory, and the mill was changed to a steam-dried mill. A Fourdrinier machine and three large driers were added in the fall of 1872; the machine was run through the day, the driers during the twenty-four hours. This was an improvement on the air-dried process, but it was slow and tedious work, only about one ton being manufactured daily. In 1873, Henry C. Davis and Leston Rollins were admitted to the firm, and improvements made in the machinery, by which nearly double the amount of board was made daily than formerly. In 1875, Mr. Davis became the owner of the entire mill, and formed a partnership with his brother, Henry C. Davis, under the name of Davis Brothers.

The entire mill was rebuilt, making of it a first-class mill, capable of making six tons of lined straw-board per day. The rebuilding was begun in 1879 and completed in 1883, though the mill was kept running the larger part of these years, and so perfectly has it been changed that scarcely a vestige of the old mill is to be seen save the foundation. The power at the mill has been doubled by using the water at a distance of three hundred and fifty feet below the mill and connecting it with a line of shafting. The gate of the water-wheel is operated in the mill by wires as easily as though it was situated there. The mill at the present time is capable of making six tons of lined board per day, consuming ten tons of straw and employing fifteen hands. The lumber business carried on by Davis Brothers is quite large, having sawed half a million feet this year for their own use for boxes, which is a new enterprise they are about engaging in, hoping to make employment for a large number of hands in the near future.

In Mr. Davis we find the sterling characteristics of his ancestors fully perpetuated and maintained. He has the absolute confidence of the entire community as a gentleman in every respect, and has not a known enemy in the world, and his business correspondents all bear high testimony to his integrity as a business man, and are unbounded in their expressions of pleasure in associating with him as a genial, whole-souled, upright man. He has unbounded generosity and kindness of heart; his patience is proverbial; no unkind word or look ever escapes from him. No matter how great the provocation, he has a good word for all; is strictly temperate in all things, not a glass of liquor, ale or beer even, or the use of tobacco in any form ever polluting his breath. He is a consistent member of the Swedenborgian denomination of Christians, and carries his religion into every transaction of life.

Amidst all the cares and burdens of his busy life he has not been allowed to sit idly by in the field of politics, but has been sought out by his fellow-townsmen and friends for political promotion.

Descended from Free-Soil, Whig, Republican stock, and from one of the most patriotic families in New Hampshire, he has always been a staunch Republican from principle. Whilst residing in his native town of Warner he was often voted for for prominent and responsible positions, and, although the majority of the opposite party was large, yet, because of his great popularity, he at one election came near being elected a representative from the town. He held many minor offices,—was one of the committee to locate and build the Kearsarge Mountain road; was one of the committee to locate the High School building, and was one of the first prudential committees in the High School District, and organized and started the Synonds High School.

He was Worshipful Master of Harris Lodge, Free and Accepted Masons, in 1882-3; E. King in Wood's Chapter, No. 14, of which he has been a worthy member for many years, and is also a member of Horace Chase Council at Concord. In all of these Masonic bodies Mr. Davis is held in the highest esteem for his exemplary life and his daily practice of the great tenets of Masonry. Mr. Davis took up his residence in Contoocook in 1874, and since his residence there he has been for many years president of Contoocook Academy and one of the property trustees; has been curator of the New Hampshire Antiquarian Society and is now its honored president; has been the presiding officer in the town-meetings of Hopkinton many years, always being elected without opposition, and is an admirable presiding officer, prompt in his decisions and rapid in the discharge of business. He was chosen a representative from Hopkinton in 1878 and took an active part in the Legislature in revising and preparing the General Laws; was chosen county auditor and was one of the building committee to rebuild the buildings at the County Farm, and opposed the extravagant plans for the present buildings, because the expense was unauthorized by the convention, but was overruled by a majority of the committee.

In 1884, Mr. Davis was placed in nomination as a candidate for State Senator in the Merrimack District, and was handsomely elected, making a net Republican gain of nearly one thousand over the vote of 1882. In the Senate he became at once an active member, and took a prominent part, serving upon several important committees, and was efficient in procuring the passage of several important measures, and in defeating others, and was the only Senator who refused to vote for the bill entitled, "Purity of Elections Bill." He was called to preside over the Senate upon several occasions, and did so with marked ability, and won the esteem and confidence of his associates to a degree that will ever be a great pleasure to him.

Mr. Davis is a man of great ingenuity and mechanical skill and engineering. His is the mind that made all the plans and laid out the work for all the mills at Davisville and for all that have been rebuilt there within the last quarter of a century, and has made many valuable inventions and improvements in machinery. He invented and patented an ingenious and valuable gate-arrangement for turbine water-wheels, and is now perfecting a complicated machine for making paper boxes. He has spent many leisure hours in the past few years inventing a calculating device composed of adjustable concentric circles, divided into nine spaces each, the spaces being in inverse ratio to each other as the ratios of the nine digits, and subdivided decimally.

The soapstone ledge at Davisville, which was dis-loaded for another voyage. All this I have done in four days, during which time, you will allow, I must have been very busy. Our returns are molasses and specie; my sales of molasses amount to over three thousand dollars, besides what I want to retail; I had returned in specie one thousand five hundred and seventy five-franc pieces, amounting, in our money, to one thousand four hundred and sixty dollars, which gives us a very good profit, amounting to something like one thousand dollars each."

In 1832 he changed his place of business and took a store at the wharf, where he continued to do a profitable business for several months; but, early in 1834, he writes of misfortunes in business; the last voyages of his vessels proved unprofitable, so that, owing to these losses, the scarcity of money and the depression of business, he was compelled to make an assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors. He writes: "Mother must not be anxious on my account, for I am as happy as ever, and shall have the same courage to commence again as if I had met with no misfortunes."

In April, 1834, he writes that he never saw business so dull; people are failing every day, so that he is not alone in his misfortunes, and he has no desire to engage in business immediately; he also refers to offers to send him as supercargo, and wants to know what his mother and other friends think of his going to sea for a voyage of six months. He thus briefly defines the duties of a supercargo: "My duty would be to dispose of the outward cargo and purchase a homeward cargo; on the voyage I should have nothing to do, but could carry books and amuse myself in reading."

In May, 1834, he sailed as supercargo on a voyage of seven months, and his first letter on his return refers to his good health during the entire voyage and to his grief at hearing of the death of his brother Seth.

About the middle of 1835 he is fearing a war between France and the United States, and says no insurance on vessels can at present be secured. He writes a little later, that when he goes to sea again he intends to be owner of the ship and cargo. Still later in the year, he considered a proposition from Mr. David Pingree to go to the Bay of Bengal and, locating at Madras, to buy goods, consisting of goat-skins, cow and buffalo-hides, cloths and silk goods, different kinds of gums, etc., and ship them to this country. December 23, 1835, when about to sail for Calcutta, he writes that Mr. Pingree agrees to insure his expenses from the time of leaving until his return, and to give him a good share of the commissions, and adds: "I shall carry with me, in specie and bills on London, about fifty thousand dollars, and he is to send me more."

After a voyage of almost five months he arrived safely in Calcutta, and found the city much more impressive in its size and splendor than he had anticipated; to him it seemed "well worthy of the ancient appellation, the City of Palaces."

The thermometer ranged from eighty to eighty-six degrees above zero, but in an airy house and with plenty of servants, he managed to keep comfortable, never going out except in a carriage or palanquin. He was much interested in the manner of living made necessary by the climate, the superstition of the native servants and the beautiful country-seats of English noblemen. He found several Americans, agents of merchants in the United States, and soon became well acquainted with them. When he arrived there were four American vessels in the harbor which were soon to sail for the United States.

The observance of the Sabbath was as strict as could be expected among such people, and he was told by English gentlemen that our missionaries stood in very good repute in India. He soon became absorbed in business and enjoyed his new life, the climate thoroughly agreeing with him. The expense of living at this time, including servants and table, with house-rent, palanquin, etc., he estimated at not more than eighty-seven dollars per month. He was much impressed by the contrast between the condition of the rich and poor, the former princely in their living and the latter miserable in their poverty, with no possible chance of improving their condition. He described a visit he made upon invitation of one of the rich natives. "It was," he wrote, "a splendid place in all respects; the floors of his house were all of marble, and his rooms were furnished in a costly manner. He had for natural curiosities four rhinoceroses, which were tame and feeding about his house, one elephant, one ostrich, one orang-outang and numerous other small animals." The wages of the coolies or laborers who, in crowds, were to be found in the bazaars begging for work in weighing or transporting goods, amounted to nine cents a day. He attended the Scotch Church, so called there, and found all the churches fitted up so as to be comfortable, each one having punks in all parts of the house. "These are machines fitted above the heads of the congregation, throwing the air upon them, and answering instead of fans." October 18, 1836, he sailed from Calcutta to Madras, where he remained less than six months, the facilities for business not suiting him. While there, however, he made a visit which he believed would greatly interest his mother. "Tell her," he wrote to his brother, "that there is no doubt but what I have stood upon the very spot where Saint Thomas of old was crucified. It is a small mountain, about ten miles from Madras, called Saint Thomas Mount, said to have derived its name from the circumstances of the crucifixion. The place is made of great account by the Roman Catholic Church as a place of worship, and they have an old cathedral on the pinnacle of the mount." He described Madras as "crowded to overflowing with the natives; the streets are common thoroughfares for loaded elephants, camels and the natives riding on bullocks and in carriages drawn by bullocks, all of which presents a very ludicrous appearance to the eye of one who has been in the habit of viewing the clean-swept and open streets in the cities of the United States." After his return to Calcutta he availed himself of an opportunity to visit the interior of the country, and in three months traveled seven hundred and fourteen miles on the river Ganges, as far as the celebrated city of Benares. In 1839, in response to an inquiry of his sister, he gave the following description of his manner of life: "I am at present living with an American from Philadelphia, each paying one-half of all the expenses; our house is comfortable and airy, built of brick, two stories high, with good verandah, one large dining-room, two large sleeping-rooms, one sitting-room and other convenient apartments; rent, eighty rupees, or forty dollars per month. Our servants consist of one head man (native title, khanduser), who purchases all our daily provisions and superintends all concerns about the house; one cook, one butler, one sweeper, two boys to wait upon the table, two bearers or servants to do errands and have the charge of our sleeping-rooms and wearing apparel. All our servants are males, no females about our establishment, and each has his regular daily work allotted him. We keep one horse and chaise, and every afternoon, about sunset, we ride two or three hours upon the straud, a fashionable resort for all European ladies and gentlemen. It is a beautiful road along the bank of the river Hoogly, commanding a fine view of the water on one side and the city on the other. One or two hundred carriages usually assemble here about one hour before sunset and drive up and down along the river until dark, this being the most pleasant recreation we have in this country." In the latter part of 1839 he went to Singapore, and on his return stopped at the island of Penang, where he made arrangements to join the firm of Revely & Co. as soon as he could close up his business at Calcutta. The contract was for two years, with the provision that if either partner died, the other was to have full control of the business. He thus describes Pulo Penang: "Penang is a delightful little island near the coast of Malacca. All the level land upon the island is cultivated by Europeans with nutmegs. These nutmeg orchards are inclosed by a green hedge, which makes the scenery beautiful, and the high mountain in the centre of the island, with a road winding around it to the top (sufficiently good to enable a little Barmese pony to carry a man with ease), makes a fine retreat in hot weather. The roads about the island are very good, and every European keeps his carriage and lives in the same style as in Calcutta. The climate is the most healthy of all India, and much more so than that of the United States. I am altogether much pleased with the place." He went to Penang early in February, 1840, and his only partner, Mr. John Revely, with his family, sailed immediately for England on board the ship "Embassador;" nothing was ever afterwards heard of the vessel or any one on board. After a sufficient time had elapsed Mr. Revely's will was opened and his estate administered upon, and from that time the whole business, with its cares and profits, came into Mr. Carrier's hands.

During the next few years his life was uneventful, except that his business steadily increased, so that he constantly had in his care from three to five English, French or American vessels. His old friend, David Pingree, began to send his vessels to Penang, and that business continued to increase until it attained to large proportions.

Upon the increase of his American shipping business he received the appointment of United States consul at Penang, which office he held until his return to the United States.

In the summer of 1847 he received the sad news of his mother's death, and wrote a very tender and appreciative letter in return. April 8, 1849, he writes a bit of interesting news concerning himself, as follows: "I have just received a present from the king of Denmark of a very valuable gold snuff-box, with the royal cipher set in diamonds. It is the most beautiful thing I ever saw, and all who have seen it say the same. It was presented to me by the king, through his Minister of Commerce, as a token of His Majesty's approbation of my conduct as agent for his ships engaged here in the establishment of a colony at the Nicobar Islands during the last three years. The colony is now given up and his ships called back to Denmark."

The following is an exact copy of the paper which accompanied the gift:

"Sir: In presenting to me a report respecting the settlement at the Nicobar Islands, now given up, and the temporary Danish naval station at Penang connected with it, Captain Aschmund has expressed himself in the most favorable terms of the zeal and disinterestedness with which you have rendered valuable services to him in your capacity of agent to the ship under his command.

"Considering the claim which particular zeal in the public service has to the attention of the King's Government, I have most loudly submitted a proposition to His Majesty, that a token of His august approbation of your conduct might be conferred upon you, and His Majesty has been most graciously pleased to resolve that a gold snuff-box, bearing the royal cipher, should be presented to you as a mark of the satisfaction which your exertions in His service have allured Him.

"By remitting to you the annexed bill, I am happy, Sir, to have an opportunity of congratulating you on a distinction so well deserved, and expressing to you the feelings with which I appreciate the zeal evinced by you in His Majesty's service.

"Minister of Commerce, Copenhagen, the 10th October, 1846.

"EILMUM,

"SIR HENRIK PEDERSEN,

"To C. C. CARRIER, Esq., Consul of the United States at Penang."

The royal cipher is mounted upon an oval, elliptical-shaped stone, resembling an amethyst, set into the gold cover of the box. This stone is about two and a half inches long. On the lower portion is a monogram containing the letters F and R, with the number VII, in the lower part, and above is a diadem. The surface of the gold cover around the stone is studded with fourteen large diamonds, while in the monogram and diadem are eighty-six small diamonds. The King of Denmark, at this time, was Frederick VII.

For a period of twelve or fifteen years he wrote in almost every letter that in one or two years, he hoped to revisit the United States; but his business was so large and so exacting in all respects, that he could find no one, for a long time, sufficiently acquainted with the details, and at the same time possessing the necessary executive ability to carry on the business in his absence. Several times he thought he had found the right man, but in each case some accident or failure in some important requirement prevented his confiding the important interests to other hands.

His letters were always cheerful, however, and frequently, indeed, contained numerous pleasantries. After an absence of more than twenty years he compares himself to Rip Van Winkle, and gives a very interesting description of his personal appearance.

His simplicity of character is seen in his constant references to the surroundings of his early days, and in his deep interest concerning every member of his family and every change in his native town.

Not a word of impatience, or of unkind criticism concerning any one, is to be found in his letters, and yet, judging from his oft-repeated anticipations of revisiting his family in his native land, his disappointments must have been many. His letters, also, are distinguished for their reverent and tender spirit, and the impression left by them, individually and collectively, is that they were written by a man of marked nobility of character.

His anticipation of a return to the United States were not realized until the summer of 1859, when after suffering several months from asthma, he completed arrangements for embarking on board ship to London and thence to New York.

When about to sail he wrote: "I am very anxious to be with you as soon as possible. As the time of my departure draws near, I feel that every day I am detained here is encroaching on the time I should spend with you." He arrived in New York September 27, 1859, and proceeded as soon as possible to Hopkinton, where he received a cordial greeting on all sides. He was much amused on the journey from Concord to Hopkinton; by the manifest curiosity with which the people along the road regarded him. He was obliged by his business to be in New York much of the time during the winter, but was anticipating much pleasure in traveling over the country during the next summer.

Early in March, however, he was taken down with the measles in Hopkinton, and after less than a week's illness died suddenly on the morning of March 13, 1860.

During a very successful business career of a quarter of a century, he had accumulated a large property which was equally divided among the three surviving members of his family, his brother and two sisters.

HISTORY OF NEWBURY.

BY NATHANIEL C. LEAR.

CHAPTER I.

NEWBURY is bounded on the north by New London, east by Sutton, south by Bradford and west by Goshen and Sunapee. Its area is 19,332 acres. Distance from Concord, the county-seat, thirty-four miles. This town was first settled in 1762 by Zephaniah Clark, in that part of the town now called Chandler-ville, Deacon Joseph Chandler being his first neighbor in town. The township was granted by the Masonian proprietors, February, 1772, to John Fisher, of Portsmouth, and called Dantzick¹ until November 27, 1778. The population in 1775 was one hundred and thirty.

In 1778, February 3d, the inhabitants of Dantzick petitioned the General Court for an incorporation of the town. The names of the petitioners were as follows: Joseph Chandler, Charles Emerson, Elihu Clark, Zephaniah Clark, Ephraim Bradbury, William Emery, John Clark, James Muchmore, William Emery, Jr., Jonas Hastings, Oliver Emerson, George Hadley, Paul Towle, Samuel Gunnison, Nicholas Dodge.

The act of incorporation was passed November 27, 1778, and the town took the name of Fishersfield from John Fisher, above named, and was annexed to Hillsborough County.

Zephaniah Clark was the first town recorder, being authorized by the General Court to call the first town-meeting, the annual town-meetings being held on the third Monday of March until 1803, when they were changed to the second Tuesday of March.

CIVIL HISTORY.

1778.—The first town-meeting was held in 1778. Jonas Hastings was chosen town clerk; Zeph. Clark and Jonas Hastings, selectmen.

Churches.—At the present time there is only one organized church in town; that is of the Free-Will Baptist denomination. One Union Church edifice at Newbury and one at South Newbury.

Industries.—They are mostly farming. S. L. Lowe has a mill for the manufacture of lumber; also the Fowler Brothers have a very fine mill, where they manufacture all kinds of lumber; also clothes-pins, pail-handles, etc. In the year 1883 they manufactured 3,649,000 pail-handles; in 1885 they make about 1,000,000.

There are three general country stores in town and three post-offices in town; Newbury, South Newbury and Chandlerville are the addresses. The first postmaster in town was John Burns; second, Samuel Jones; third, John Straw; fourth, John Kelley; fifth, Moses Gilley; sixth, Eli Dodge; seventh, Essek Young; eighth, Mary Lear; ninth, N. C. Lear, who is the present incumbent. In the year 1859 the post-office was established at South Newbury, with Josiah Morse, postmaster; second, John Cutler; third, Eli Dodge; fourth, Darius Kidder; fifth, Jeremiah Morse; sixth, Mary P. Morse; seventh, Wesley E. Gilley; eighth, F. A. Messer. In 1873 the post-office was established at Chandlerville, with Benjamin Chandler postmaster; Mr. Chandler is the present postmaster, and is a grandson of Deacon Joseph Chandler, who was born in 1747 and settled in the town in early life; had a family of fourteen children,—seven sons and seven daughters,—and educated them in the evenings by the light of burning pitch-pine knots.

The surface of this town is generally hilly, the soil hard and rocky. Sunapee Mountain extends through the western part of this town, the range running nearly north and south. Near the base of the mountain the land is well adapted to grazing. This mountain is about two thousand seven hundred feet above tide-water. There are no noticeable streams in this town, but many small ones that take their rise on the eastern slope of the mountain, forming at Enfield a large tributary of the Warner Branch of the Contoosook River.

Chalk Pond, lying in the northeast part of this town, is about one hundred and twenty five rods long and fifty rods wide. It takes its name from being underlaid with a very fine quality of white chalk. The waters from this pond run into Sunapee Lake, thence to the Connecticut. Todd Pond, in the southeast part of the town, is about three hundred rods long and ninety rods wide. Gillingham Pond, in the south part of the town, is perhaps seventy-five rods long; and last, but not least in note, is a pond nearly on the summit of Sunapee Mountain that is sixty rods long by thirty rods wide, with clear water and no visible outlet except in high water. It is not inhabited by any of the finny tribe, as all our other ponds are.

Sunapee Lake.—This lake lies within the limits of the town to the extent of five miles. Its water is pure and clear, and it is inhabited by land-locked salmon, trout, black bass, pickerel and many other kinds of fish, which afford great pleasure to the tourists during the summer months. There are two steamboats plying between Sunapee and Newbury,—one the "Edmund Burke," is about eighty-five feet over all and eighteen feet beam, rated to carry four hundred persons; the other, "Lady Woodsum," which is about forty-eight feet long and carries about one hundred persons.

These boats run regular trips between Newbury and Sunapee Harbor and other points around the lake, connecting with trains at Newbury Station three times a day. On leaving the station, the first point or landing made by the steamers is at Pine Cliff, one mile distant, on the eastern shore of the lake. This place is situated on a slight eminence and in a beautiful grove, and commands a fine view of the lake for about three miles. This is a place of summer resort, and some very fine residences have been erected here. Among those who occupy their cottages during the warm season are Colonel John A. White, of Concord; Charles R. Corning, Esq., of Concord; James H. Chase, of Concord; widow of the late Nathaniel White, of Concord; Mrs. B. P. Cunningham, of Boston, Mass.; Hon. M. W. Tappan and M. E. Gould, Esq., Bradford.

The next stopping-place is called Rowe's Landing, two and one-half miles distant, where N. S. Brockway, of Bellows Falls, Vt., occupies his cottage during his vacation. This is a very desirable location for camping-parties, as it is in close proximity to the best fishing-grounds and plenty of good spring-water. The next place of note is four and one-half miles to Blodgett's Landing. At this place is a hotel with accommodations for about one hundred persons, and in connection is a large hall used by dancing-parties and for lectures, etc. It is situated in a fine grove with an elevation of fifteen to twenty-five feet above the surface of the lake. There are at this place, beside the buildings connected with the hotel, about thirty cottages.

At this place is held the Sunapee Lake Spiritualist Camp-Meeting. The New Hampshire Spiritualist Association held here their eighth annual camp-meeting, commencing July 25th and ending September 5th. The meetings had a very large attendance, especially on Sundays, as excursion trains were run from Concord and from Claremont occasionally. The steamers also made regular trips from Sunapee Harbor and Lake View Landing to this place on Sundays during camp-meeting. There is a pleasant grove extending from the hotel to the steamboat wharf, a distance of about seven hundred feet, with plank walks and fine drive-ways, which makes the situation very pleasant.

The Masonic fraternity hold their annual festivals at this place, also Posts No. 10 and 58, G. A. R., and two or three other Posts hold their annual reunion here, besides Odd-Fellows' picnics and reunion of bands, etc.

Sunapee Mountain House is situated on the northern slope of Sunapee Mountain, about two thousand feet above sea-level and about six hundred and fifty feet above the waters of the Lake Sunapee. The host is Nathan S. Johnson, Esq., whose farm contains about two hundred and fifty acres of excellent land, and is one of the best producing farms in town. The surrounding scenery is grand and the view of the lake the best to be had anywhere, while the near mountains west, north and east and the cone of Mt. Washington are in full view. At Newbury Station, very near the steamboat wharf, is the boarding-house of Albert A. Durgin. This cottage is new, with all the modern improvements in style and finish, and accommodates from six to twelve boarders.

Several of the farmers of this town, especially in the north part, on the eastern shores of the lake, take boarders, more or less, during the summer months. Among these are Jonathan Rowe, J. H. Farmer, S. W. Dana, J. H. Blodgett and others.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JAMES M. CILLEY.

Among the early settlers in that portion of Hampton, now Seabrook, N. H., in the latter part of the seventeenth century (1694), lived Thomas Cilley, the emigrant, who married Anne, daughter of John and Mary (Bradbury) Stangan. His descendants have been marked for their strong qualities, many having distinguished themselves in various ways. Among these may be mentioned General Joseph Cilley, of Revolutionary fame; Bradbury Cilley, member of United States Congress; and Jonathan Cilley, also a member of Congress, who, in the early battles with the slave oligarchy, in 1838, was killed in the historic duel with Graves. One of the descendants of Thomas, Benoni, was born in Seabrook, and passed his life there. He also had descendants, one of whom, Benjamin, was a native of Seabrook, and married Betsey Edmunds, made his home, after marriage, in Weare, and here his son, Benjamin, Jr., was born. Benjamin Cilley, Jr., married Polly Emerson. She was of good stock, descending from the Emerson family, whose progenitors came from England and settled in America at an early date. Some gained distinction in the War of the Revolution, and the Emersons of every generation have been known to the public as individuals of activity and usefulness. Benjamin came to Newbury, N. H., and became an agriculturist. He was a sturdy, industrious man, of a healthy physique, and lived to the advanced age of ninety-two, and was a fair type of the good old New England farmer, now almost extinct. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Cilley were Stephen, Ezra, Moses, Benjamin, James M. and Sally. Of this family, only two survive; Ezra and Moses; they reside in Newbury.

James M. Cilley, fifth son of Benjamin and Polly (Emerson) Cilley, was born in Newbury, N. H., October 23, 1808. As his father was a farmer, James was taught all the practical details of farm-life, and rendered his father able assistance in his youth, and remained on the homestead, with the exception of a short period, which time he was engaged in teaching.

He married, December 16, 1835, Sarah B., daughter of Henry and Charlotte (Batchelder) Richardson, of Corinth, Vt. The Richardson family was among the early settlers of Massachusetts, and has numerous descendants in New England. The name of Batchelder is well known in New Hampshire as that of a good and honorable family.

Mr. Cilley always remained on the homestead, and, after the death of his father, he continued to be a farmer. His health was not robust; nevertheless, he was a man of industry and enterprise. The stern virtues, the rigid frugality and the unflagging industry always insisted on in the home-life of the plain farm-houses, supplemented by the limited, but intensely practical, learning gained in the district school, have furnished many generations of men of firm, clear and vigorous mind. These men have been a permenting force for good through all classes of our population. Mr. Cilley was a good representative of this class, a man of sound judgment and clear understanding, and he took a prominent part in matters pertaining to his native town. He held a commission of justice of peace for many years, besides serving as selectman and in other minor offices; all of the duties were done with the fidelity and faithfulness which characterized all his acts. He was a zealous and efficient member of the Free-Will Baptist Church, and was its clerk for over forty years. He was a Republican in politics.

True to his ancestral instincts, the military also had a charm for Mr. Cilley, and he became commander of the organization known as the Newbury Rifle Corps in the old militia days, thus obtaining the title of "Captain."

In the discharge of all the relative duties of life he was governed by a fixed determination to do what his conscience should dictate to be right. He died in Manchester, N. H., August 14, 1882, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. Mrs. Cilley survives him.

keeps her residence on the farm where they lived so pleasantly for so many years, and contributes this tribute to her husband's memory.

MOODY GILLINGHAM.

The first ancestor of the American branch of the Gillingham family was James, who emigrated to Salem, Mass., in the latter part of the seventeenth century, and May 22, 1692, he married Rebecca, daughter of John Bly, of Salem. They had a large family of children,—Rebecca, born February 10, 1693; Hannah, born July 22, 1694; James, born February 2, 1696; Benjamin, born September 7, 1697; Martha, born January 13, 1699; Deborah, born July 28, 1700; John, born January 19, 1704; Mary, born August 31, 1705; William, born December 26, 1706; Jonathan, born October 9, 1709; and David, born December 7, 1711.

James, son of James and Rebecca (Bly) Gillingham, came to Newbury, N. H., where he settled, and had several children. His oldest son, James, was twice married,—first, to Polly Little, of Sutton, who had three children, James, Daniel and Ruth; second, Betsy Lane, of Newbury. They had fourteen children, namely,—John, Huldah, Joseph L., Sally, Madison, Moody, Sally, Ruth, Socrates, Triphena C., Triphosa A., Alzina E., Oliver P. and Bainbridge.

Moody Gillingham, son of James and Betsy (Lane) Gillingham, was born in Newbury, January 21, 1811, on the old homestead. Being one of a large family of children, he was early accustomed to labor, and for the first twenty-five years of his life he was engaged in the quiet domestic scenes of agriculture on his father's farm. About this time he married Julia, daughter of Jeremiah and Marion (Peaslee) Twiss, of Newbury. She was born October 4, 1815, and died June 11, 1869. The children of Moody and Julia (Twiss) Gillingham were,—Charles H., born March 7, 1843; Albert L., born September 14, 1846; Freeman H., born July 26, 1850; Clara I., born March 14, 1853. Charles H., married Elinda, daughter of John and Mary (Marriott) Maud, a native of England. They have had five children,—Maud C., Annie E., Mary A., Moody and Ralph B. Albert L., married, September 29, 1876, Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Robertson; they have one child, Lena M. Freeman H., married, October 29, 1877, Annie, daughter of Cumming and Caroline (Dowlin) Peirce, (the Peirce family is of English descent, and many of its members have attained honorable distinction; Mr. Peirce, although eighty-four years old, is yet an active man). Clara I., married, February 4, 1883, Jesse P., son of Prescott and Helen M. (Hanks) Colby.

After Mr. Gillingham's marriage he left Newbury, and went to Warrensburg, N. Y., where he purchased a farm and remained for two years, devoting himself to its cultivation, when, the death of his father occurring, he returned to Newbury, and was a resident of the town until his death, October 16, 1882, in the seventy-second year of his age.

Mr. Gillingham's political views were those of the Republican party, but he was so universally esteemed by his townsmen that, although the town was largely Democratic, he was elected selectman, and held the office for three years. He was strong, mentally and physically, took a deep and intelligent interest in public affairs, and exerted a great influence for good in the community, and his word and counsels were listened to with respect. He was a man of keen and quick intellect, of great ability in argument, in which he was rarely worsted.

He was broad and liberal in all his views, and, although not a member of any religious denomination, was favorably inclined toward the Universalist faith. From his ancestors, among whom were many good men and true, there descended to him many of the qualities that go to make up the sum of good citizenship and true manhood.

JOSEPH MORSE.

The name of Morse is one not unknown to the public, as many of that family have been prominent men of their day, and stood high in the realms of science and literature. Nearly a century ago a little band of brave-hearted pioneers left their homes in Newbury, Mass., and settled in Fisherfield, N. H., now known as Newbury. This was in February, 1795, and the coldest month usually of our New England winters. Among these first settlers were the Rev. Timothy and Sally (Farmer) Morse, a worthy couple, who have left numerous descendants. They had eight children, several of them being born in Fisherfield,—Susannah B., Moses, Daniel, Joseph, Timothy, Stephen, Sally (1st) and Sally (2d). Susannah married Moses Morse, and had eleven children; Moses married Betsey Cheney, they had six children; Daniel married Hannah Gillingham, and was a prominent man in Newbury, and their children were Almira, Hulda, Sarah J. and Sprague A.; Timothy married Eliza Adams; Stephen married Lydia Gillingham, by whom he had six children, three of whom survive, namely, David M., Charles M. and Sarah E.; Sally (1st) died in infancy; Sally (2d) married Stephen Emerson and had several children.

Joseph Morse, the third son of Rev. Timothy and Sally (Farmer) Morse, was born in Fisherfield, September 11, 1795, and died November 1, 1871, aged seventy-six years. His childhood and early life were passed in the home of the pioneer, assisting in the sturdy labors of the farm, by which he acquired a healthy physique and well-developed muscular strength. He cleared the timber-land, and by hard labor brought the rough soil into a good state of cultivation, and built a log-house near where the homestead now stands, which he erected many years after.

He married Sarah, daughter of William Sargent, of a reputable New England family. They had six children,—Joseph, Jr., Timothy, Harvey C., Mary J. (died young), Seth A. and Laura L.

Joseph, Jr., married Seba A. Thissell; they had two children—Sarah C. and Mary J. Timothy married, first, Mary Bly and had two children, one of whom is now living, John W.; second, Hannah Peaslee; they have one daughter, Etta. Harvey C. married Helen M., daughter of Stephen Emerson; their children were Sarah L. (deceased), Frank P., Almira J., Elmer E. (deceased), Anna G., Page C. (deceased). Seth A. married Mary A. Hoag; they have had six children—viz., Sarah O., Marshall W., George M., Laura V., Lilla B. and Forestall. Laura L. married Ezra Gilley (2d); their children were Joseph E. (deceased), Wesley E., Sarah C. B. (deceased) and Almon B.

Mr. Morse was a man who was much esteemed by his townsmen. He was selectman, and represented Newbury in the State Legislature two terms, and was also a member of the Constitutional Convention in 1850, which was held for the purpose of amending the Constitution of the State.

Mr. Morse was a man of decidedly positive character, and possessed an unusual degree of pluck, persistency and push, and usually accomplished whatever he undertook to do. He was a fine-looking man, of large stature, weighing over two hundred pounds, and of remarkable strength. An old friend of his, Jeremiah Morse, says: "No man could hew as much timber as Joseph Morse." He was born at a period in our country's history when the principal and the best thing to do was to clear the land and bring it in subjection, and he did a great work in this way for the town. He cut a large amount of timber, and the framework of many of the old houses was hewn by him. But clearing and tilling of the land and hewing of timber, while it strengthens and develops the physical nature, tends in no way to dwarf the mental powers. On the contrary, to have strength to work with the brain without injury, we must have a strong, healthful body, and many of the successful sons of the old Granite State owe an imperishable debt of gratitude to their pioneer ancestors for the health and strength they have inherited. In his strong and useful way Mr. Morse contributed much to the town that will last, and his descendants are worthily proud of his accomplishments.

HISTORY OF NEW LONDON.

BY HON. J. EVERETT SARGENT.

CHAPTER I.

ON the 25th of June, 1779, the Great and General Court of the State of New Hampshire passed an act incorporating the town of New London out of a tract of land that had previously been known as "Alexandria Addition." The town, as at first incorporated, contained much territory that does not now belong to it; and, also, it did not contain considerable territory which now constitutes a part of it.

But although the town was not incorporated until 1779, it had been inhabited several years previous to that, and in giving a historical sketch of the town it will be not only interesting, but proper and necessary, to go back as far as we can trace any step of the white man; and it would be interesting also, had we the means of doing so, to go even back of that, and to describe what savage tribes, what sons of the forest, what race of the red men formerly frequented these hills and mountains, and tracked their devious ways through the dense forests that then covered these hills and valleys; who hunted their game in these regions while the woods were yet unbroken; and sailed upon our glassy lakes and ponds in their bark canoes, when as yet their waters had never mirrored forth the forms or the features of any of the race of pale-faces, the descendants of the English. But all the facts in relation to these times have perished from human memory, and all the traditions in regard to former races of men who may have once, in the ages of the past, inhabited these regions, are forgotten and have passed away forever; and we can only draw upon our imaginations to picture the races of men, the modes of living, the habits, pursuits and characteristics of the people who may, at some distant day in the far past, have lived and labored, loved and hated, enjoyed and suffered, in these places which we now occupy.

Indian settlements in this town were far back before any white man had knowledge of these localities. The Indian wars were over and the few scattering remnants of the race that remained had retired from the unequal contest, had ceased their depredations and left the State (except perhaps in the extreme northerly portion) before this town was settled, and we look almost in vain for any trace of them in this region. The only name I found anywhere in the neighborhood that indicates that the Indians ever dwelt here is the name of "Sunapee" Lake. That name is unmistakably Indian. It means in plain English "Goose," and Sunapee Pond meant simply Goose Pond. The theory is that at some time in the past this lake was found to be a favorite resting-place for the Canadian wild geese, as they migrated from the regions of Hudson Bay southward at the approach of winter, flying, as they always do, at a great height, and, like a well-trained military company, following their leader in such a way as to describe the sides of a triangle with the angle in front, or, as our farmers would familiarly express it, in the shape of a harrow.

The size of the lake would cause it to be seen from a great distance on either side, and thus it would be sure to be sought as a place of rest and refreshment for a time by the wild geese, as they went southward in the autumn and northward in the spring, and we infer that the Indians were familiar with this fact, and hence the name "Sunapee,"—Goose Pond.

Doubtless the Indians were also familiar with the Little Sunapee Pond, in the northwesterly part of the town, and Messer's and Clark's or Harvey's Ponds, in the southerly part, and crossed the height of land and descended to Pleasant Pond, in the northerly part of the town. But, however that may be, one fact remains, which is that New London is the highest land, or furnishes the dividing line between the Connecticut and the Merrimack Rivers, and it is said there are buildings in town from the roofs of which the water descends from one side to the Merrimack and from the other side to the Connecticut River.

I find this account of traces of the Indians in Sutton, near Kezar's Pond, in the northerly part of the town and not far from the line of New London. Sutton was then known as Perrystown and was settled first in 1767, some eight years before this town was settled, and it was stated of the early settlers there, that though no Indian was seen by them, yet it seemed as though he had just put out his fire and gone away as the white man came. His track was still plain and visible. On the west bank of Kezar's Pond were several acres of land which appeared to have been cleared by them of their original forests. Here were found several Indian hearths built with stone, with much skill and ingenuity. Here was found an Indian burying-place. Gun-barrels and arrows have also been found here, and near the pond were found stone mortar-pestles and tomahawks.

It is certain that these regions were once, and that not long before the advent of the pale-faces, inhabited by the red man; he hunted his game over these hills and encamped and lived on the banks of our Great Lake—Sunapee—and of our smaller ponds, nestling as they do in beauty among our hills. Large numbers of Indian utensils and arms have been found by Mr. James M. Pike and Mr. Amos Currier in the west part of the town near Sunapee Lake, leading us to believe that the Indians had a settlement on the border of the lake in that neighborhood, and that they had a track or path from such settlement down by Harvey's Pond to North Sutton, to Kezar's Pond. They also visited Little Sunapee Pond and had a settlement in the summer season on its easterly shore, and had a track or path from thence easterly over the height of land to the upper end of Pleasant Pond, where they also had another settlement, and where they had cleared up the forests on the intervals; and this clearing was the first place occupied by the white man in that part of the town. They were in the habit of hunting in summer all over our hills, and their arrow-heads of stone have been found by General McCutchins, by Mr. Nathan Pingree, Mr. Ransom Sargent and others, and a few years since Mr. Asa Ray plowed up an Indian gouge in the path leading from Little Sunapee to Pleasant Pond, which is now in possession of Mr. S. D. Messer.

New London was first settled in 1775, some four years before it was incorporated. James Lamb and Nathaniel Merrill were the first settlers, and they were soon followed, in the same season, by Eliphalet Lyon and Ebenezer Hunting. The next year, 1776, the first child was born within the limits of the town, a son of James Lamb, and they called his name John. James Lamb is said to have made the first settlement on the farm known as the Ezekiel Knowlton farm. It is also related that Moses Trussell came up from Hopkinton in 1774, and camped in the wilderness and felled several acres of trees on the Morgan farm, so-called, adjoining the Knowlton farm; that he burned off the land and planted it with corn; that in the autumn he returned again to harvest his crop, but finding that he had been anticipated by the hedge-hogs and other wild animals, he returned to Hopkinton, and the next spring, instead of coming to New London, he went to Bunker Hill, where he lost an arm and did not get back to New London until 1804, just thirty years after his first visit. Soon after 1775 came also Mr. Samuel Messer, Benjamin Eastman, Nathaniel Everett, Nathaniel Goodwin, Ephraim Guile and John Austin, with Jedediah Jewett and Thomas Whittier and others, and in March, 1779, these citizens petitioned "the Honorable General Court of the State of New Hampshire, then sitting at Exeter," that they might be incorporated into a town.

The following is a copy of the petition:

"To the Honor. Council and house of Representatives Convened at Exeter the Second Wednesday of march Next

"The humble Petition of a number of inhabitants of a Tract of land in the State of New Hampshire Known by the name of Alexandria addition or new London Situat. The act of incorporation was as follows:

"In the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine.

"STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

"An act to incorporate a place called Addition of Alexandria, in the county of Hillsborough.

"Whereas, a petition has been preferred to the General Court in behalf of the inhabitants of a tract of land called Addition of Alexandria, in the county of Hillsborough, setting forth that they labor under great inconveniences for want of incorporation, and praying that they may be incorporated, of which public notice has been given and no objection has been given.

"Be it therefore enacted by the Council and House of Representatives in general court assembled, and by authority of the same, that there be and hereby is a township erected, and incorporated by the name of New London within the following bounds, viz.: Beginning at the south-westerly corner of Alexandria, aforesaid, on the patent line, and running on said patent line to Fishers-field Corner in Great Sunapee Pond; from thence east on the northerly side line of Fishersfield four hundred and seventy-two rods, to Perrystown Corner; then north, eighty-five degrees east, about four miles to a beech tree marked on Perrystown line; from thence north, thirty-nine degrees east, about sixteen hundred and seventy-two rods to a beech tree marked in Alexandria Corner; from thence north, twelve degrees west, to the patent line aforementioned on the westerly side of Alexandria.

"And the inhabitants of said township are hereby erected into a body politic and corporate, to have continuance and succession forever, and invested with all power, and enfranchised with all the rights, privileges and immunities, which any town in the state holds and enjoys, to hold to the said inhabitants and their successors forever.

"Mr. Samuel Messer is hereby authorized to call a meeting of said inhabitants, to choose all necessary and customary town officers, giving fourteen days' notice of the time and place and design of such meeting, and the officers then chosen shall hereby be invested with all the power of such officers in any other town in the state, and every other meeting which shall be annually hold in said town for that purpose shall be on the second Tuesday of March forever.

"State of New Hampshire. In the House of Representatives, June 24th, 1779. The foregoing bill having been read a third time, 'rested that it pass to be enacted.'

"Sent up for concurrence

(Signed)

"JOHN LANGDON, Speaker.

"In Council June 25th, 1779. This bill was read a third time, and voted that the same be enacted."

(Signed)

"M. WARE, President.

"Copy examined by E. Thompson, Secretary."

Mr. Samuel Messer called a meeting of the freeholders and other inhabitants qualified by law to vote in town affairs, on Tuesday, the 3d day of August, 1779, of which he gave due notice, for the following purposes, viz.:

"Firstly—To choose a Town Clerk.

"Secondly—To choose Selectmen.

"Thirdly—To choose a Constable and such other officers as shall be thought proper in town.

"Fourthly—To see what method the town will take to have roads.

"Fifthly—To know what sums of money shall be granted to pay the town charges for the present year.

"Sixthly—To see if the town will vote to hire preaching.

"Seventhly—To see if the town will hire any school for children."

In compliance with said warrant, the inhabitants of New London met at the dwelling-house of Mr. Samuel Messer, at which time was read the copy of the act of incorporation of this town, Mr. Messer's power, given him by said honorable court, to call said meeting, after which was read the notification for said meeting, of which Mr. Messer was considered as moderator, and then proceeded to act on the business of the day.

Town officers chosen by written votes: Ebenezer Hunting, town clerk; Mr. Samuel Messer, Mr. Benjamin Eastman and Mr. Nathaniel Everett, for selectmen; and Mr. Nathaniel Goodwin, for a constable; Mr. Nathaniel Everett, for town treasurer; and Mr. Benjamin Guile and Mr. John Austin, for surveyors. All of whom were duly sworn.

"Voted, To choose a committee to lay out roads where, at present, necessary.

"Voted, That Mr. Samuel Messer, Mr. Benjamin Eastman and Mr. Nathaniel Everett serve as a committee to lay out roads this year.

"Voted, That roads be laid out three rods wide.

"Voted, To purchase the land for said roads.

"Voted, That four hundred and fifty pounds be raised for clearing roads, and that labor shall be three pounds per day.

"Voted, That one hundred and eighty pounds be raised to pay town charges.

"Voted, Not to hire any preaching this year.

"Voted, To hire three months' schooling this year."

The meeting dissolved.

It will be observed that the act of incorporation of this town was passed about midway during the time of the Revolutionary War. The first settlements were made in the year 1775, the same year that witnessed the commencement of the war at Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill. The first child was born here in 1776, the year in which, upon the 4th of July, the ever-memorable Declaration of American Independence was adopted by the Continental Congress. This year was also noted for another event which no son of New Hampshire should forget,—that is, that on the 5th day of January of that year a temporary constitution was adopted by this State, which was the first written Constitution adopted by any of the States now constituting the American Union. Under this constitution the State was prosperously governed for eight years, and until the new Constitution of 1781 went into effect. The form of government was not much changed by the Constitution of 1776.

Before that the government of the State consisted of a Royal Governor, appointed and commissioned by the King of England, with a Council, also appointed by the King, and an Assembly elected by the people of the several towns in the province. After the separation from the mother-country the State elected their Council and also their Assembly or House of Representatives, and the Council elected their presiding officer, who acted for the time being as Governor; hence the act of incorporation was passed by the House of Representatives, then by the Council, and was signed by M. Ware, president. This was the form of government until the new Constitution of 1784, when we had a president and an advisory Council, with a Senate and House of Representatives, all elected by the people. Meshech Ware was president of the Council for the eight years that the temporary constitution continued, and one year under the new Constitution. It will also be observed that the town was incorporated some two years, nearly, after the Articles of Confederation had been adopted by the American Congress, that having been done November 15, 1777.

By examining the boundaries of the town as incorporated, we see that it was of very ample proportions as compared with its present size. It began at the southwesterly corner of Alexandria, on the patent line, etc. Alexandria was formerly much larger than it now is; for, besides several other pieces that have been taken off from it, the whole township of Danbury was incorporated June 18, 1795, out of territory that before was the southwesterly portion of Alexandria, so that when New London, in 1779, began at the southwest corner of Alexandria it would be the same now as beginning at the southwest corner of Danbury on the patent line.

But what was this patent line? New Hampshire, as it seems, was granted by the Council of Plymouth, England, to one John Mason in 1629. This patent included the land "from the middle of the Pascatagua River, and up the same to the farthest head thereof, and from thence northward until sixty miles from the mouth of the harbor were finished; also through Merrimack River to the farthest head thereof, and so forward up into the land westward, until sixty miles were finished; and from thence to cross overland to the end of the sixty miles accounted from Pascatagua River, together with all islands within five leagues of the coast." This tract of land was called New Hampshire. In 1768 the Masonian proprietors procured one Robert Fletcher, as a surveyor, to run out their territory, claiming that their line should be a curve line drawn from the point on the south line of the State sixty miles west from the sea-coast, to a point on the east line of the State sixty miles north of the sea-coast, in such a way that it should, at every point, be sixty miles from the coast. This claim of Mason, and after him of the Masonian proprietors, to this curve line had never been disputed by the government of England, and so Fletcher run the line as requested, starting on the south, on the west of the town of Fitzwilliam, and so running northerly and northeasterly through Marlow, Sullivan, Goshen, and so on what was afterwards the northwest line of New London and Wilmot, and thence, through Hebron, Plymouth, Campton and Sandwich, to the town of Conway. This was known as the westerly line of the Mason patent, and is hence called the patent line.

So New London, after starting at the corner of Alexandria (now Danbury), on this patent line, was to run on this patent line to Fishersfield Corner. Fishersfield had been incorporated the year before New London (November 27, 1778), and is bounded on the north-west by the same patent line. Its name was changed to Newbury in 1837. Then the line of the town runs easterly on the north line of Fishersfield to the corner of Perrystown (now Sutton), thence on Perrystown north line a given number of rods to a marked tree, and there turning off and running north, thirty-nine degrees east, to Alexandria corner (now Danbury south corner), and thence on Alexandria (now Danbury) to the place of beginning.

This patent line remained unchanged, though undecided, marking the claim of the Masonian proprietors, until after the termination of the Revolutionary War, in 1783, when, various disputes arising relating to the titles to the land, several parties petitioned the Legislature to locate and establish this line. Whereupon, by an act of 1787, the bound on the south line of the State was fixed near the southwest corner of Rindge, and thence running a straight line instead of a curved line to the bound on the easterly side of the State. This line run through Peterborough, Frances-town, Hopkinton, Concord, Gilmanton, and so across the lake through Ossipee, making a difference here in the centre of the line of some thirty miles between the two lines.

Having thus ascertained what was meant by the patent line, the next question that arises is, How came the territory now known as New London to have been called "Alexandria Addition?" or the addition of Alexandria? It is so called in the petition of the inhabitants for their act of incorporation, and is so designated in said act of incorporation. But why was it so called? I have looked in vain for an answer to that question among all the books of charters and acts of incorporation and other records in the office of the Secretary of State at Concord, where such records should be found. Upon going to the records of the town of Alexandria, we found that the town had been granted by the Masonian proprietors to Joseph Butterfield, Jr., and others, March 13, 1767, including much of what is now Alexandria and all of Danbury.

But the conditions upon which this grant was made were not performed by the grantees, and so the grantors, the Masonian proprietors, re-entered upon the land, and thus became legally seized and possessed again of the lands.

On the 7th day of July, 1773, the Masonian proprietors, at a meeting held at Portsmouth, issued a new grant of Alexandria, including the same land which had been included in the former grant, to Jonas Minot, Matthew Thornton and others. This grant was described as bounded on the northwest by Mason's patent line. The said Masonian proprietors, at the same time, July 7, 1773, acted that there be, and there hereby is granted unto the before-named Jona Minot, and others, upon the terms, conditions, limitations and reservations hereinafter mentioned,

"That that there be, and there hereby is, granted to the before-named Jona Minot, and others, upon the terms, conditions, limitations and reservations hereinafter mentioned: A certain tract of land situated in the county of Hillsborough and Province of New Hampshire, bounded as follows, viz: beginning at the southwestly corner of Alexandria, aforesaid, on the patent line, and running on said patent line to Fishersfield Corner in Great Sunapee Pond; from thence east on the northerly side line of Fishersfield, 42 rods, to Perrystown Corner; thence north, eighty-five degrees east, about four rods, to a beech tree marked on the Perrystown line; from thence north, thirty nine degrees east, about 1672 rods, to a beech tree marked in Alexandria Corner; from thence north, 12 degrees west, to the patent line aforesaid on the westerly side of said Alexandria."

One of the terms and conditions of the grant was, that "within ninety days from this date the lots of said grantees shall be drawn or divided, and a schedule of the numbers returned to the said grantors within that time, with the list of the settling lots and the lots thereto belonging; and that said grantees, within said ninety days, shall vote an acceptance of both said grants, and make a record of such acceptance."

There was a meeting of the grantees of these lands holden at Londonderry September 7, 1773, at which it was voted "that the proprietors accept of the grant agreeably to the condition of the charter granted to them by the proprietors of Mason's patent, bearing date July 7th, 1773, which grant includes the township called Alexandria, in the county of Grafton, and the land called the 'Addition of Alexandria,' lying in the county of Hillsborough, both in the Province of New Hampshire."

Here we have the origin of the term Addition of Alexandria, which addition was bounded precisely as the town of New London was when first incorporated. We also find that all the lands in the town of New London and much of Wilmot were lotted and drawn to the proprietors while it was thus known as the Addition of Alexandria, and probably within the ninety days after the date of the grant, for the records of Alexandria show the drawing of these lots, and among the different lots drawn by one Robert McMurphy was lot No. 108, and at the end of his drawing it says, "and all the common land adjoining the lot 108, by Little Sunapee Pond." The records of the proprietors of Alexandria, to whom this addition was also granted, have been destroyed by fire, from 1779, the year New London was chartered, down to 1793. After this latter date I find that the Addition is often spoken of as the Alexandria Addition, alias New London, and a number of meetings of these proprietors were held in New London, after 1793, at the house of Joseph Colby, Esq.

Thus we see that the lands in New London were originally, and are still, held under this grant of the Masonian proprietors to Jonas Minot and others, of this territory as an addition to the town of Alexandria, and all the plans of the town are based upon that grant, and upon the allotments and drawings or purchase of lots under that title. But these grants of the territory gave only the title to the lands, and did not give any political or municipal rights, and hence, when the inhabitants desired to act as a body politic, to lay out highways and build the same, to elect town officers, to impose taxes for town purposes, for schools or for preaching, they needed an act of incorporation by the State government, which was obtained in 1779, as has been seen, and the town organized and making progress under the same.

I find a difference of opinion in regard to the original name of New London. Some say its first name was Dantzick, others that it was first called Heidleburg. Which are right? The earliest writer I have been able to find on that subject is Dr. Belknap, the author of the early history of New Hampshire. In the third volume of his history of this State he gives us a table of statistics, in which, on page 235, he mentions Fishersfield (now Newbury), and says of it "First called Dantzick," and on page 236 he mentions New London, and says of it, "First called Heidleburg." He mentions these both as facts that were to his mind well authenticated, and concerning which there was no dispute or doubt.

The "New Hampshire Gazetteer" of 1823 (Farmer & Moore's) says that Fishersfield was first called Dantzick, according to Dr. Belknap, and that New London's "first name was Dantzick; Dr. Belknap says Heidleburg." But they give us no reasons why they differ in opinion from Dr. Belknap in this regard. Dr. Bouton follows Farmer & Moore and says that New London was first called Dantzick, but says nothing of Fishersfield. Fogg, in his "Gazetteer," says that Newbury (formerly Fishersfield) was originally called Dantzick, and says the same of New London. No one of them, subsequent to Dr. Belknap, has given any reason for differing from him, nor do they refer us to any books, maps or records to substantiate their claim. I have been able to find nothing in the office of the Secretary of State bearing upon the question. In the State Library are many maps and charts, which I have consulted. Carrigan's Map of New Hampshire, published in 1816, shows nothing on this point, but it shows the curve line which was for many years claimed as the western and northwestern boundary of the Masonian grant. Neither does Dr. Belknap's map, in the first volume of his history show anything upon the point in controversy, while it does show the straight line, that was established in 1787 by the Legislature, as the northwestern boundary of said Masonian grant. Holland's Map of New Hampshire, published in London, Eng., in 1784, from a survey made about 1775, gives us no aid in this matter.

But I find a large Atlas of Maps in the State Library, published in London, Eng., in 1768, in which is a map of New Hampshire, which is said to have been made from surveys of the State, made by Mitchell and Hazzen in 1750. Upon this map we find put down Protectoweth (now Springfield), Alexandria, Heidleburg, Dantzick and Perrystown (now Sutton), and judging from that map, and comparing it with our modern maps, it would seem to leave no doubt that Dr. Belknap is right. Dantzick, on the map, covers nearly all the territory now covered by Newbury, and extends easterly so as to cover a considerable part of what is now Sutton; but it does not extend farther north than the north line of Newbury and Sutton, and Heidleburg lies north of Dantzick, and covers very nearly the ground afterwards covered by New London.

I also find another map of New Hampshire in the same atlas, prepared by Colonel Joseph Blanchard and Rev. Samuel Langdon, at Portsmouth, N. H., in 1761, and engraved and published in London with the rest, in which the curve indicating the claim of Mason on the west and northwest is well marked, and showing all the towns in the vicinity within that curve line, and scarcely anything outside of it, showing New Chester, Alexandria, Heidleburg, Dantzick, Perrystown and other towns around it on the east and south; from all which I am led to the same conclusion, as to the location of Heidleburg, as before.

There is one other circumstance which has great weight with me. My father was born in Hopkinton in 1768, and removed thence to New London in 1781, when thirteen years old, and he was eleven years old when the town was incorporated as New London. He used to tell me often about his moving to New London with his father; that his father had been talking of moving there several years before he did go, and that this tract of land was known in Hopkinton as Heidleburg until the time of its incorporation, and that in 1781, when he moved there, the name of Heidleburg was quite as frequently applied to it as New London, though both were used indiscriminately in common conversation; that Dantzick was the name applied to the region round the south end of Sunapee Lake, while Heidleburg was to the northeast of it.

The only trouble with these old maps is that Sunapee Lake, being put down without regard to any actual survey, is often represented on them as extending much farther south than it should be, as compared with the surrounding territory. All the authorities agree that Newbury (formerly Fishersfield) was originally called Dantzick; and I think, upon investigation, it is equally well settled that the original name of New London was Heideburg. I have no particularity for one name more than the other, and have only endeavored to get at the truth in this matter. I am inclined to think that the first settlers were wise in selecting the plain English name of New London in preference to either of them.

CHAPTER II.

LET us now return to the records of the town and see what progress our new municipal corporation has been making. They held their meetings annually for the choice of town officers, and many special meetings were also holden; one was notified and held February 12, 1781, "to see what method the town will take to procure a man for the Continental Army," and it was "Voted, That some man be procured for the Continental Army," also that "the selectmen be a committee to hire a man for this town to serve in the Continental Army for three years."

Also, at a meeting held September 24, 1781, "Voted, to raise silver money to pay for beef purchased for this year, and to pay the soldier hired for this year."

At the annual town-meeting, held in March, 1782, after choosing town officers, etc., they "Voted, Twenty hard dollars to be raised for town charges.

"Voted, To grant money for school, — twelve hard dollars granted.

"Voted, Seventy-five dollars for highways; work to be three shillings per day.

"Voted, To do something towards the support of Mr. Ambrose, preacher. Chose a committee to enquire into his wants, and supply according to our proportion, and that an average of the same be made. The committee was Nathaniel Everett and Mr. Samuel Mosser.

"Voted, To join Perrystown and Fishersfield, and petition the General Court that these towns may be joined in a presentation."

We find nothing to show that New London was ever classed with Perrystown and Fishersfield to send a representative, but it was soon classed with Perrystown, which was incorporated as Sutton in the year 1784, April 15th.

The town records do not show who was procured as the soldier in the Continental army; but I find in the Adjutant-General's office, among a mass of old papers and records, one with the following heading: "Return of Soldiers mustered in the years 1781 and 1782, to fill up the Continental Army, with the towns and places they engage for, and time when mustered in, for each of which a bounty of twenty pounds was promised by the acts and resolves of the General Court."

Upon this paper the names of the different towns are entered, with the names of the soldiers and the date of their mustering in. Under the heading "New London" is the name "Francis Comas, 1781, April 23." The town is also credited in another place on this paper with one man for the year 1781, £60; one man for the year 1782, £60; one man for the year 1783, £54 12s. We find that the army was disbanded November 3, 1783, our independence having been secured by treaty before that time.

At the annual town-meeting in March, 1783, held at the house of Lieutenant Levi Harvey, at the mills in said town, said Harvey was chosen moderator, Ebenezer Hunting, town clerk; Samuel Brocklebank, Levi Harvey and Ebenezer Hunting, selectmen; Peter Sargent, constable; John Morgan and others, surveyors of highways. "Voted, To concur with the Council and House of Representatives for this State that the present government be continued in full force until the 10th day of June, 1784, according to their resolve passed the 27th of February, 1783."

Our Constitution was adopted only to continue during the war with England. The war had virtually ceased in January, 1783, but our State recommended that the government be continued until the meeting of the Legislature in 1784, when the new Constitution took effect.

"Voted, To Mr. Nathaniel Everett one pound, five shillings and six pence, it being for expense in removing Mr. Ambrose from New Plymouth to Perrystown;" also "Voted that the selectmen give security to Levi Harvey for the purchase of land and defending of privileges for a mill, according to former bond;" and also, that "grinding days this year be Tuesdays and Fridays of each week."

Thus we see that at first the only currency was the depreciated Continental money, a pound of which was only equal to a shilling in silver, and three of either were equal to a bushel of corn or a day's work.

Peter Sargent, grandfather of Judge Sargent, who was first elected constable in 1783, was born in Amesbury, Mass., married Ruth Nichols, of Amesbury or Newbury, and removed to Hopkinton, N. H., before 1760, where he had a large family, and then removed to New London with his family in 1781. Most of his children settled in New London.

We find that the Rev. Samuel Ambrose, who had been living at Plymouth (then called New Plymouth), had visited Perrystown in 1781, and preached to them a while, and that he finally removed there in February, 1782, and that he preached to the people in New London a portion of the time, in connection with the people of Sutton, for several years, the town contributing something annually towards his support, until they were able to settle a minister for themselves. It appears, also, that Levi Harvey had built a grist-mill at the outlet of Harvey's Pond, being the only grist-mill in town, and that two days in each week were assigned as grinding days.

In 1784, the town "Voted to raise twenty-five dollars for Mr. Ambrose for his services the year past;" also,

"to open a road from Kearsarge Gore to Protectworth, upon the request of the latter place;" also, "Voted to lay out one hundred days' work in opening said road this season," and also to "raise ten gallons of rum, on the town's cost, for the opening of the road before mentioned." This was the main road from Sutton to Springfield, as it used to come up by Esquire Jonathan Harvey's, in Sutton, to the Daniel Woodbury place, thence over the hill where the meeting-house now is, and by Little Sunapee Pond, and thence over Addison Hill, as it was termed, to Springfield.

This year the town first voted for President of the State, as the Governor was called, under the new Constitution of 1784, and they all voted for Colonel Josiah Bartlett, of Kingston, for President, he having twenty-four votes; in 1785, John Langdon, of Portsmouth, had twenty-five votes for President.

In March, 1786, the town

"Voted to build a meeting-house fifty feet long, and height and width in proportion.

"Voted to set the meeting-house not more than 40 rods distant from the mouth of Hutchins' road, so called.

"Voted, Samuel Messer, Nathl Goodwin and Samuel Brocklebank a committee to pitch the place to set the meeting-house, sell the pews, and go forward with the same as far as the money that the pews are sold for will forward the building of said meeting-house.

"Voted to have a burying-yard near where said meeting-house is to stand."

This meeting was adjourned several times, and the committee appointed had located the house and sold the pews and provided that those who bought them might pay for the same in corn at four shillings and rye at five shillings per bushel.

"Voted to raise twenty dollars for preaching this year, and that Levi Harvey see the same expended, and that the selectmen should settle with Mr. Ambrose and pay any balance due him for preaching out of the town's stock."

In these votes of 1786 originated the old meeting-house (which was located on the ground which now constitutes the southerly part of the cemetery) and also the burying-ground which adjoined it, and which has since been enlarged and improved. The Hutchins road, referred to in the location of the meeting-house, was the road that led across from the four corners to the other road on which the cemetery is now located.

In this year, also, 1786, a census was ordered by the Legislature of the State, by a resolution passed March 31. New London responded to this call, which is the first census of the inhabitants of the town. The return is as follows:

The number of inhabitants of New London in 1786 is as follows:

Males 21 years of age and upwards	46
Males under 21 years of age	66
Females 18 years of age and upwards	46
Females under 18 years of age	61
Total	219

"The above is a true account, as witness our hands,

LEVI HARVEY, } S Selectmen
 JOHN ADAMS, } for JOHN MORGAN, } New London.

"New London, June 3, 1786."

In 1787, at the request of many of the people who had come here from Attleborough, Mass., and had there known Elder Seamans, he visited New London and preached here June 24, 1787. That autumn the town "Voted To give Elder Seamans a call to settle in this town as a minister of the gospel.

"Voted To give him forty pounds yearly as a salary, three pounds in cash and thirty seven pounds in labor and grain and other produce that he may want, all to be paid at the common pile, and all ministerial privileges in town except one half the parsonage lot."

In February, 1788, Elder Seamans visited New London again and spent some two months there in preaching from house to house and in visiting the people, and it seems that he concluded to accept the call, for in March of that year the town instructed a committee to engage Mr. Seamans' salary to him; that in paying the part to be paid in corn and grain, corn should be reckoned at three shillings and rye at four, and

"Voted To remove Mr. Seamans' family from Attleborough to New London on the cost of the town, and that his salary begin on the 21th day of February last and that the selectmen do forward the moving of Mr. Seamans' family."

On the 20th day of June of that year the arrangements for moving had been completed, and he started with his family for New London, where he arrived July 1st, and as he says in his diary "went into a very poor house of Mr. James Brocklebank."

He commenced his labors at once, working on his farm through the week and preaching on Sunday; he studied his sermons while engaged in manual labor.

A church of eleven members was formed October 23, 1788, over which he acted as pastor, and on the 25th day of November of the same year, at a town-meeting called for the first time at the meeting-house, the town voted to unite with the church in the call they had given Mr. Seamans, and arrangements were made for his reinstatement as pastor of the church and minister of the town. At this town-meeting the town also elected singers to sing at their public religious meetings, as follows:

"Voted, For singers, Ebenezer Hunting, Lieutenant Samuel Messer, Nathaniel Fales, Asa Burpee, Moses Hill, Jonathan Adams and Captain Samuel Brocklebank." The time for the reinstatement was fixed for the 21st of January, 1789.

On the 13th of December, 1788, Elder Seamans gave his final answer to the town, approving of their arrangements and consenting to the reinstatement as proposed, and the same came off, with all proper ceremonies, on the day appointed. Mr. Ebenezer Hunting had been elected by the church as deacon January 8, 1789.

At the reinstatement of Mr. Seamans, on January 21st, the exercises were held in the meeting-house, on which occasion Rev. Amos Wood, of Weare, preached the sermon; Rev. Thomas Baldwin, of Canaan, gave the charge to the candidate; and Rev. Samuel Ambrose, of Sutton, announced the fellowship of the churches. On the next Sunday, January 25th, the church and their new pastor had their first communion season together.

The meeting-house in which these exercises were held was only partly finished, being without pews or seats (except such as were extemporized for the occasion) and mostly without floors, but there was a large gathering of the people, and everything passed off in a satisfactory manner.

In 1790 the census taken in the State shows that New London had three hundred and eleven inhabitants,—a gain of ninety-two in four years. I find the first mention made of Joseph Colby, as a citizen of New London, in March, 1788, when he was elected as a surveyor of highways. In 1792 the town voted against adopting the amendments to the Constitution proposed by the convention of that year, seventeen votes being recorded in the negative and none in the affirmative.

The church, which commenced with eleven members, October 23, 1788, had gained but seven members up to 1792, consisting then of eighteen members, and there were then about fifty families in town. An extensive revival broke out that year under the preaching of Elder Seamans, and in that year there were about fifty conversions, and the work continued through the years 1793 and 1794, so that in the last year the members of the church had increased to one hundred and fifteen, the additions having been made from all classes and of all ages, from seventy down to eight or ten, and, what was quite remarkable, there were thirty-seven men who, with their wives, were members of the church,—the united heads of thirty-seven out of the fifty families in town.

In 1795 they had got their meeting-house so far completed that the town voted to hold their meetings in it for the future. They had but recently built the pulpit and got the floors laid in the porches above and below, but it was only partially glazed and not painted at all, and the singing-pew, as they called it, was not completed, nor was the house finished without or within. During this year, also, the town appointed a committee to confer with Elder Seamans, and see upon what terms he would give up the bond he held from the town, to ensure his annual salary. The town had already got in arrears, and were largely indebted to him, and they evidently desired to close up their contract with him as a town, and leave it for the church and for voluntary contributions to supply his salary. The committee waited upon the elder, and he, after due consideration, made the town a proposition in writing, giving them a choice of three alternatives, as follows:

"1st. That he receive a dismission from his pastoral and ministerial office in church and town, together with such a recommendation as he brought to them from Attleborough; that his salary should cease from the date of such dismission, and he to give up said bond when his salary should be paid up to such dismission.

"2d. The church and town should wholly surrender, give up and relinquish his ministerial services in church and town, and he would surrender, give up and relinquish his salary, so that it shall be a matter of judgment and conscience between them, to serve them as much in the work of the ministry as his judgment and conscience should dictate, and they on their part to communicate to them temporal good things toward the support of himself and his family, as much as their judgment and conscience should dictate to them, and that, too, in such a way as they might choose.

"3d. But if neither of these offers should prove satisfactory, then he requests the town to unite with him in calling a mutual council to look into any matters of dissatisfaction between them on either side, and decide upon the whole whether it was not best for him to ask and for them to give him such a dismission and recommendation as above mentioned; and if such council should be in favor of such dismission, then that they should also settle the conditions, after being informed what the town had done for him, and of his services in return, whether the town should pay him his salary in part or in full or give him something more, or whether he should relinquish his salary, which shall be then due either in part or in whole, or shall give the town something more, for reasons which to the council may appear."

It was very evident that it was of no use to seek a controversy with a man who was so willing to settle in any way, and the town, by vote, accepted of his second offer, by which the town gave up all claim to his ministerial services and he gave up all legal claim to his salary, and after that his support was derived mainly from the church and from voluntary contributions. The town at the same time voted not to unite with him in calling a council.

In 1797 they also voted that those inhabitants of the town that do not belong to the Baptist Society, so called, have a right to invite preachers of the gospel into the meeting-house to preach such part of the time as shall be in proportion to the interest they own in the meeting-house, and this was so voted for several years. Almost every year there was an article in the warrant to see about finishing the singing-pew or to see about finishing off the meeting-house, but there seemed a great reluctance to complete the house, and the town refused to act.

Thus we come down to the year 1800, the close of the eighteenth century. By the census of that year it appears that New London then had six hundred and seventeen inhabitants, having gone from three hundred and eleven to six hundred and seventeen in ten years. But while they had been thus prosperous in that particular, their meeting-house was still unfinished. It was only partially glazed, the gallery was not completed, the singing-pew was not built, nor was it plastered or painted at all. A controversy between Levi Harvey and the town had arisen about his mills, which was still undisposed of, and many were the articles in the warrants for town-meetings, and many were the special town-meetings called to consider and act upon these two subjects, but the town never seemed ready to finish either the meeting-house or this controversy.

Captain John Mason, of London, to whom the grant of New Hampshire was made in 1629, as we have seen, died in 1635, and his heirs held and tried to enforce his claims to the land till about 1692, when they sold and conveyed the same to one Samuel Allen, of the same London, who came to this country to enforce his claims. But Allen died in 1705, and the lands descended to his heirs, who prosecuted his claims vigorously for a time, until the heirs of Mason found some defect, either real or pretended, in Allen's title to the lands, and set up a claim to them for themselves.

One John Tulton Mason, a descendant of Captain John, the first grantee, came to this country, claiming to own the Masonian patent, and sold his rights to certain parties in Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and conveyed to them by deed in 1746. The names of these purchasers were as follows: Theodore Atkinson, Mark H. Wentworth, Richard Wibird, John Wentworth (son of the Governor), George Jaffrey, Nathaniel Meserve, Thomas Packer, Thomas Wallingford, Jotham Odiorne, Joshua Pierce, Samuel Moore and John Molat. Atkinson had three-fifteenths, M. H. Wentworth had two-fifteenths and all the rest one-fifteenth each. These men were afterwards known as the Masonian proprietors.

The persons to whom they granted the town of Alexandria and also the Addition were as follows: Jonas Minot, of Concord, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman; Jonathan Bagley, Esq., and William Bailey, gentleman, both of Amesbury, in the county of Essex and all in the province of Massachusetts Bay; Matthew Thornton, Esq., and Robert McMurphy, gentlemen, both of Londonderry; John Talford, Esq., and William Talford, gentlemen, both of Chester; and Daniel Rindge, of Portsmouth, all in the county of Rockingham and province of New Hampshire; and Joshua Talford, of New Chester, in the county of Grafton, and province last mentioned, husbandman.

In the deed of the Addition of Alexandria the original grantors, the Masonian proprietors reserved one-third part of said land to themselves, their heirs and assigns forever; one-half of the balance, or one-third of the whole, was conveyed to said Minot; and the other half of the balance, or third of the whole, was conveyed to the remaining grantees in the following proportions, viz.: To Matthew Thornton, twelve forty-ninths; to said J. Bagley, five forty-ninths; to the said W. Bailey, five forty-ninths; to the said John Talford, seven forty-ninths and one-third; to the said William Talford, eight forty-ninths and one-third; to said Robert McMurphy, eight forty-ninths and one-third; to the said Daniel Rindge, two forty-ninths; and to the said Joshua Talford, one forty-ninth. The grant to said William Bailey was conditional upon his accepting the rights granted him in the new charter of the town of Alexandria in full for his claims under the old charter, which he refused to accept, and therefore he drew no lots in the Addition, which was afterwards New London.

The addition was surveyed and laid out in one hundred and thirty-seven lots of one hundred and fifty acres each. Certain lots were reserved for schools, for the first settled minister, etc. There were reserved for the Masonian proprietors forty-five lots and two fractions; and drawn to Captain Joseph Minot, forty-four lots and two fractions; to Colonel Matthew Thornton, ten lots and a fraction; to Robert McMurphy, seven lots and two fractions; to Deacon William Talford, seven lots and a fraction; to Major John Talford, six lots and a fraction; to Jonathan Bagley, Esq., five lots and a fraction; to Hon. Daniel Rindge, two lots; and to Joshua Talford, Esq., one lot.

These lots were drawn September 7, 1773. I have a plan of the drawing, with the numbers of the lots drawn to each owner.

Having gone along in the order of time for the first twenty-one years' of the town's history, up to the year 1800, let us now go forward for a similar period of twenty-one years, to the year 1821, and there make a stand and from that stand-point look back over the space of time,—that second period of twenty-one years of the town's history. Let us select our time now with some particularity—well, suppose we call it the 9th day of September, 1821. It is one of the earliest days that I can remember, and, yet, though I was then only five years of age, I shall never forget it. The day was Sunday. The morning was bright and sunny. The air was soft and balmy. The day was hot, and especially in the afternoon was still and sultry. About five o'clock there were signs of a thunder-shower: dark clouds gathered in the west and soon overcast the sky. The stillness that precedes the storm was soon interrupted by the mutterings of the distant thunder, the clouds grew darker and blacker, until presently a strange commotion was seen among them in the west; vivid lightnings light up the dark and angry masses, the roaring of the distant tornado is heard as it approaches, and anon the most terrible whirlwind ever known in the State burst upon the terror-stricken inhabitants of New London.

I gather the following facts from a description of the great whirlwind of 1821, as found in the "Collections of the New Hampshire Historical Society," volume 1, page 241. The whirlwind entered the State in Cornish, and moving easterly through Croyden, demolished the house and barn of Deacon Cooper, thence through Wendell (now Sunapee) to near Sunapee Lake, where it blew to pieces the house, barn and out-buildings of Harvey Huntoon, destroying and blowing away all the furniture and other property in his house and the contents of his barns and other buildings, and blowing an infant nearly a year old, that was lying on a bed in the house, away into the lake, where the mangled body was found the next Wednesday, on the opposite side of the lake, and the feather-bed on which the child was sleeping was found in Andover by a Mr. Durgin and restored to Mr. Huntoon. A horse was blown up a hill a distance of forty rods, and so injured that it was necessary to kill him. No human lives were lost in that town except the child, though the other seven members of Mr. Huntoon's household were injured, and some of them very severely. From Wendell the hurricane passed across Lake Sunapee in a most terrific manner, assuming the form of an inverted pyramid in motion, and drawing up into its bosom vast quantities of water. Its appearance on the lake was in the highest degree sublime and terrible: apparently about twenty rods in diameter at the surface of the water, it expanded on each side towards the heavens, its vast body as dark as midnight, but occasionally illuminated by the most vivid flashes of lightning.

From the lake it passed into New London and through the southerly part of the town, destroying property to the estimated value of nine thousand or ten thousand dollars. But fortunately no person in the town was killed. The house and other buildings of John Davis, standing directly in the path of the tornado, were entirely demolished. Not a timber nor a board was left upon the ground where the house had stood, and not a brick in the chimney remained unmoved. A huge hearth-stone weighing some seven or eight hundred pounds, was removed from its bed and turned up on one edge; all the furniture of the house, beds, bedding and clothing was swept away, and not the value of five dollars of it was ever found. The family chanced to be absent from the house. Three barns belonging to Josiah Davis, with their contents, were blown entirely away, and his house much shattered and damaged. A house belonging to Jonathan Herrick was unroofed, the windows broken out and much furniture and clothing blown away, but fortunately none of the family were injured. A new two-story house frame, nearly covered, belonging to Nathan Herrick, and two barns, were blown down. A house and barn of Asa Gage were unroofed, and two sheds carried away. Anthony Sargent had one barn demolished, another unroofed and two sheds blown away. Deacon Peter Sargent had a barn blown down, another unroofed and a shed blown away. A barn of J. P. Sabin was torn to pieces; another barn of Levi Harvey was blown to pieces, his saw-mill demolished and some twelve thousand feet of boards in the mill-yard carried away; his grist-mill was moved some distance whole, and was left standing on dry land, and a hog-house, containing a hog weighing from three to four hundred pounds, was carried away whole several rods and dropped on the top of a stone wall, where it fell into fragments, and the hog, released from his prison, walked away unhurt. A pair of cart-wheels, strongly bound with iron and nearly new, with the spire and axle, were carried ten rods, the spire broken off in the middle, all the spokes but two broken out of one wheel and more than half out of the other. All the trees in an orchard of one hundred, without a single exception, were prostrated, and one-half of them were wrenched up by the roots and carried entirely away, root and branch. The trunk of one of these trees, divested of its principal roots and branches, was found half a mile distant and at the top of a long hill; near the top of this hill was an excavation some forty feet long, and in places two to three feet deep, partly filled with mangled boards and broken timbers, apparently made by the perpendicular fall of the side of a barn, which must have been blown whole at least eighty rods.

The track or path of the whirlwind in New London was some four miles long, and varied in width from one-fourth to one-half a mile, as the column rose and fell, and passed off upon the north side of Kearsarge Mountain. In passing, it seemed to hug to the mountain, so that its course was changed more to the south, and it passed down the mountain on the easterly side into the Gore, touching a corner of Salisbury, and into Warner, and finally terminated in the woods of Boscawen. A great amount of property, many buildings and several lives were destroyed in the Gore and in Warner.

The track of the whirlwind is thus described: "It appeared as if a rushing torrent had been pouring down for many days; the dwellings, buildings, fences and trees were all swept off in its course. The earth was torn up in places, the grass withered, and nothing fresh or living was to be seen in the path of the desolation." It is difficult for us to conceive the horrors of that instant—for it was but an instant—when horses, barns, trees, fences, fowls and other movable objects were all lifted from the earth into the bosom of the whirlwind, and anon dashed into a thousand pieces. Probably no event has occurred in this town during the hundred years of its existence that was so well calculated to teach man his utter impotence, and to impress upon his mind the awful sublimity, the terrible grandeur of the scene, where the hand of Omnipotence, even for a moment, displays its power, as the great whirlwind of September 9, 1821.

Let us now look back and briefly review the events that have occurred since the year 1800. June 9, 1801, the Social Library was incorporated, which had about one hundred volumes of very valuable books.

The library was kept at the house of Josiah Brown, Esq. I recollect that from about the year 1825 to 1833 I obtained most of my reading-matter from this library, and found it very profitable and interesting. Whether this institution yet remains I do not know. In 1803 the town first had the necessary number of ratable polls to entitle it to send a representative alone, and Joseph Colby, Esq., was elected as the first representative of the town, and he was re-elected every year until 1816.

In 1817 there was a political revolution in the town, and everything was changed. Daniel Woodbury, Esq., was the moderator, first selectman and representative for that and several succeeding years; and the dominant party held a celebration over their victory in the spring of 1817, at which, as I am informed, the liberty-pole was erected, which used to stand in front of the old meeting-house, around which the people in the olden time used to congregate and spend their intermissions between the forenoon and afternoon services on Sunday. My first recollections of attending church are associated with hearing Elder Seaman preach and Elder Ambrose pray; of riding to church in the wagon with father and mother,—standing up behind and holding on to the back of the seat in order to preserve my perpendicular equilibrium. This I did until, growing older, I preferred to walk rather than to ride in that way. It was the fashion in those days for the whole family to go to church as soon as the children were large enough to be carried.

In 1804 a committee was appointed to cause an accurate survey of the town to be made. This was in pursuance of a law requiring each town in the State to make a plan of the same and return it to the Secretary of State, with a view to the making of a State map, which was afterward published by Philip Carrigan. This committee consisted of Green French, Levi Harvey, Jr., and Anthony Sargent.

The meeting-house was still a subject of contention. Articles were frequently inserted in the warrants for town-meeting to see if the town would vote to finish glazing the house, or to plaster the house, or to paint the house, or to finish off the house, but the town uniformly voted in the negative upon them all. Probably some of this work was done by voluntary subscription or contributions, and the house was occupied for all purposes. Finally, in 1818, at a special meeting holden for that purpose, June 1st, it was voted to raise three hundred dollars for the purpose of repairing and finishing the outside of the meeting-house in this town, and Joseph Colby, Esq., was appointed, as agent of the town, to see to repairing and finishing the outside of the meeting-house, and I find no further articles in the warrants for their town-meetings relating to finishing the meeting-house. Thus, the house which was commenced in 1786 was finished in 1818, having been thirty-two years in building.

The controversy concerning Levi Harvey's mill privilege and flowage rights arose in this way: Away back in 1780 an article was inserted in the warrant to see if the town would adopt any method to build mills in said town, but the vote was that as a town they could not do anything as to building mills. But it seems that some individuals gave said Harvey a bond that they would purchase the land on which he was to set the mill, and would defend him against claims for flowage by the owners of land around and above his mill-pond, if he would erect a saw and grist-mill upon a certain lot of land owned by some absent proprietor; and in 1783 the town, at their annual meeting, voted to clear those men that were bound in a bond to Levi Harvey to purchase land and for defending of privileges, as mentioned in said bond; also, that the present selectmen be empowered to give security to said Harvey for the purchase of land and the defending of privileges as mentioned in the former bond. The selectmen for that year were Samuel Brocklebank, Levi Harvey and Ebenezer Hunting. In compliance with this vote of March, 1783, said

Brocklebank and Hunting gave to said Harvey a bond conditioned like the previous one, and the former bond was canceled. The mill and the dam were built and everything went on smoothly for several years.

But after a time a controversy arose about the land where the mill was located, and the owners of lots above the mill began to claim damages for flowage by the dam, and Harvey appealed to the town, and Brocklebank and Hunting also claimed to have the town act in the premises, but the town declined, and, upon one excuse and another, refused to act. In 1802 the town appointed a committee to act in the premises and to make a final settlement between said Harvey and the town; but in 1804 they again voted to let the matter take its due course in law. An article was inserted in the annual warrants for town-meetings on this subject, and special meetings were called to act upon it, but the town would not act.

Finally, suits were brought by the parties aggrieved against Harvey, as of course they must be, and damages recovered against him for flowage by the owners of lands above his mill and by the claimant of the land where his mill was located. These damages were collected of Harvey, and then he called on his bondsmen, Hunting and Brocklebank, to respond. They called on the town, but the town was still deaf to the call; so, after various town-meetings, Harvey sued Hunting and Brocklebank on their bond. The town still refusing to come to their rescue, they defended themselves as best they could in the suit, but were finally beaten and a judgment recovered against them for the whole amount that Harvey had been obliged to pay. Then there were more town-meetings, but the town was still persistent in doing nothing.

Probably in the mean time Brocklebank had become irresponsible, and as Hunting was good, Harvey at length arrested Deacon Hunting and lodged him safely in jail for the non-payment of the debt. Hunting was stubborn, and Harvey was resolute; so Hunting laid in jail over a year; but finding that Harvey would not yield, he finally paid the money and went home to his family. Then he called on the town, and the town refusing to act, he brought his suit against the town, and then more town-meetings followed; but the suit went along, and the town in the end was beaten, as it deserved to be, and a judgment was recovered against the town.

On the 24th day of May, 1808, a special meeting was called on that matter, and the town "Voted, that there be assessed upon the polls and estate in this town, and that part of Wilmot which was taken from this town in June last, a sum of money sufficient to satisfy the judgment rendered against the town in favor of Deacon Ebenezer Hunting, at the last term of the Supreme Court in this county." They do not state how large the sum thus raised was; but it is reported that the amount of his claim had by this time, with all the costs of the various suits, reached the sum of nearly fifteen hundred dollars, which for those times was a large amount.

In 1809 there was an article in the warrant "to see if the town will pay Deacon Ebenezer Hunting the amount of interest which he has been obliged to pay on the execution which Levi Harvey, Esq., obtained against him." But the town passed over the article. Again, on the 13th January, 1812, a special meeting was called "to see if the town will pay to Deacon Ebenezer Hunting a sum of money equal to the amount of interest which he paid on the Harvey execution, and also to see what compensation the town will make Deacon Ebenezer Hunting for damages he sustained by being imprisoned on said execution." But the town made quick work of it by voting at once not to do anything about it. This ended the controversy, which had been in agitation more than twenty years in town.

Let us now look for a moment at the boundaries of the town at different periods of its history. When the town was incorporated it was, as you have seen, in very regular shape, extending from Alexandria to Fishersfield and Sutton in length, and of about equal width between the patent line and Kearsarge Gore. June 19, 1793, the Legislature disannexed lots No. 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24 and 25 from the northwesterly part of Kearsarge Gore, and annexed the same to New London. By this change the southerly line of New London was extended east to the northeast corner of Sutton. The piece thus annexed was a triangle, with its base resting on Sutton north line. December 11, 1804, the Legislature disannexed a large number of lots from Wendell and annexed the same to New London; and on the 19th of June, 1817, another tract was taken from Wendell and annexed to New London, so that the line between these towns was described as follows: Beginning at a point in Sunapee Lake, which is described, "thence running north, 167 east, 108 rods to Otter Pond, and thence on the same course across said pond to Springfield south line." By these two additions to New London, it was intended to make the line between Sunapee and New London one continuous straight line from Fishersfield (now Newbury) northwest corner through Otter Pond to Springfield line. The old patent line run over the top of Burpee Hill, a little above the house where Nathaniel Messer and his son lived and died.

The old school-house that used to sit there on the top of the hill, on a ledge of rock, was on the patent line which originally divided this town from Wendell. By these additions another triangle was added to the town on that side, with its base resting on the old patent line, and bounded west by Wendell and north by Springfield.

On the 18th of June, 1807, the town of Wilnot was incorporated out of the northeastern part of New London, a part of New Chester and all that part of Kearsarge Gore that laid northerly of the summit of Kearsarge Mountain.

The part taken off from New London was described as follows: "Beginning at the southeasterly corner of lot No. 22, and southwesterly corner of lot No. 21, on the southeasterly line of said New London; thence running westwardly across said New London on the northerly sides of lots numbered 22, 35, 54, 70, 78, 90, 112 and 130, over to Springfield line," so taking all the land that lay northeasterly of that line in New London. This part of the town thus set off to Wilnot contained about nine thousand acres of land.

From 1812 to 1815 the country was engaged in its second war with England, which was substantially closed by General Andrew Jackson, at New Orleans, on the 8th of January, 1815.

In 1819 the Toleration Act, as it was called, was passed by the Legislature and became a law, which separated the civil and religious elements in our organization, so to speak. It took from the towns, in their corporate capacity, the power to raise money for the support of preaching of any kind, or to build meeting-houses, or for other religious purposes, leaving it to religious societies to do this work, each to suit its own views of propriety and duty. But this act did not affect religious matters in New London at all. The town had, in fact, anticipated the law many years. They had raised no money as a town, for preaching, since 1795, as I can find, and they had voted to let each denomination in town occupy the meeting-house according to their interest therein, each sect being thus left free to advance their own views in their own way, and at their own expense. This has been the policy of the law ever since, and was the policy of the town long before the law was passed.

From this time forth we shall find the history of the town and the history of the church entirely separate and distinct. Yet every one knows, whether he believes in the doctrines of a church or not, that wherever a church has been long established and has been made up of any considerable portion of the people, it has and will have its influence upon the community to such an extent that no history of the town would be complete without a history of its church, or its churches, where there are more than one. Particularly is that true of a country town like New London, where there has been, from the earliest times, a leading and influential church, which has taken the lead in all moral questions and reforms.

The church had, in this period of twenty-one years seen two seasons of revival under the preaching of Elder Seamans. In 1809 some forty were added to the church, and in 1818 and 1819 occurred what was long known as the great reformation, in which between eighty and ninety were added to the church.

But during all these years there was much hard and disagreeable work to be done; many labors with the brethren were instituted, and many were the letters of admonition and expulsion that were issued and recorded on the church records.

In the year 1801 the first Baptist society was formed in town, which was kept up and had its annual meetings down as late as 1846, when its records cease, and the church has gone along so far as appears, without the aid of the society.

Within this period, too, the institution of Free-Masonry had arisen and flourished in this town quite extensively. King Solomon's Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, No. 14, was chartered and located at New London, in the county of Hillsborough, on January 27, 1802, by the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of the State of New Hampshire. The lodge flourished well here for many years, and had become quite numerous previous to the anti-Masonic wave that swept over the Eastern and Middle States about 1826, when the excitement ran so high and the opposition was so strong that the Masons, thinking that discretion was the better part of valor, suspended their meetings for a time altogether, and the lodge, in fact, never did much more work in its old locality; but in June, 1851, it was removed to Wilnot, where it remained in good working order until 1878, when it again removed and located at Seytheville, in New London, where it now remains, enjoying a fair share of prosperity.

The population had gone on increasing since 1800, though somewhat irregular. In 1810 the census showed six hundred and ninety-two, gaining only seventy-five in that decade; but in 1820 there were nine hundred and twenty-four, a gain of two hundred and thirty-two in that decade, and the town had also made rapid progress in education, wealth and position, and was now enjoying a large share of the comforts and conveniences of life for that day.

The county of Merrimack was incorporated July 23, 1823, and consisted of twenty-six towns from Rockingham and Hillsborough Counties. New London, which had been a part of Hillsborough County hitherto, now became a part of Merrimack, of which it still forms a part.

On July 4, 1826, the new meeting-house was raised. The corner-stone had been placed with appropriate ceremonies before that, at a public gathering, with a procession, music and religious ceremonies. The Fourth of July was a pleasant day, and at sunrise the work of raising was commenced, and it was substantially finished the same day, except what could be done with the force that was to be permanently employed upon it. From that time forward the work was prosecuted with vigor, so that before the winter closed in it was completed, with steeple and bell; the slips were disposed of and the house ready for use, and all that I find in the records concerning it, anywhere, in either church or society, is the following vote by the society at their regular meeting, on the third Monday of December, 1826, viz.:

"Voted, to accept of the new meeting-house, built by David Everett and Anthony Colby, and the common around the same. Chose Joseph Colby and Jonathan Greeley to take a conveyance of said meeting-house and common."

It seems that it had been arranged that the house should be appraised so as to cover expenses, and a sufficient number of the society had subscribed, or in some way became responsible to take the slips at the appraised value, so as to secure those who did the work in the first instance; and then those two built the house and conveyed it to the society.

After it was completed the people used to alternate between the new house and the old, one Sunday at each in turn for many years. In the old meeting-house were the square pews, with the seats on all four sides of them, with the high pulpit and the great sounding-board over it, which would be sure to fall upon the minister's devoted head should he depart but the breadth of a single hair from the truth. In the new meeting-house there was some improvement: the slips were all facing the same way and towards the pulpit, which originally was at the other end of the house, directly in front of the singing gallery, and but little lower than that.

On May 30, 1830, Rev. Samuel Ambrose died. He had for several years been a member of this church, the original church at Sutton having become at one time nearly or quite extinct; and on October 4th in the same year Elder Seaman died. Thus these two men, who had labored side by side so long in the cause of the Master, were called very nearly together to their reward.

In 1830 the population was only nine hundred and thirteen, a loss of eleven from 1820.

In 1831 and 1832 the church was visited by one of its most remarkable revivals, under the preaching of the Rev. Oren Tracy. The whole town seemed to be reached and affected by it. During the fall of 1831, and the next winter, evening meetings were kept up in the different parts of the town, in the school-houses and in private houses, on Sundays and on week-days, to which large numbers were drawn, and the interest in religious matters was deep and wide-spread. On the first Sunday of January, 1833, which was the first day of the week and of the month and of the year, an addition of forty-three was made to the church; on the first Sunday of March thirty-six more were added, and during the following summer several more, making between eighty and ninety in all.

In the fall of 1832 another event took place which was at the time of great interest to the people of New London. During that autumn the first stage-coach took its regular trip through New London, upon the route from Hanover to Lowell. This new road had been before the public for several years in one form and another, and was strongly favored by one party and opposed by another. But it had finally, through the efforts of Colonel Anthony Colby more than of any other man, probably, been laid out and built, and a stage company had been formed, horses and coaches purchased and arrangements made for staging.

This fall of 1832, J. Everett Farinnu was teaching a private school for a term in the red school-house at the four corners, and it was announced that on a certain day in October the stage-coach would make its appearance. It was to go through here in the afternoon to Hanover, and start the next morning early for Lowell. As the expected event drew nigh, study was out of the question, and the teacher gave all permission to gaze for a time for the long-expected stage-coach with its four horses in hand. It finally came and went, as all things come and go; but it took some time to fully comprehend and realize the importance of the fact that New London was henceforth to have a daily stage and a daily mail both ways.

In 1837 the New London Academy was incorporated and went into successful operation, and continued prosperous under different teachers for several years, up to about 1850, when its operations were suspended for a time. It commenced in 1837 as a ladies' school, with Miss Susan F. Colby as principal. In the autumn of that year Professor Dyer H. Sanborn became principal and Miss Colby continued as principal of the ladies' department. After some years Mr. Sanborn resigned, and Truman K. Wright succeeded him as principal; after Mr. Wright, a Mr. Meserve, a Mr. Averhill and a Mr. Comings followed. Then Mr. Alvah Hovey, now president of Newton Theological Institution, taught one year; then Mr. Joseph B. Clarke, now of Manchester, followed for a year; then a Mr. V. J. Walker followed, who was the last, or among the last, who taught under this arrangement.

In 1840 the population of New London reached one thousand and nineteen,—a gain of one hundred and six in the last ten years, and this was the largest number that were ever in the town at the time of any census, and the town was in a condition of prosperity, wealth and influence perhaps equal to that of any other period in its history.

CHAPTER III.

IN 1843 Joseph Colby, Esq., died. He had passed most of his life in New London, and few men have had a wider or a better influence in the town than he had. He was born in Plaistow, N. H., March 24, 1762; moved to Hopkinton, N. H., about the time he became twenty-one years old, and lived there a few years; while there he was married to Miss Anna Heath, of Hampstead, N. H., December 21, 1785. They moved to New London March 10, 1786, and at first lived in a log-house on the shore of Pleasant Pond, at the upper end, near where Stephen Sargent now lives, where the Indians had formerly cleared up a few acres of the intervalle, to raise their corn and beans. He enlarged this clearing and made a valuable farm. He moved from there and lived at other places in town; built the house on the Elder Seaman's place, opposite where the buildings now stand, which has since been burnt down; then moved on to the road that leads from here directly to the low plains, where Anthony and the youngest daughter, Mrs. Burpee, were born; and then moved to the farm on Main Street, in the year 1800, where he ever after lived, and where he died April 19, 1843.

He was for many years the agent of Jonas Minot, one of the original and the largest of the proprietors of the grant, and in that way he had opportunities for learning more of the situation and value of the land in the different localities than most other men. He dealt largely in real estate in the town. He served the town well in various capacities; for many years as one of the selectmen, and was its first representative to the General Court, and was re-elected every successive year from 1803 to 1816, inclusive. He was early a member of the church, and I think the records will show that he acted on more committees in the church than any other man during the same period of time. He was also a leading magistrate in the town for many years.

In 1846 Anthony Colby, of New London, was elected Governor of the State. He was a native of this town, the son of Joseph and Anna Colby, born November 13, 1792. He received his education mainly in the common schools of his native town. But he had a wonderful capacity for business, and was always active in matters of a public character. He built the original stone dam at the outlet of Pleasant Pond, and built a grist-mill there, which was a great public benefit. He was largely instrumental in getting the new road laid out and built, and started the line of stages upon it, that for a long time ran through from Hanover to Lowell in a day, a distance of one hundred miles or more; and he readily lent a helping hand to the enterprise, started by another son of New London, of establishing the business of manufacturing scythes, where the same has been so successfully carried on ever since. He was one of the two men who built the new meeting-house; in fact, few men have ever lived a more active life than he did.

He was a friend of education and of the common school, and for a long time was one of the superintendents of the schools in town, and was among the earlier advocates of the temperance reform. He went through all the grades of military promotion, from captain to major-general, and had represented the town in the Legislature in the years 1828, 1829, 1830, 1831, 1832, also in 1837, 1838, 1839; and in 1846 was the chief magistrate of the State. His administration of the affairs of the State government was characterized for integrity, true economy and a spirit of progress and reform. In the position in which the political parties then stood it was simply impossible that he could be re-elected.

He was again elected to the Legislature in 1860, from New London, and was appointed by Governor Berry, in 1861, as adjutant-general of the State, at a time when the best man in the State was needed for that responsible position, made so responsible by the great importance of the struggle in which the country was then engaged. He performed the duties of this office in a manner entirely satisfactory to the government and the people, and resigned in 1863. He was long an active and influential member of the church here, as well as a leading member in the denomination in the State. He died July 20, 1873. He always lived in this town, and always, except the first eight years of his life, in the house into which his father moved in 1800, and where both father and son have died. No man ever devoted himself more fully and constantly to the building up of what he believed to be the best interest of his native town than he did. He married for his first wife, Miss Mary Everett, of New London, and for his second, Mrs. Eliza Richardson, of Boston, who survived him.

In 1847 the union meeting-house, sometimes called the Free Church, was built at the Four Corners. This remained for several years, but was finally sold, and removed and converted to other uses, it being wisely concluded that one good, strong church in a place is far better than two or three feeble ones, and that one meeting-house well filled is far better than several empty ones.

In 1850 the population was nine hundred and forty-five, being a loss of seventy-four from 1840. Benjamin R. Andrews was the delegate from New London to the Constitutional Convention of that year in this State.

In 1853 the new town-house was built near the new meeting-house. There was quite a struggle upon the question of removal, the subject having been voted on at no less than three town-meetings, held in rapid succession, in the spring and summer of that year.

In 1853, when the academical and theological school, under the patronage of the Calvinist Baptist denomination, was removed from New Hampton to the State of Vermont, it left the denomination without a school in this State. They soon resolved that this state of things ought not to be, and they at once looked about for the best place to locate their seminary of learning. The friends at New London offered to give the denomination their academy, and put it in good repair, and build a ladies' boarding-house, and furnish various other accommodations. This proposition was favorably considered by the denomination, and the preference was given to New London. Accordingly a new act of incorporation was obtained in 1853, and "The New London Literary and Scientific Institute" was incorporated that year, and the school put in successful operation that fall, and in course of its first year enrolled upon its catalogue some three hundred and thirty-five scholars. The property of the New London Academy was transferred to the Institute. In 1855 an alteration was made in its name, changing the word Institute to Institution, and modifying some of the provisions of its charter, and its name has remained unchanged from that time to the year 1878, when it was changed to that of "The Colby Academy" at New London, which name it now holds.

In 1854 the old town meeting-house was sold, by vote of the town, and removed to this neighborhood and converted into a boarding-house for the use of the academy.

Benjamin P. Burpee, of New London, was elected a county commissioner for Merrimack County for the years 1852, 1853 and 1854. He was also the representative of the town for the years 1852 and 1854.

In 1856 George W. Everett, of this town, was appointed solicitor of Merrimack County, which office he held for five years, until 1861. He was the representative of the town in the years 1852 and 1856.

Richard H. Messer was elected a member of the Governor's Council for the years 1857 and 1858. He was a native of the town, the son of Isaac and Martha Messer, born October 20, 1807. He received a common-school education only, and when of age he went to Massachusetts and learned the trade of manufacturing scythes; he then came back to New London, and uniting himself with Mr. Phillips and Anthony Colby, introduced the business here, at the place where Colby had early built the second¹ grist-mill in town, and where the enterprising village of Seytheville has since grown up. The town is greatly indebted to Mr. Messer as being the originator and the active agent in introducing and building up this great industry in the town, and the gentlemen who first were associated with him in the business were also benefactors of the place. He was elected to the Legislature in the year 1858. He continued in his favorite occupation, devoting himself to business with all his energies, until he died, May 15, 1872, aged sixty-five years.

In 1860 the population of the town was nine hundred and fifty-two, a gain of only seven in ten years.

In 1860, Governor Colby was again elected representative, and in 1861 he was appointed adjutant-general of the State, which place he held until 1863, when he resigned, and his son, Daniel E. Colby, was appointed to the same place in August, and held the place till March, 1864, when he resigned the position. He had been representative of the town in the Legislature in 1857, and was afterwards a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1876, and still resides upon the old homestead of his father and grandfather.

¹ It has been said that some one had built a small grist-mill here on the site before that time, but it was of no account. Colby's mill was from the first and is to-day substantially the mill of the town.

The academy, as organized in 1873, had been doing a good work and doing it well, and had been prospered. At first a fund of $25,000 was raised, which for a time seemed to meet the demand of the institution, but presently the need was felt of more ample accommodations and a better location; and it was a grave question where the funds were to be obtained to meet this new want, this growing necessity. In 1866, Mrs. James B. Colgate, a daughter of Governor Colby, offered $25,000 towards establishing the necessary fund, provided that the amount should be made up to $100,000 within a given time. This was accomplished by the aid of the Rev. W. H. Eaton, D.D., who had assisted in raising the previous fund of $25,000, and at the anniversary in 1867 the subscription was filled and the object secured.

The present site was then obtained and the present buildings were erected, and in 1870 they were completed and dedicated, upon which occasion Rev. Dr. Cummings, of Concord, the president of the institution, delivered an able and interesting historical address.

This school has been placed under great obligations to Mrs. Colgate, of New York; ex-Governor Colby, of New London; John Conant, Esq., of Jeffrey; Messrs. H. H. & J. S. Brown, of Fisherville; Nahum T. Greenwood, Esq., of New London, and many others, by their liberal contributions to its fund.

In 1853, George W. Gardner was appointed principal, who continued in that place seven years, and was followed by Rev. George B. Gove, for three years, who was succeeded by Rev. A. W. Sawyer, who remained about seven years, to 1870. Then Horace M. Willard was appointed principal, who was followed in 1872, by Laban E. Warren, who was succeeded by A. L. Lane in 1875, who, in turn, gave place to J. F. Murton in 1876, who remained two years, till 1878, when E. J. McEwan was elected. The present principal is James P. Dixon.

Several have held the place of lady principal. Miss Mary J. Prescott, from 1853 to 1857, Miss Harriet E. Rice, Miss Julia A. Gould, Miss Adelaide L. Smiley, Miss Lucy Flagg, Miss Mary A. Davis, Miss Mary O. Carter (who became Mrs. Warren in 1872), Miss Hannah P. Dodge, and in 1877, Miss Smiley was again appointed, and holds the position at the present time.

Mr. Ephraim Knight was appointed associate principal and professor of mathematics at the commencement in 1853, which place he held down to 1873, a period of twenty years, when, in consequence of declining health, he resigned the post, and died here March 4, 1878.

In 1870 the population of the town was nine hundred and fifty-nine, a gain of seven from 1860, and just the same made in the last previous decade. Since 1870 but few matters of general interest have occurred in New London.

In 1874 the town came very near furnishing another

Governor for the State. General Luther McUTCHEINS was born in Penobscot, N. H., in 1809; first came to New London in 1837, and remained two years; then went to Connecticut for some four years, returning to New London in 1843, where he has since lived. He received the Republican nomination for Governor in 1874, and received the full strength of his party, and a vote very complimentary to him, and only failed because, as the issues were then made up and the parties were then organized, the Republicans could not elect anybody that year. He has been your representative in the Legislature in 1850, 1851, 1873, 1878 and 1879. He is a practical farmer, who takes a deep interest in whatever is calculated to advance the agricultural interests of the State.

In 1875, George M. Knight, Esq., of this town, was elected county commissioner for the county of Merrimack, which office he held for the term of three years,—1875, 1876 and 1877.

Of the facts of the first century of New London's history we have endeavored to give you a fair and impartial statement, without any attempt at embellishment. There are a few other facts that may properly be alluded to before we close, and first, the patriotism of the town. We have seen that the town voted at once, after it was incorporated, to furnish a soldier for the Continental army; this they did furnish, and paid him, as we have seen, through the war until its close. We have no evidence that the Mr. Coons who went from the town was an inhabitant of the town; our impression is that he probably was not, but was a substitute, or a man hired by the town to fill the place. But New London had its Revolutionary heroes in abundance. In fact, it seemed a favorite resort for those soldiers who had gone from other places and served through the war, and then looked about for the most desirable places for settlement in the new country. The fresh breezes of its hills, and the views of the noble mountains in its neighborhood, are all congenial to a love of freedom and independence. Hence we find that immediately after the war many who had been in the Continental army came at once to New London and settled here; others came later. There was Thomas Currier (known as Captain Kiab), Edmund Davis, Josiah Davis, John Dole, Jesse Dow, Levi Everett, Peniel Everett, Eliphalet Gay, Zebedee Hayes, Ezekiel Knowlton, Thomas Pike, David Smith, Moses Trussell and Eliphalet Woodward. Most of them came from Massachusetts,—from Attleborough, Dedham, New Rowley (now Georgetown), and Bradford; but Moses Trussell came from Hopkinton, N. H., in year 1804.

Captain Currier not only served through the Revolutionary War, but no sooner was the War of 1812 declared than he entered the regular army. He went through the war, fought in several battles and came safely home when the war was over. I remember him as he used to come to church on Sunday and other days, for he was a man who loved his God as well as his country, and he knew no fear in the service of either. Levi Everett was another man whom I well remember. He lived near my father, and I never wearied of listening to him when he was telling his stories about the wars and the battles he had seen. Then there was Moses Trussell, with one arm gone from below the elbow. I knew him well. I understood that he lost his arm in the war, but did not know where or when or how; but a paper has recently been found that explains these matters. (This paper is published at length in the second volume of the Gazette Monthly, page 276.) Such were some of the men of those days. Mr. Trussell, you will remember, was here in 1774 and cleared a piece of land; the next year he went to Bunker Hill, and in thirty years from his first visit he returned to live and spend the rest of his days here, and died in New London.

So in the War of 1812 New London did her full proportion. At the first alarm of war many left and joined the regular army and followed its fortunes through the war, like Captain Currier, of whom I have spoken. But few, comparatively, were called into active service from this State in that war; but whenever the call came the men were ready. I find that among the companies that were called out and ordered to Portsmouth there were in Captain Jonathan Bean's company, one sergeant, Robert Knowlton from New London, and four privates,—John Davis, David Marshall, Nathaniel Messer and David Gile; and that in Captain Silas Call's company, Stephen Sargent was first lieutenant, and Captain Call having died before his term was out, Sargent was in command of the company for a time. There were in the same company, as privates, Samuel Messer, Zenas Herriek and Nathan Smith, all from New London.

And in the late War of the Rebellion New London did not falter, but promptly met the call of the country and sent her sons to the conflict without reserve, as they were needed, furnishing such officers as Captain Andrew J. Sargent, Major George W. Everett, of the Ninth Regiment, and Lieutenant-Colonel J. M. Clough, of the Eighteenth Regiment, who, since the war was over, is doing good service in our State militia as a brigadier-general. The town also furnished men for the ranks in the various stations and places where they were needed, who were true as steel and faithful unto death to the trust reposed in them. The reputation of the town for patriotism is established beyond a peradventure.

That the town is a place of good morals would follow almost naturally from the fact that the people of the town are an agricultural people, who have always believed that a good education is of the highest consequence, and have had good schools, and for the last forty years a very good academy. These facts, in connection with the religious training of the people under such men as Ebler Seamans and his successors, could hardly fail to make the population what it has been,—an industrious, intelligent, patriotic, moral and happy people. Wherever the criminals come from that fill our jails and prisons, very few of them have ever come from New London, or ever will, until the town forgets the lessons of the first hundred years of its history.

There are a few more general facts and a few more individual notices that I desire to refer to.

The following persons have graduated from college, who were natives or residents of New London at the time, with the year of graduation:

John H. Shack, Dartmouth College, 1811.
Benjamin Woodbury, Dartmouth College, 1817.
J. Everett Fanning, Waterville College, now Col. Col. University, 1818.
Daniel P. Woodbury, West Point, 1823.
Francis A. Gates, Waterville College, 1826.
Daniel E. Colby, Dartmouth College, 1826.

Physicians in New London.—SAMUEL FLAGG was a traveling doctor, whose route extended from Pembroke and Dunbarton to Enfield, through Hopkinton and New London, usually coming this way two or three times a year, but irregularly. He always traveled on foot and carried his saddle-bags of medicine over his shoulder. He had no fixed residence, but wandered from place to place; a man of considerable skill, but intemperate, and took great delight in making himself a terror to children. He was found dead in a mud-hole, into which he was supposed to have fallen in a fit of intoxication.

JOHN CUSHING was a resident of New London for many years; came here before the year 1800; was a skillful physician, and for a time was quite popular here. He was engaged to be married to Phoebe Messer, the daughter of Samuel Messer. The day was appointed for the wedding; the friends were invited; the guests came; the bride, in expectancy, was attired, and the waiting-maids in attendance. The only absent one was the bridegroom, that was to be, who did not put in an appearance, and as there could not be much of a wedding without a bridegroom, the result was that the wedding did not come off according to programme. This was in 1802 or 1803. But this disappointment proved a blessing in disguise to the intended bride, for Cushing, who was then somewhat given to drink, went on from bad to worse and became very intemperate; lost his practice and the confidence of the community, and finally moved to Fisherfield and died there in poverty. He always rode on horseback to visit his patients. He never married.

ROBERT LANE came to New London, from Newport, about the year 1808, after Cushing had lost his practice and moved from town. He lived here some two or three years, then moved to Sutton, where he was living and in practice in 1811, and remained there a few years. He then returned to New London, where I find that he was residing in 1814, and he remained in town through 1815-16, for he was one of the selectmen of the town in these latter years. After this he went to Mobile, Ala., and was absent a year or two, when he returned and stopped a short time at New London, and then took up his permanent residence in Sutton, at the north village, where he ever afterwards lived. He had an extensive practice; became quite distinguished in his profession; was much respected, and died a few years ago at a good old age.

CHARLES PINNEY came to New London about 1810, when Dr. Lane first went to Sutton. I find that Pinney was here and in full practice in 1811, when Lane was also in full practice in Sutton. Pinney married a daughter of Mr. Edmund Davis. After Dr. Lane returned to New London they both remained awhile, and then Pinney moved away. He returned to live here again after several years, and remained here, I think, till his death; at least he is buried in our cemetery. I knew him well after his return, but he was not then in practice as a physician.

ISAAC COLBY followed Dr. Lane, coming soon after he left, in 1817 or 1818, and remained till about 1821, when he removed to Hopkinton.

HERBERT FOSTER was here in the year 1822; may have come in 1821, but did not remain but a year or two.

JONATHAN DEARBORN came soon after this, perhaps in 1823 or a little later; was a skillful physician, but left town suddenly in 1829.

SAMUEL LITTLE followed Dr. Dearborn, coming about 1830, and remained till 1838, or thereabouts; was town clerk several years; then moved to Thetford, Vt., thence to Lebanon, and thence to Rumney, N. H., where I used to see him frequently when I lived at Wentworth. He afterwards moved West, where he died a few years ago.

ROBERT COPP was here for a few years, during the time that Dr. Little was here. I remember him well. He was here in 1836, but left soon after; may have been here some three or four years in all.

REUBEN HOSMER followed Dr. Little in 1839, and remained till 1848, some ten years.

HEZEKIAH BICKFORD came back in 1848, for he was a native of this town, and remained till 1851, some four years.

S. M. WHIPPLE came into town in 1849, and remained longer in town than any other physician. He was a native of Croydon, N. H.; attended medical lectures at Dartmouth College, and commenced practice at New London in the year 1849. Since he came to New London several others have been here for short periods, as follows:

OTIS AYER, from 1855 to 1857, three years.

LEVI PIERCE (homoeopathic), from 1861 to 1864, four years.

N. T. CLARK, from 1870 to 1871, two years.

R. A. BLOOD, from 1871 to 1873, three years.

J. P. ELKINS (at Seytheville), from 1878 to present time.

There have also been several physicians raised up in town, from its native-born or adopted citizens, who have gone to other places.

JONATHAN E. HERRICK, son of Esquire Jonathan and Rhoda Herrick, who is now in practice in New York.

GEORGE H. W. HERRICK, son of Deacon Joseph C. Herrick, who was in practice at Charlestown, Mass., and who died abroad in 1877.

CHARLES PIKE, in practice in Peabody, Mass.

ASHLEY WHIPPLE, son of S. M. Whipple, of New London, now at Ashland, N. H.

Ministers of New London.—JOB SEAMANS was born in Rehoboth, Mass., May 24, 1748; was the son of Deacon Charles Seamans and Hannah, his wife. His father was a farmer at Rehoboth; moved to Swansen, Mass., when Job was about a year old, residing there about four years; then removed to Providence, R. I., where he lived about ten years. He then moved to Sackville, Cumberland County, Nova Scotia, where he lived about eight years, and where he died in the year 1771, aged seventy-one years. Job, the son, followed the farm until the father died. He was about fifteen years old when he moved from Providence to Sackville; and on August 10, 1769, he married, at Sackville, Miss Sarah Esterbrooks, a daughter of Valentine Esterbrooks, Esq., and who was born at Johnson, R. I., April 14, 1750. He began to preach at Sackville, having united with the Baptist Church there, when about twenty years of age, and about one year before his marriage. Soon after his father died, in 1771, he returned to New England, and in 1772 he was preaching to the church at North Attleborough, Mass., and on the 15th of December, 1772, he was ordained as its pastor. He continued a successful ministry there for about fifteen years. In 1787 he first came to New Hampshire. The entry in his diary is as follows: "Lord's day, June 17, 1787, I preached in Sutton, in the State of New Hampshire." The next entry is,— "Lord's Day, June 24, I preached in New London, in the same State." He came to New London again in February, 1788, arriving on the 22d at Deacon Hunting's, and remained some two months, preaching from house to house. Many of the early settlers of New London were from Attleborough, Mass., and the towns in that neighborhood, who had long been acquainted with him there, and it is not strange that they should be anxious to obtain him for their minister here, and so we find him listening to their call, and willing in the end to cast in his lot with those old friends; and after considering the subject fully, he started, with his family, for New London, June 20, 1788, and arrived there July 1st, and he says in his diary: "Went into a very poor house of Mr. James Brooklebank. The same night our youngest child (Manning) was taken sick." He was, as you see, twelve days in moving from Attleborough to New London, a distance of one hundred and thirty or one hundred and forty miles perhaps; as long a time as would be necessary to go to San Francisco and back again,—time enough now to go to London or Paris.

His first work here was to found a church. This was done October 23, 1788, the churches from Sutton and Wendell being present, by their ministers and delegates, to counsel and assist. The church consisted at first of eleven members, and Mr. Seamans was installed as pastor of the church and minister of the town January 21, 1789. Of the exercises at his installation, the gathering at the unfinished meeting-house, and the salary paid him by the town, we have already spoken; also of the seasons of reformation in the church from time to time under his preaching.

The church records also show a vast amount of labor done in the church. Those were days for laying foundations, and Elder Seamans laid his foundations for church order and discipline deep, broad and permanent. Were members guilty of any immorality, they were dealt with. Did they absent themselves from the communion of the church, that was cause for labor. All members were required to do their share, according to their means, for the support of the gospel. Many were the labors, frequent the letters of admonition, and not unfrequent the final letters of expulsion sent to members of the church for the sole reason that they were unwilling to pay their due proportion, according to their ability, for ministerial support.

While all the poor were welcomed to the privileges of the gospel, without money and without price, yet it was held to be the duty of those church-members who were known to be able, and could not deny the fact of their ability, to pay accordingly; and if they would not, no amount of profession, no quantity of apparent sanctity and long-facedness, was sufficient to screen the delinquent miser from merited expulsion.

The Christian of those days evidently believed that no amount of grace was sufficient to save a man, unless it was sufficient to sanctify his love of gain as well as his other affections, and that a man's conversion, in order to be genuine, must reach not only his head, but also his heart, and not only his head and heart, but also his pocket-book. For the last years of his life he was not able to preach, except occasionally; he did not preach much after the year 1824, though, so far as I can find, his pastoral relation to the church continued up to 1828, some forty years. That year Mr. Tracy was ordained as his successor in that office. Elder Seamans died October 4, 1830, aged eighty-two years, four months and ten days, among the people with whom and for whom he had labored. He married, for his second wife, November 30, 1819, Mrs. Mary Everett, widow of Jonathan Everett.

Elder Seamans was a man of medium stature, light complexion, marked features, and in advanced life had a commanding and venerable appearance. It is said that he never wrote a sermon in his life. Yet he always preached his two sermons on Sunday, and frequently a third, besides many on week-days, and was always acceptable and interesting, and an earnest preacher of the gospel of the Son of God. His long ministry in this town was no insignificant element in advancing the temporal and spiritual welfare of the people and the church of New London.

JOSEPH DAVIS moved into town in November, 1824, and commenced preaching at once. He remained in town about three years, as a stated supply. Then Oren Tracy was called; but having some engagements that detained him for a while, his brother, Leonard Tracy, preached here one season, and until his brother was prepared to come.

OREN TRACY was born at Tunbridge, Vt., June 18, 1798; was the son of Cyrus and Hannah Lillie Tracy. He was educated at Waterville College, Maine, but did not graduate. He took what was then termed the short course in theology, and was ordained at East Stoughton, Mass., in October, 1825. He was married there during the first year of his ministry to Miss Marcia Billings, of Royalton, Vt. After remaining there some two years or more, very pleasantly located, his physician recommended his removal from the sea-board, and he accepted the call from New London and moved there in the fall of 1827, and was ordained as the successor of Elder Seamans, January 30, 1828, and remained there till 1836, a period of about nine years. Under him the cause of education received a new impetus in town. Teachers were more thoroughly and systematically examined, and a higher standard in our common school education was at once attained; all our schools seemed to catch an inspiration from his spirit and efforts. He had great sympathy with and great influence over young people. All the children loved Elder Tracy. I was twelve years old when he came here, and no man did so much as he to arouse in me a love of learning and a determination to obtain a liberal education, at whatever cost. Mr. Tracy, I need not say, was my favorite minister; and Mrs. Tracy was a good, kind, pleasant, motherly woman, who seemed to take as much interest in the people and in the children as he did.

He was also a pioneer in the cause of temperance. When he came here it was the fashion to set out the decanter of liquor, with sugar and water, whenever the minister made a friendly call. It would have been considered almost disrespectful not to have done so. This fashion was soon changed under his administration, for he would not taste of distilled spirits at all, not even wine or cider, as a beverage. I remember that he delivered a course of lectures on temperance on Sundays, at the intermission between the forenoon and afternoon service; and, besides, he usually held his third meeting on Sunday, also. I have spoken of the revival of 1831 and 1832 under his preaching, when nearly a hundred were added to the church.

Many who are here to-day will never forget that first Sunday in January, 1832, and also the first Sunday in March of the same year, upon each of which occasions about forty, standing on both sides of the broad aisle in the old meeting-house, received the right hand of fellowship from Mr. Tracy, on being received as members of the church. On these occasions Mr. Tracy seemed to be inspired. I was absent at school for the last year or two of his residence here, and entered college in 1836, the year he moved away. I have never found and never expect to find another minister who, in all respects, would quite fill Mr. Tracy's place with me.

From New London he went to Newport, N. H., thence to Townsend, Mass., afterwards to Fitchburg, Athol and Greenfield, in that State. From 1847 to 1849 he was agent of the American Baptist Missionary Union in New England, residing at Springfield, Mass., and Hartford, Conn. From 1851 to 1862 he was agent of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society, residing at Concord, N. H. From Concord he went to Greenfield, Mass., where he died September 6, 1863, aged sixty-five. Mrs. Tracy still survives him, residing with her daughter, Mrs. Elliott, of Boston.

REUBEN SAWYER was born in Monkton, Vt., March 11, 1798; was married to Laura Wyman, at West Haven, Vt., in 1819. After this he was converted and baptized by his father, Rev. Isaac Sawyer, of Brandon, Vt. In 1822 he entered the Theological Seminary at Hamilton, N. Y.; but owing to failing health he did not complete his course. He was ordained pastor of the Baptist Church in West Haven, Vt., in 1824. He remained there as pastor until he came to New London, early in 1835, where he became a member of the church, and was received as its pastor July 3d, which place he held until April 8, 1844, when he resigned his pastoral charge, but remained with the church in the service of the New Hampshire Baptist Convention until autumn, when he removed to Chester, Vt., where he was pastor of the church for some ten years. From there he removed to Leyden, N. Y., where he remained as pastor of the church for some ten years, when he returned to Vermont for a few years, at Hinesburg and in that vicinity, when he returned to Leyden, where, after a protracted illness, he died June 29, 1869, in the seventy-second year of his age.

He gave the prime of his life, the vigor of his manhood, to the church here. Large obligations were made to it during his stay. The demands upon his time and strength were such as in these days would be deemed severe, with three preaching services on the Sabbath most of the time, and two or three other meetings during the week. In speaking of these arduous duties, his son, Rev. A. W. Sawyer, D.D., president of Avidia College, N. S., in a letter to me, says: "But he was strengthened by the sympathy and affection of his people. The memory of the kindness he there experienced and the friendships he there formed were cherished by him to the last, and lightened the burdens of his declining years. His last year in New London was less pleasant to him because of his opposition to the anti-slavery agitation; but his views afterwards changed somewhat, so that he firmly held the conviction that the United States should be a land of freedom." He took an interest in whatever benefited the people with whom he lived. He was one of the founders of the original New London Academy, and always was deeply interested in the school. But first of all he felt that he was called to preach the gospel. This work he loved. He enjoyed most the presentation of those doctrines termed evangelical. Feeling the strength and comfort of these truths in his own soul, his presentation of them to his people was often with remarkable clearness and power.

The ministers who have followed Mr. Sawyer are as follows:

Mark Carpenter, came in 1844, left in 1849, six years.

Ebenezer Dodge, came in 1849, left in 1853, five years.

Peter M. Hersey (Christian), came in 1849, left in 1853, five years.

H. F. Lane (C. B.), came in 1854, left in 1857, four years.

Lucien Hayden, came in 1857, left in 1869, twelve years.

Asa Randle (F. W. B.), came in 1859, left in 1861, three years.

F. D. Blake (C. B.), came in 1870, left in 1873, four years.

S. C. Fletcher, came in 1874, and still remains.

The church frequently, and I think generally, depends as much upon the character and conduct of its deacons for its standing and reputation with the world as it does upon its ministers; so I have examined your church records to see who have been the deacons in New London, and, so far as I know, the church has been very fortunate in the selection of its deacons.

Ebenezer Hunting, elected January 8, 1789.

Matthew Harvey, Zebedee Hayes, elected July 5, 1793.

Jonas Shepard, Peter Sargent, Jr., elected April 3, 1812.

David Everett, Dexter Everett, elected June 16, 1825.

Joseph C. Herrick, Micajah Morgan, elected April 21, 1849.

Hunting was alone for about four and a half years, then Deacons Harvey and Hayes for nineteen years, then Deacons Shepard and Sargent for thirteen years, then the two Deacons Everett for twenty-four years, and last, Deacons Herrick and Morgan for thirty years.

J. C. Bickford

Ministers who have gone out from New London :

Enoch Hunting (C. B.), ordained March 15, 1814.

Benjamin Woodbury (Cong.), ordained about 1829.

Theophilus B. Adams (C. B.), ordained May 29, 1821.

Joshua Clement (C. B.), ordained about 1834.

Valentine E. Bunker (C. B.), licensed April 8, 1836.

Francis A. Gates (C. B.), licensed May, 1837.

Robert Stinson (Universalist), ordained about 1840.

Sylvan Hunting (Unitarian).

James Phillips (Methodist).

Lewis Phillips (Christian).

Dura P. Morgan (C. B.), ordained about 1872.

Lawyers of New London.—STEPHEN C. BADGER, a native of Warner, N. H., graduated at Dartmouth College in 1823; studied law with Henry B. Chase, of Warner; commenced practice in New London in 1826, where he remained until 1833, a period of eight years, when he removed to Concord; was clerk of the courts for Merrimack County; police justice for Concord; a civil engineer; died at Concord October 29, 1872. He married Miss Sophronia Evans, of Warner.

WALTER P. FLANDERS, also a native of Warner, N. H., graduated at Dartmouth, 1831; studied law with Hon. John D. Willard, of Troy, N. Y., and Hon. George W. Nesmith, of Franklin, N. H.; commenced practice in New London in 1834; was a member of the New Hampshire Legislature from New London in 1841 and 1842, and in 1849 he removed to Milwaukee, Wis., where he still resides. He married Miss Susan E. Greeley, of this town, youngest daughter of Jonathan Greeley, Esq.

GEORGE W. EVERETT, a native of New London, born November 19, 1819; was educated at the public school and academy of this town; studied law with Walter P. Flanders, of this place; was admitted to the bar in 1847, and soon began practice here. He was a member of the Legislature from this town in the years 1852 and 1856, and was solicitor for Merrimack County for five years, from 1856 to 1861. In 1862 he received a commission as major of the Ninth Regiment of Volunteer Militia, which was ordered to the South-west; remained with the regiment one year, showing himself a brave and faithful officer. In August, 1863, as his regiment was coming up the Mississippi River from Vicksburg, Miss., he was taken dangerously ill, and stopping at Cincinnati, Ohio, he sank rapidly and died on the 27th of August, 1863, just one year and a day from the date of his commission. His remains were brought to his native town and buried with Masonic honors. He married Miss Ellen T. Lane, of Gloucester, Mass.

EDWARD B. KNIGHT, who was a brother of Professor Ephraim Knight, of this town, graduated at Dartmouth in 1861; studied law with George W. Everett, of this place; was admitted to the bar in 1864, and commenced practice at Dover, N. H., but soon removed to Virginia, where he still resides in the practice of his profession.

HON. J. EVERETT SARGENT. (See chapter on Bench and Bar.)

May peace and prosperity forever dwell in the midst of this people, and may the God of the fathers of this goodly town be the children's God and portion forever.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

HEZEKIAH C. BICKFORD.

Hezekiah Cook Bickford, M.D., was born in New London, N. H., April 27, 1817. He was one of six children, having four sisters and one brother, and later two step-brothers.

His father's name was Daniel Bickford. We have been unable to trace the Bickford family back any farther than to New Durham, N. H., from whence the doctor's grandfather went to Wheelock, Vt., and upon his death his father came to New London, N. P.

From his grandmother he obtained his middle name, Cook, that being the name of her family.

His mother was Martha Adams, who died when he was but five years old, in 1822, being forty-one years of age.

With this Adams family local tradition connects some of those characteristic stories of the hardships endured by our New England ancestors. It is related that when she was but three months old her father took her with her mother, on horse-back, and journeyed from their then home in Rowley, Mass., to New London, N. H., and built him a log house, thus becoming one of the first settlers of the town. This sturdy perseverance and endurance of hardship flowed undiluted in the blood of their grandson, as he encountered and overcame obstacles both of circumstances and of physical suffering and arrived at eminence in his profession.

Very early indeed did this stern battle of life begin with him, for, on account of the family's straitened circumstances, he was able to go to school but very little during all his childhood. The little work his hands could do was sorely needed at home.

About a year after his mother's death the family moved to Springfield, N. H. As he became older he "worked out," as the old phrase has it, and gave his earnings to his father.

When fifteen or sixteen years of age he took his little bundle of worldly goods and walked to Stoneham, Mass., where he found work for the summer with a family by the name of Richardson. When fall came he went into the Suffolk Mills, at Lowell, Mass., where he remained for about seven years.

During his last year in the mill he obtained work for his evenings as a clerk in a store, receiving there for a shilling a night—about one dollar a week. But after the toil of the day and the work of the evening he would go home, not to idle fun, nor indulgence, nor even to sleep, but to some hour or two of hard study into midnight,—not reading, but study,—beginning thus early that life in earnest which characterized his later years.

When hardly twenty-one, and before he had finally done with work in the mill, he taught school on "Burpee Hill," in New London, N. H. It must have been about this time that he taught one winter in Dracont, Mass., a town on the opposite bank of the river from Lowell; and of whatever means he could avail himself for self-improvement, whether by the hard work of teaching, or by the lyceum, or in any other way, he was quick to seize the opportunity and persist in making it as profitable as possible for self-culture.

After leaving the mill he went to Boston, into business with a man whose name we do not give. Though he had put in his little savings, the profits which the business was evidently rendering to somebody did not come at all to him. So he withdrew and went to work for a business man named H. Parmenter, on Washington Street, of the same city.

In course of time this man established a store in Newport, R. I., and so great was his confidence in this young clerk of his that he entrusted him with the management of this new enterprise.

It was during his residence at Newport that he became acquainted with Dr. Butler and began the study of medicine. He left the store and devoted a year to study with Dr. Butler. He then pursued his course with Dr. Ayer, of New Hampton, N. H., taking also one term of lectures at Dartmouth Medical School. From Dr. Ayer he went to Philadelphia, Pa., for six months, and was graduated from Jefferson College, taking his degree March 20, 1845. In April, 1845, he began the practice of medicine in New London, N. H. After a year he was married to Paulina A. Coburn, of Dracont, Mass., June 17, 1846. For six years they lived in New London and had born to them two sons,—George Coburn, born March 25, 1847, and John Truman, born in 1849. The former son, now living in New London, married Florence Stetson, of Charlestown, Mass., February 28, 1877, and to them have been born four children,—Alice Florence, born October 30, 1878; Horace Stetson, born March 3, 1880; George Owen, born July 26, 1881, died August 25, 1881; Walter Howard, born August 4, 1884, died October 9, 1884.

The latter son, John Truman, died in Billerica, Mass., when hardly four years old.

On June 15, 1851, he moved to Billerica, Mass., where he remained ten years and established his reputation as a successful practitioner, which he had already acquired.

It was during this period that his daughter, Harriet Augusta, was born, June 20, 1853. She married,

May 10, 1883, Rev. Frank Houghton Allen, pastor of the Congregational Church, Shrewsbury, Mass., where was born to them a son, Harold Bickford, May 29, 1884. He began practice in Charlestown, Mass., September 16, 1861, where he remained for nearly fifteen years and attained high eminence and success.

Here died, after a lingering illness, the wife who had shared the struggles of his youth, just as they were beginning to realize their fondest hopes; and in the family Bible he pays her this tender tribute: "Died November 29, 1867, aged 49 years. Gone to her rest. A kind and devoted wife, an affectionate and tender mother, a faithful and consistent Christian."

The years at Charlestown were filled with incessant activity, for which all his previous persevering and energetic life had prepared him. His well-balanced judgment made him widely sought by his medical associates in consultation on difficult cases. His warm sympathies and wise words fitly spoken endeared him to the hearts and homes of a large circle of friends.

On April 22, 1869, he married Maria Richardson, daughter of the late Wm. Gray, of Billerica, where she was born June 25, 1847. To them were born two children,—Gertrude Maria, June 9, 1870, and Lucy Gray, July 15, 1873. The latter died in Woburn, Mass., October 3, 1881.

But disease compelled him to relinquish practice, and he was succeeded by his nephew, Dr. Robert A. Blood, who had also been his medical student.

In May, 1876, he moved to his new home in Woburn, Mass. The change of scene, the quiet life with his family, the beautiful surroundings of his home, all had an influence temporarily to recuperate the exhausted energies. Here came rest and the looking back over a fruitful life and the realization of well-earned happiness. But the weakness returned, and after a long and distressing illness, serenely borne, he passed away March 26, 1878. The disease which terminated his life was a chronic ulcer of the duodenum, from which, for twenty years, he had suffered occasional, often severe, attacks, followed by extreme prostration; but as often would he rise, with almost incredible energy, by what seemed sheer force of will, and plunge into his work. It was this trait of his character which gave him success. It was his stanch Christian manhood that won him so large a circle of friends, who spoke the sincere tributes paid to his memory as the "beloved physician."

He joined the Winthrop (Congregational) Church, of Charlestown, May 4, 1862, and was known as a consistent Christian in his conduct, always in his place in church on the Sabbath, even in his busiest years.

He became a member of the Joseph Warren Lodge of Masons, of Boston, Mass., January, 1872, and was also a member of the Waverly Royal Arch Chapter, and of the Hugh De Payens Commandery of Knights Templar, of Melrose, Mass. His remains were interred in Woodlawn Cemetery, Mass.

HISTORY OF EPSOM.

BY JOHN H. DOLBEER.

CHAPTER I.

THIS town derives its name from a market-town in the county of Surry, England, about sixteen miles from London. It is bounded north by Pittsfield, south by Allenstown, east by Deerfield and Northwood, and west by Chichester and Pembroke, and is twelve miles easterly from Concord.

There are no records to be found which show the precise time when the first settlement was commenced, but it appears from various facts that there was a number of families in town a considerable time before its incorporation.

Among the first who began settlements in the town were Charles McCoy, from Londonderry; William Blazo, a Frenchman; Andrew McClary, from Londonderry, in Ireland; and a family by the name of Blake.

McCoy built a house on the north side of what is now called Sanborn's Hill, and thence extended his farm by spotting the trees round upon the mountain, which will probably always bear his name. A daughter of his was the first white child born in the town, and she was presented by the proprietors with a tract of land, a portion of which is now owned by her grandson, Lemuel B. Towle. She married a Mr. Wood and lived to an extreme old age.

Samuel Blake, commonly known as Sergeant Blake, was one of the pioneer settlers, coming into town when but fifteen years of age, and began a settlement near where Mr. John Chesley now lives. He purchased his land, more than one hundred acres, near the centre of the town, for ten shillings, and turned in his jack-knife for one shilling of that sum. Mr. Blake had a large family of children, who grew up and married; but at the present writing none of the name remain in town, and but few of his descendants.

As will be seen by the following document, the town was granted to the tax-payers of Rye, New Castle and Greenland, in 1727, according to the amount of their respective taxes:

"George, By the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith.

"To all People to whom these presents shall come: Greeting.

"Know ye, we, of our especial knowledge and mere motion, for the due encouragement of settling a new plantation, by and with the advice and consent of our council, have given & Granted, and by these Presents, as far as in us lies, do give and grant unto all such of our loving subjects as were inhabitants and free holders in the year one thousand seven hundred and twenty-three, in our town of New Castle and in the Parish of Greenland, both within our Province of New Hampshire, in New England, to be divided among them in proportion to their Respective Rates, which they paid in the year 1723 aforesaid, one tract of Land to be laid out at the head of Nottingham and Northward of land formerly granted to the children of Saml. A meeting notified to meet at the ferry-house in New Castle on May 26, 1729, met, and because the proprietors of Epsom who lived in the parish of New Castle had not been properly notified of the meeting, it was adjourned to the court-house in Portsmouth, June 3^d following, at eight o'clock in the forenoon.

"Resolved Jotham Osborne, Moderator.
 "Resolved Jotham Simpson, Selectman for New Castle; Jotham Osborne, Esq, for Rye; Joshua Bucklett for Greenland.

"Upon consideration that sundry persons concerned in the s^d town of Epsom hath Refused to pay his Proportion to the Charges a Rising in Giving the Charter, and the s^d town surveyed & Laid out for prevention whereof, Resolved, that any persons that shall Refuse or Neglect to pay their Proportion to the charge already due, or that shall, Hereafter, be allowed by the Selectmen and committee to the collectors for the time being, Every such Person shall forfeit his or their Rights, which, when forfeited, shall be exposed to Sale by publick Vendue, after stopping the charges & the sum which ought to be paid by the Person to the collector according to his List, then the over Plus shall be returned to the Original Proprietor.

"Resolved That the Selectmen chosen at this meeting be Powered & Directed to call the Last Selectmen to account, and to settle the same.

"Resolved That the Selectmen procure some Eminent Person to View the s^d Land, and to see where and in what method to lay out their Lots, and where to settle the town, and to do what they shall think proper for the advancing the settling of the town aforesaid, and to raise money Sufficient to Defray the Charges thereon upon the Propriet.

"Town meeting ended.
 "JOHAN ORDONKE, Moderator."

At a meeting held at Rye on the 21st of January, 1729, the proprietors

"Resolved, That James Randall, Thomas Berry and L^d Saml. Wallis be a committee to view and make choice of a place for the senter of the town, and to lay out high ways and the Lots according to the Rates that the Proprietors paid, conformable to the charter."

May 22, 1732, at the court-house, Portsmouth,—

"Resolved That there be laid out, at some convenient place in the town suitable for Building a Meeting house & for settling the twenty families accordingly, one thousand acres in fifty-acre Lots, one Lot to be given to any Person that will settle & will fulfill the Charter so far as relates to building a house and clearing three acres of Land, and L^d Saml. Wallis, Daniel Lunt, Thomas Berry, Richd. Goss and Wilk. Haines be a committee to give with such Persons as they shall think proper, to settle on the said Lots. And 'tis hereby determined & voted in the Meeting that the Propriet shall have the Refusal of those Lots; and if there be not twenty of them appears to take up with those Lots, on the consideration above, then to be offered and Laid out to any other person that will except the same on these^d consideration.
 "Resolved, That thirty acres be added to each of the twenty men mentioned in the above vote, to be Laid out in some other part of the town, as the Proprietors shall think best, beside the fifty acres above mentioned, to make up each man eighty acres.

"Resolved, That each Propriet pay, at the drawing his Lot, five shillings and what he is behind in his Ratesages in the Rates formerly Raised."

At a proprietors' meeting, held June 12, 1732, at the house of Daniel Lunt, in Greenland, it was

"Resolved, James Marden one of the committee in the Room of Daniel Lunt, who Refused to serve.

"Resolved, That the selectmen purchase a town Book to enter the Records in.

"Resolved, That the twenty men draw the 20 fifty-acre Lots. Now, at this meeting, the twenty men drew accordingly,—James Sevey, No. 1;

Rich^d. Goss, 2; Thos. Berry, 3; Daniel Lund, 4; Noah Seavey, 5; Wall^r Lock, 6; Sam^l. Dowst, 7; Zach. Berry, 8; Eben. Berry, 9; Solo. Dowst, 10; Sam^l. Wallis, 11; Wall^r. Wallis, 12; John Black, 13; Josiah Foss, 14; Simon Knowles, 15; Paul Chapman, 16; Joseph Lock, 17; Joham Foss, 18; Jehah Weeks, 19; James Manden, 20.*

The above-mentioned lots are what were for many years known as the "home-lots," upon the road leading from Deerfield to Epsom Station, by way of the old Centre. The lots were upon either side of the road, and were one hundred and sixty rods in length and fifty rods wide, containing fifty acres.

It is noticeable that none of that land is owned at this time by any of the same name as the original proprietors; neither is it by any of their descendants.

At a proprietors' meeting, at the house of Christopher Fredericks, in New Castle, July 4, 1732, it was

* Resolved, That there be a committee chosen to go to Hampton to see how their Charter is, and to Dispose them about the same.

* Resolved, Cap^t. Osborne and Wall^r. Haines the committee to go to Hampton & Dispose with Chester Propriet^r & see their Charter & to make a Return, and to call on the Sec^y to know the Date of our Grant of our Charter."

At a proprietors' meeting, at the court-house, Portsmouth, October 16, 1832, it was

* Resolved, That there be Reserved for the use of the Proprietors, to be Divided and Laid out as the Propriet^r shall hereafter think proper, viz., all the Land on the North-West side of Suncook River.

* Resolved, That the st^d shall be first Laid out in to four Ranges, each one mile deep, Reserving a Road of Four Rods wide between the first and second Range, & between the third and fourth, the Ranges to run the whole Length of the town, the first Range to begin at the south corner.

* Resolved, That all the Land not before Reserved and Granted be Laid out on the account of the Propriet^r, and that they Draw Lots there-of, the method for the same, thus, viz.: Number one to begin at the South end of the first Range, & to be numbered and Laid out to the Northward till the whole Range be finished; and then to begin at the North end of the Second Range, & to be numbered to the Southward till the Second Range be finished; and then to begin at the South end at the South end & Run toward the North till that Range be finished; and then to begin at the North of the fourth Range and Run to the Southward, still Reserving Roads between as many of the Lots as may be that convenient.

* Resolved, That there be a meeting-house of thirty foot Long and twenty-four foot wide, immediately Built at the charge of the Propriet^r, & that Mr. Joshua Brackett, Mr. Wall^r. Lock & Thos^d. Atkinson, Esq., be a committee to a Give for the same with any Parson or Parsons shall do it easiest and cheapest.

* Resolved, Each Propriet^r, before he Draws his Lot, pay into the Selectmen as much money as their several Rates are, by which the town is to be Divided, & likewise to pay all their arrearages; other ways they shall not be allowed to Draw.

* Town-meeting ended.

"J. SIMONSON, Clerk."

In 1732 the selectmen of Epsom received a notice from the selectmen of Nottingham of a desire to "perambulate the bounds." Accordingly, Lieutenant Samuel Wallis, Mr. Richard Goss and Mr. Samuel Weeks were appointed a committee to act with the committee from Nottingham.

COMMITTEES' RETURN.

At a proprietors' meeting, held the 6th of November, 1732, a committee was chosen to take a list of the proprietors of Epsom, then living in New Castle, Rye and Greenland, the committee consisting of three persons, one in each of the above places.

Upon the 9th of the same month the above committee reported forty-seven proprietors in New Castle, thirty-three in Rye and sixty-three in Greenland; in all, one hundred and forty-three.

The proprietors then proceeded to draw their several lots, as follows:

Nos. 1, Nathaniel White; 2, James Seavey; 3, John Osborne; 4, Benjamin Ball; 5, Israel Mark; 6, Samuel Haines; 7, John Foss; 8, Joshua Brackett; 9, Zachariah Foss; 10, Jonathan Dockam; 11, Richard Jordan; 12, Samuel Weeks; 13, John Underwood; 14, Robert Avery; 15, John Ramage; 16, Richard Tarleton; 17, Henry Trefethen; 18, Thomas Munroe; 19, John Wilson; 20, James Marben; 21, John Othow; 22, Samuel Seavey; 23, John Johnson; 24, John Brackett; 25, Thomas Rand; 26, Aise Clark; 27, Walter Philbrook; 28, Joseph Weeks; 29, Robert Goss; 30, George Wallis; 31, Samuel Haines; 32, Joshua Foss; 33, Mary Randall; 34, Joshua Berry; 35, William Berry; 36, Jeremiah Walcott; 37, Samuel Chapman, Samuel Seale, John Hucksan, Samuel Ring; 38, John Gard; 39, John Tuckerman; 40, James Berry; 41, Christopher Amazeen; 42, Samuel Berry; 43, William Haines; 44, Reuben Mace; 45, John Lewis; 46, Nathaniel Berry; 47, Samuel Rand; 48, John Blake; 49, John Philbrook; 50, James Johnson, Ebenezer Johnson; 51, John Yeaton; 52, Elias Philbrook; 53, George Kenesont; 54, Joseph Jackson; 55, John Trandy; 56, John Bryant; 57, Jonathan Philbrook; 58, William Wallis, Jun.; 59, Edward Martin; 60, Daniel Lund; 61, Sampson Shree; 62, William Seavey, Jun.; 63, Joseph Simpson, Robert Lee, Thomas Marshall; 64, Nehemiah Berry; 65, Joshua Seavey; 66, Samuel Brackett; 67, Robert Goss, Robert Goss, Jun.; 68, Samuel Wallis; 69, Samuel Dowst; 70, John Johnson; 71, James Chadwick; 72, Christopher Treadwell; 73, Richard Goss; 74, Joshua Weeks; 75, John Frost; 76, Solomon Dowst; 77, Barnaby Crane; 78, James Winden; 79, James Philpot; 80, Joseph Malcom; 81, John Stevens; 82, Widow Hitches; 83, Nathaniel Rand; 84, Benjamin Parker; 85, Philip Page; 86, William Kelly; 87, Richard Neale; 88, William Bucknel, Thomas Berry, Isaac Foss; 89, William Perkins, John Berry; 90, Thomas Rand, Jr.; 91, John Youren; 92, Samuel Douglass, Nathaniel Huggins; 93, Foster Trefethen; 94, Colonel Shadrach Walton; 95, Nathaniel Johnson; 96, Benjamin Seavey, Jr.; 97, Joseph Youren; 98, Mathias Haines; 99, Samuel Foss; 100, Deacon John Gate, William Gate; 101, William Seavey; 102, Ebenezer Berry; 103, Mathias Haines; 104, Benjamin Mussey; 105, John Winden; 106, Henry Page; 107, Jonathan Osborne, Esq.; 108, Walter Abbot; 109, John Sherburn; 110, Joseph Hill; 111, William Wallis; 112, Jonathan Weeks; 113, John Brackett; 114, William Jones; 115, Widow Folsom; 116, William Mason; 117, Nathaniel Watson; 118, Samuel Davis; 119, Bams Greenough; 120, Joshua Haines; 121, Samuel Seavey; 122, Hugh Reed; 123, Benjamin Seavey; 124, Captain Samuel Weeks; 125, Theodore Atkinson; 126, James Randall; 127, John Seale; 128, Nathaniel Motrell.

The lots numbered 1 to 41, inclusive, are in the first range upon the easterly side of the town, beginning at Allenstown line; Nos. 42 to 73 are in the second range, beginning at Northwood line; 74 to 107 are in the third range, beginning at the southerly end of the town, and the remainder in the fourth range, numbering from the north.

It appears that there was left after the above lots were laid out two thousand acres in the southerly end of the fourth range, which, with some smaller lots at either end of the twenty lots that were first laid out and known as the "Home-lots," were known as common lands.

In response to a petition of the inhabitants of the town, the General Assembly of the province of New Hampshire, in the year 1765, by a special enactment made, gave the town the privilege to sell all the common or undivided land in the town, and the money arising from such sale was to be applied to the building of the meeting-house, and John McClary, George Wallis and Ephraim Locke were appointed by said Assembly to advertise and sell the same at public auction, which was done Monday, August 19, 1763.

This common land at the southwestern part of the town was laid out differently from the original lots, being only one-half as long and wide enough to contain one hundred acres. Lot No. 1, in the southwest corner, was sold to John Follensbee; No. 2, the next north, to John Blake; No. 3, Reuben Sanborn; No. 4, Reuben Sanborn; No. 5, John Hubbard; No. 6, Ephraim Locke; No. 7, Andrew McGalley; No. 8, Andrew McClary; No. 9, Andrew McClary; No. 10, Amos Morrill.

No. 1, in the second range of common lands, being the most southerly lot, was sold to John Follensbee; No. 2, John Follensbee; No. 3, Thomas Bickford; No. 4, Abraham Wallis; No. 5, Nathan Marden; No. 6, Nathan Marden; No. 7, Israel Gilman; No. 8, John McGalley; No. 9 and No. 10, Amos Morrill, but I find no account of the amount that was received by the town from such sales.

¹⁷⁴⁹ Aug. 29, 1750. Feb., That Doct. John Weeks And Francis Lock Be a Committee To See whether The men That had the Twenty And 20 Acres Lots Have Fulfilled According to Charter and agreement.

The following is from the "Historical Sketch of Epsom," by Rev. Jonathan Curtis, published in 1823:

¹⁷⁴⁹ INDIANNESS OF THE INDIANS.—In the early days of the town the inhabitants were kept in a state of almost continual alarm by the incursions of the Indians. For a considerable time after this settlement was commenced only the men ventured to remain in the place during the summer season, and then they must keep their arms by them while they labored on their lands. During the winter there was much less danger from the Indians. Even long after the men had removed their families into the place, so feeble was their defence against the attacks of their savage neighbors, that, whenever any immediate danger was apprehended, they either sent their families away or fled with them to the Garrison at Nottingham. At length a house was erected by Captain Andrew McClary within the limits of the town, and near the present residence of Mr. Joseph Lawrence, which was made proof against the assaults of the Indians, being surrounded by a high, wooden wall, entered by a heavy, well-secured gate. Further the inhabitants fled at night, whenever danger was apprehended.

¹⁷⁴⁹ COURTESY OF MRS. MCCOY.—The Indians were first attracted to the new settlements in the town by discovering McCoy at Suncook (now Pembroke). This, as nearly as can be ascertained, was in the year 1747. Reports were spread of the depredations of the Indians in various places, and McCoy had heard that they had been seen lurking about the woods at Pembroke (now Concord). He went as far as Pembroke; ascertained that they were in the vicinity; was somewhere discovered by them and followed home. They told his wife, whom they afterwards made prisoner, that they looked through cracks around the house and saw what they had for supper that night. They, however, did not discover them selves till the second day after. They probably wished to take a little time to learn the strength and disposition of the inhabitants. The next day Mrs. McCoy, attended by their two dogs, went down to see if any of the other families had returned from the Garrison. She found no one. On her return, as she was passing the black-house, which stood near the present site of the meeting-house, the dogs, which had passed around it, came running back growling and very much excited. Then appearances induced her to make the best of her way home. The Indians afterwards told her that they then lay concealed there and saw the dogs when they came round.

¹⁷⁴⁹ MCCOY, being now strongly suspicious that the Indians were actually in town, determined to set off the next day with his family for the Garrison at Nottingham. His family now consisted of himself, his wife and son John. The younger children were still at the garrison. They accordingly searched their houses as well as they could, and all set off next morning. Mc Coy and his son with their guns, though without ammunition, having fired away what they brought with them in hunting.

"As they were traveling a little distance east of the place where the meeting house now stands, Mrs. McCoy felt a little in the rear of the others. This circumstance gave the Indians a favorable opportunity for separating her from her husband and son. The Indians—three men and a boy—lay in ambush near the foot of Marlon's hill, not far from the junction of the mountain road with the main road. Here they suffered McCoy and his son to pass, but as his wife was passing they reached from the bushes and took hold of her, hazing her to make noise, and covering her mouth with their hands, as she cried to her husband for assistance. Her husband, hearing her cries, turned, and was about coming to her relief, but he no sooner began to advance than the Indians, expecting probably that he would fire upon them, began to raise their pieces, which she pushed one side and motioned to her friends to make their escape, knowing that their guns were not loaded, and that they would doubtless be killed if they approached. They accordingly ran into the woods and made their escape to the garrison. This took place August 21, 1717.

"The Indians then collected together what booty they could obtain, which consisted of an iron trammel, from Mr. George Wallace's, the apples of the only tree which bore in town, which was in the orchard now owned by Mr. David Griffin, and some other trifling articles, and prepared to set off with their prisoner for Canada.

"Before they took their departure they conveyed Mrs. McCoy to a place near the little Suncook River, where they left her in the care of the young Indian, while the three men, whose names were afterwards ascertained to be Plausawa, Sabats and Christ, went away, and were for some time absent. During their absence Mrs. McCoy thought of attempting to make her escape; she saw opportunities when she thought she might dispatch the young Indian with the trammel, which, with other things, was left with them, and thus perhaps avoid some strange and barbarous death or a long and distressing captivity. But, on the other hand, she knew not at what distance the others were. If she attempted to kill her young keeper she might fail. If she effected her purpose in this she might be pursued and overtaken by a cruel and revengeful foe, and then some dreadful death would be her certain portion. On the whole, she thought best to endeavor to prepare her mind to bear what might be no more than a period of savage captivity. Soon, however, the Indians returned and put an end, for the present, to all thoughts of escape. From the direction in which they went and returned, and from their sly appearance, she suspected what their business had been. She told them she guessed they had been burning her house; Plausawa, who could speak some broken English, informed her they had.

"They now commenced their long and tedious journey to Canada, in which the poor captive might well expect that great and complicated suffering would be her lot. She did, indeed, find the journey fatiguing, and her fare scant and precarious. But, in her treatment from the Indians, she experienced a very agreeable disappointment. The kindness she received from them was far greater than she had expected from those who were so often distinguished for their cruelties. The apples they had gathered they saved for her, giving her one every day. In this way they lasted her as far on the way as Lake Champlain. They gathered the last as they were crossing that lake in their canoes. This circumstance gave to the tree on which the apple grew the name of "Isabella's tree," her name being Isabella. In many ways did they appear desirous of mitigating the distresses of their prisoner while on their tedious journey. When night came on, and they halted to repose themselves in the dark wilderness, Plausawa, the head man, would make a little couch in the leaves a little way from them, cover her up with his own blanket, and there she was suffered to sleep undisturbed till morning. When they came to a river which must be bridled one they would carry her over on his back. Nothing like insult or indignity did they ever offer her during the whole time she was with them. They carried her to Canada and sold her as a servant to a French family, where, at the close of that war, she returned home. But so comfortable was her condition there, and her husband being a man of rather a rough and violent temper, she declared she never should have thought of attempting the journey home were it not for the sake of her children.

"After the capture of Mrs. McCoy the Indians frequently visited the town, but never committed any very great depredations. The greatest damage they ever did to the property of the inhabitants was the spoiling of all the ovens in town. At the time referred to there were but four ovens of oven in the place, viz. McCoy's, Captain McClary's, George Wallace's and Lieutenant Blake's. It was a time of apprehension from the Indians, and the inhabitants had the more all fled to the garrison at Nottingham. They left their ovens to graze about the woods, with a bell upon one of them. The Indians found them, shot one out of each yoke, took out their tongues, made a prize of the bell and left them.

"The ferocity and cruelty of the savages were doubtless very much averted by a friendly, unobtrusive course of conduct in the inhabitants towards them. This was particularly the case in the course pursued by Sergeant Blake. Being himself a curious marksman and an expert hunter—traits of character, in their view, of the highest order—he secured their respect; and, by a course of kind treatment, he secured their friendship to such a degree that, though they had opportunities, they would not injure him even in time of war.

"The first he ever saw of them was a company of them making towards his house through the opening from the top of Sanborn's Hill. He fled to the woods and there lay concealed till they had made a thorough search about his house and industries and had gone off. The next time his visitors came he was constrained to become more acquainted with them and to treat them with more attention. As he was busily engaged towards the close of the day in completing a yard for his cow, the declining sun suddenly threw several long, enormous shadows on the ground before him. He had no sooner turned to see the cause than he found himself in the company of a number of sly Indians. Seeing his perturbation, they patted him on the head and told him 'not to be afraid, for they would not hurt him.' They then went with him into his house, and their first business was to search all his bottles to see if he had any 'scurvey'—rum. They then told him they were very hungry, and wanted something to eat. It happened to have a quarter of a bear, which he gave them. They took it and threw it whole upon the fire, and very soon began to eat and eat from it half raw. While they were eating he employed himself in cutting pieces from it and brooding upon a stick, for them, which pleased them very much. After their repast they wished for the privilege of lying by his fire through the night, which he granted. The next morning they proposed trying skill with him in firing at a mark. To this he assented. But in this, finding themselves outdone, they were very much astonished and disgraced; nevertheless they highly commended him for his skill, putting him on the head and telling him,—"it he would go off with them they would make him their big captain." They used often to all upon him, and his kindness to them they never forgot, even in time of war.

"Plausawa had a peculiar manner of doubling his lip and probing a very small, piercing whistle, which might be heard at a great distance. At a time when considerable danger was apprehended from the Indians Blake went off into the woods alone, though considered hazardous, to look for his cow that was missing. As he was passing along, by Sunlar's Brook, an untroubled place, he met, near McCoy's Mountain, a very loud, sharp whistle, which he knew to be Plausawa's, suddenly passed through his head like the report of a pistol. The sudden alarm almost raised him from the ground, and, with a very light step, he soon reached home without his cow. In more peaceful times Plausawa asked him if he did not remember the time, and laughed very much to think how he ran at the fragrant, and told him the reason for his whistling. "Young Indian," said he, "put up gun to shoot Englishman; me knock it down and whistle to start you off,—so lasting is their friendship when treated well. At the close of the war the Indians built several wigwags near the confluence of Wallace's Brook with the Great Suncook. On a hillside in this river, near the place called "Short Falls," one of them lived for a considerable time. Plausawa and Sabats were finally both killed in time of peace by one of the whites, after a drink of rum, and buried near a certain place in Bessevær.

"Mc KEYS.—The surface of the town is generally uneven, the land frequently rising into considerable hills. Four of the highest eminences have received the name of mountains.

"McCoy's, named after Charles McCoy, one of the first settlers, lies about one mile and a half south from the centre of the town.

"Fort Mountain, probably so called from having an eminence near the summit resembling a fort, lies about one mile farther in a southwest direction, and is the highest of the four. This is probably the highest land in the same parallel of latitude between the ocean and Merrimack River. From its summit, in a clear atmosphere, the ocean may be distinctly seen, though distant about thirty miles, in a direct line, and for fifteen or twenty miles the beholder has a very full view of the surrounding country.

"Nat's Mountain is situated about half a mile south of the last-mentioned one. It was so named from the circumstance that Nathaniel, one of McCoy's children, who had been lost in the woods while searching for the cows, was found upon it. It is said he was absent several days, and subsisted during that time upon berries; and that, when first discovered, he was disposed to let them from those who came to his relief.

Nottingham Mountain, so named from its being crossed by the ancient Nottingham (now Deerfield) line, lies about half a mile easterly from Fort Mountain. In this mountain, on the Deerfield side, is said to be a small cave capable of containing twenty or thirty persons at the same time.

RIVERS. The Great and Little Suncook are the only streams which deserve the name of rivers. These seldom fail to afford abundant water for the various kinds of machinery that is situated upon them. The Great Suncook never fails, though the other does, in very dry seasons. The Great Suncook enters the town from the north, and, bending its course south-westerly, unites with the Merrimack at Pembroke. The Little Suncook enters the town from the east, a few rods below the pond of the same name, from which it runs, and, proceeding in a pretty direct course westward, near the centre of the town, unites with the river just mentioned.

PONDS. There are but three in the town, and these are small. Their names are Chestnut, Round and Osborne's Pond.

The following is found in the Records of the Legislature of 1762:

PROVINCE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

To His Excellency Bening Wentworth, Esq., Capt. General, Governor & Commander in Chief in and over His Majesty's Province of New Hampshire, and to the Honorable Council & House of Representatives now Convened in General Assembly at Portsmouth.

"The Petition of His Majesty's Good Subjects, Inhabitants of the township of Epsom, in said Province, humbly beg leave to remonstrate our Very Poor Distressing circumstances to your Compassion, & Most Earnestly Crave your Pity, and pray your Honours to Relieve us from our insupportable Burden of Province tax under which we are made to groan, and which we think we Cannot Possibly survive. Under unblest your Honours will be Pleas'd to Mitigate and free us from

"Gentlemen our Numbers are Very small & we are very much Exposed to Losses; our young Cattle, Sheep and Swine are often Destroyed by Wild beasts, and, further, we have lately selected a minister among us which we are afraid we shall not be able to Support; by Reason of the Poor circumstances we are now under we are not able to Build a Meeting House; that our Minister is oblig'd to Preach in some of our Dwelling houses; the tax which was laid on us the Last year many of us were oblig'd to hire the money to Pay; our Necessities are very Great by Reason of the Scarcity of Provisions we have been oblig'd to Lay out all that we have got for years Past & are now much in debt. This is to entreat your Honours to take of the heavy tax which we now Labour under, & Restore us the money we Paid Last year, & your Petitioners Shall ever Pray us in Duty Bound.

"John McClary, George Wallis, Nathan Marden, John Black, Ephraim Lock, Reuben Sanborn, Jun., Elphlet Sanborn, Reuben Sanborn, James Wood, Abraham Lebbell, Abraham Wallis, Benjamin Blake, Thomas Blake, Isaac Lebbell, Isaac Lebbell, Jun., Reuben Lebbell, Amos Bliss, Samuel Beckford, Samuel Black, Thomas Bliss, John Bliss, Ephraim Boy, William Blake, Benson Ham, John McGalley, Andrew McClary, Viner Egan.

"In Council, June 24th, 1762. Read & ordered to be sent down to the Hon^{ble} Assembly.

"THEODORE ATKINSON, J. S. Secy."

At a meeting called January 7, 1781, to consult in regard to adopting the plan or form of government that had been prepared by Congress for the government of the people, the matter was referred to a committee consisting of Major Morrill, Mr. Francis Lock, Captain Gray, Lieutenant Locke and Thomas Babb, to make such amendments as they should deem necessary in said plan and report at an adjourned meeting, at which time they presented the following objections, which were adopted by the town:

"1st. The twenty-third article of the bill of rights, as exhibited in said plan, is objected to and inadmissible. Because such Laws have been necessary in the present revolution, & may be in the future; Therefore, we submit the making of such Laws to the Legislative power.

"2d article of objection is respecting the qualification of a senator, as to estate. Because Interest or Estate, not being the most essential qualification, Therefore a person possessed of Intellectual abilities, which we humbly conceive is most essential, and having a free hold in his own right of one hundred pounds, ought not to be excluded of the privilege of being elected into office as senator.

"3d article of objection is that of the Delegate or representative selected from the Delegated body as to estate. For the same reason offered to the qualifications of a Senator as proposed in the plan, and that a person possessed of a visible estate of sixty pounds, shall be Capable of being Elected into office as Delegate or representative.

"4th Article of objection is to a Governor's not being eligible of being elected into office for more than three years in seven, according to the proposed plan. Because that a person elected into office for three years successively, whose service shall be found salutary to the publick Weal, is the most Capable of serving as long as he may be found serviceable to the State in said office.

"5th article of Objection is to a person's not having a Voice in the Choice of a Delegate, Representative, Senator or Governor unless possessed of a Free hold in his own right of one hundred pounds, according to the proposed plan. Because, according to the first article in the declaration of the rights of the people of the State of New Hampshire, all men are born equally free and Independent. Therefore, all Government of right Originates from the people, and is founded in consent. Therefore, the freeman, with ever so small pecuniary abilities, ought to have an equal Voice in the Legislative Choice with him who is possessed of the most accumulated fortune."

There was a lengthy contest with Chichester relative to the boundary line between the towns, which was finally settled by arbitration.

At the annual meeting held March 13, 1810, it was "Voted to accept Joshua Lane, of Sanbornton; Samuel Shepherd, of Gilmanton; and John Lane, of Candia, a committee to settle the contested line between Epsom and Chichester." And at the following March meeting it was voted to accept the report of the above committee, which established the line as it now is.

Before the building of railroads there was a large amount of travel and teaming through this town to the northern part of New Hampshire and Vermont to Portsmouth, Newburyport and other sea-board towns, and, consequently, a number of inns or taverns were required for the accommodation of the travelers.

The selectmen of the town for 1827 gave license to the following persons to keep an open tavern for one year, each paying two dollars for the privilege: William Yeaton, Jr., Colonel Daniel Cilley, Abel Brown, Samuel Whitney, Robert Knox, Captain Benjamin L. Locke, Captain Simon A. Heath, Joseph Lawrence and Abram W. Marden.

There is no tavern or public-house kept in town at the present time.

Mr. Curtis says: "The hilly surface of the town and numerous streams rendered it very favorable for that kind of machinery which requires the power of water. Within the limits of the town are eight grist-mills with twelve runs of stones, ten saw-mills, three carding-machines, three clothiers' shops, and four bark-mills."

At the present time there are two saw-mills, three grist-mills, one sash and door manufactory, one box factory and the shoe-factory, all situated upon the Great and Little Suncook Rivers.

In the spring of 1881 the matter of building up some kind of a business that would be of a benefit to the inhabitants of the town was discussed, and on the 4th day of May of that year a company was organized, called the Epsom Shoe-Factory Company, with a capital stock of three thousand dollars, divided into shares of twenty-five dollars each. The stock was soon taken and operations at once begun.

A dam was made across the little Suncook River, near the Free Baptist Church, and a two-story building erected.

The fall of that year the factory was rented to Hill & Puffer, of Lynn, Mass., who at once commenced the making of shoes. Their practice was to take stock from Lynn or other manufacturing towns that was partially fitted and make the shoes.

In 1883, Mr. Hill left the firm, and Mr. Nathan Goss was associated with Mr. Puffer in the business.

In the spring of 1885 they sold out to parties from Haverhill, Mass., and a new firm went into the business, known as Mitchell, Finney & Co.

They are now manufacturing shoes, cutting and making entire.

At present they employ about seventy-five hands and make six cases per day. Their pay-roll for labor is about one hundred dollars per day.

School and Parsonage Lots.—In accordance with the requirements of the grant of the town, two lots were set apart and known as the school and parsonage lots. The school lot was located at the westerly end of the "home lot," running from the turnpike up on Sanborn Hill, and was sold June 10, 1815, Captain Gray, B. M. Towle and others being purchasers. The amount realized from such sale, as nearly as can be ascertained from the records, was about twelve hundred dollars, which the town kept as a school fund and divided the interest of it annually among the several school districts according to their valuation.

The parsonage lot was near the "Old Centre," on the southerly side of the highway, on which the buildings now occupied by Addison Davis are situated, and was formerly known as the "Dr. Dickey place." The lot was sold by vote of the town about 1817, and the Rev. Jonathan Curtis was the purchaser, for one thousand and five dollars, which sum was invested by the town as a parsonage fund, the interest thereof being annually distributed among the several religious societies in town, in proportion to the taxable property of its members.

This was done until about 1848, when the selectmen, first obtaining counsel, decided the same to be unnecessary and refused to distribute the interest of said funds, and they were appropriated to the general expenses of the town.

Soon after this the "Esq. Hersey" farm was purchased for a poor farm. Prior to this the keeping and care of the paupers was annually sold to the person who would do it for the smallest sum. The farm was kept until 1865, when the county built an almshouse and took all the paupers chargeable to them that could conveniently be moved, which left but few to be supported by the town, and the farm was sold to James Yeaton and is now owned by Daniel Yeaton.

The first assessment or inventory that we find recorded was made in 1793, and contains the names of one hundred and seventy-eight persons that were rated as residents and fifty-nine that were non-residents, in which list there were only three that contained any middle letter, although there were several that had Jun , or 2d or 3d attached to their names.

The land being classed according to its various uses, we find that year fifteen acres of orcharding, one hundred and fifty-one and one-fourth acres of tillage, five hundred and fifty-eight acres of mowing and eight hundred and nineteen acres of pasture, the remainder being rated as unimproved lands. There were taxed that year sixty-five horses, one hundred and thirty oxen and two hundred and five cows.

At a town-meeting held March 12, 1839, a resolution was introduced by Jonathan Steele, Esq., which was adopted,—“that an agent be chosen by the town to receive from the town treasurer and selectmen all the permanent funds belonging to the town, and invest them in some safe institution for the benefit of the town, and pay the interest annually to such parties as the town might direct, viz.: the interest from the parsonage to authorized agents of the several religious societies, and the interest from the school fund to the several prudential committees.”

Frederick Sanborn was chosen agent, as above requested, and gave a bond in the sum of twelve thousand dollars for the faithful performance of the trust, Thomas D. Merrill and Samuel Cate being his sureties.

The bond stated the several permanent funds to be as follows: School fund, $1958.28; parsonage fund, $1065; and the surplus revenue, $3079.65,—total, $6002.33.

Canterbury Bridge.—In the journal of the House of the Provincial Legislature, February 23, 1744, is the following:

CANTERBURY PETITION

“The within Petition read & voted: Provided The Proprietors of the Town of Canterbury Build a Bridge this year with out for costs & charges to pass a parsonage over Suncook River where the way is now out to travel from Durham to Canterbury & will warrant to maintain the same Bridge for ten years; that then there be paid the said Proprietors the sum of fifty pounds Bills of credit out of the Interest money arising on the 25,000 £ Loan, out of that part of the Interest appropriated for Highway & A Discovery of the Country, when so much shall be in the Treasury.”

It is supposed that the above must have reference to the first bridge over the Suncook River in Epsom.

which was a few rods southwesterly from Charles W. Rand's house, as the road from there westward has always been known as the Canterbury road. After the Portsmouth turnpike became a public road the above bridge and the road from the "Goboro road" (so called), to the Pittsfield road, were discontinued.

Ministerial.—May 20, 1742, it was "Voted That there shall be thirty pounds money Raised by the Proprietors & inhabitants for the highering of a minister, that the Gospel may be promoted in the afore^sd town of Epsom."

June 8, 1743, "A vote past by the proprietors and Inhabitants of Epsom to Raise forty Pounds Monney for the Support of a minister, that the gospel might be promoted among us."

May 2, 1750, it was "Voted There should be money Raised for the support of the Gospel Fifty Pounds, old tenor."

April 23, 1760, it was "Voted one hundred pounds, old tenor, in money be raised to hire minister or de-fray charges."

"NATHAN MARDEN, Clerk."

August 14, 1861, it was "Voted That the meeting house shall stand on the same Lot where the old meeting house formerly stood, at or near the Burying place."

August 12, 1761, it was

"Voted Nathan Marden, George Wallis, ens. Thomas Blake, Ephraim Locke be a committee to provide for the ordination and to render account of the same to the Select men "Voted that the charge of the ordination be paid by the town.

"Voted Benjamin Blake, Benson Hunt, Amos blazebe a committee to assist the constable and tithing men in keeping order on the ordination day"

The following is a copy of Rev. Mr. Tucke's acceptance of the call to be their first minister:

"To the Inhabitants of Epsom

"Grace, mercy and peace from God, the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ be multiplied among you

"Brethren—It is some time since you give me a call by the sacred work of the ministry among you in this place, and now I understand by the committee sent to me by you, that you have both renewed and rat-fied that call, and continued further offers. And now, after a very serious, mature and most deliberate consideration, and fervent looking up to Heaven for direction, assistance and God's blessing, and hoping that there is a good prospect of doing good service among you, and in building you up in His most holy Truth, I now, confiding in and relying on the strength of divine grace for assistance, as God hath graciously promised His ministers, accept your call to me

"But, Brethren, I now must say to you, as in 1st Cor. 11—"So hath the Lord ordained, that they which preach the Gospel shall live of the Gospel." Now the very same I expect of and from you as long as God shall be pleased to continue me among you. And while I am with you I earnestly desire and crave your prayers for me as you pray for yourselves. The apostle says, 1st Thess. 5, 25—"Brethren pray for us," and I hope my prayers to Almighty God will not be wanting for you, while I minister among you, in holy things. I hope by God's grace, on which I wholly rely and depend, to say with the apostle in Colos. 1, 9—"I donot cease to pray for you, and to desire that we might be filled with the knowledge of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding."

"I do now subscribe myself—Yours to serve in the Gospel of our Blessed Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.

"JOHN TUCKE

"Epsom, August 17, 1761"

April 19, 1764, it was

"Voted, that a meeting house be built in Epsom, the length fifty feet and the breadth forty feet."

"Voted, Isaac Tabby, Senr, Thomas Blake, John McClary, George Wallace and Nathan Marden be a committee to carry on the work of said building, and they shall have full power to act and do in behalf of the town in the best manner they can, and take and render accounts to such as shall have authority to demand the same

"Also, a committee to value of the pews in a meeting house of the privilege for a pews & to take the security for the same"

"Voted, one thousand pounds, O. T., to be paid when a committee shall call for the same."

We are unable to find any report or account from the above committee.

There was a meeting at the house of Captain Andrew McClary on the 15th day of May, 1764, when twenty-one privileges for pews were sold by auction. We also find that the annual meeting, agreeable to the charter, for the year 1766 was held in the meeting-house, and for the greater part of the time thereafter, while the same remained standing.

It was occupied by the Congregational Church and Society for religious purposes until about 1820, when, other denominations having been organized in town, who claimed the right to hold their meetings there a part of the time; the following votes were passed by the town: November 15, 1819, it was "Voted, that the Toleration Society in Epsom have the use of the meeting-house in said town one-half the time on Sundays until the next annual meeting."

March 14, 1820, it was "Voted, that the town occupy the meeting-house one half the time on Sundays, and the Congregational Society the other half, until some accommodation be made respecting the same, the Congregational Society to occupy the meeting-house the next Sabbath."

There seems to have arisen a difficulty between Rev. Mr. Tucke and his people, for in the records of a meeting held at the meeting-house on Monday, the 13th day of December, 1773, the following vote was passed:

"Voted, that there should be a committee chosen to treat with Mr. Tucke, our minister, respecting some of his procedures.

"Resolved, Capt. Andrew McClary, Dea. Obadiah Williams and Jeremiah Prescott to be a committee for that purpose."

At a meeting held January 3, 1774, it was

"Resolved, that there should be a counsel called to judge upon and set the Difficulties Subsisting between the Rev. John Tuck and the Inhabitants of the Town of Epsom.

"Resolved, that there should be a committee Chosen to act and transact in Behalf of the Inhabitants of said town, Relating to the Difficulties above mentioned, till there is a final Decision and Determination of the above controversies.

"Resolved, C^os. Andrew McClary, De. Obadiah Williams and Amos Merrill should be committee for that purpose."

June 18, 1774, at a meeting called "to see if the Town when assembled will pass a vote to dismiss the Rev. Mr. Tucke from his Pastoral and Ministerial Relation to the Inhabitants of the Town of Epsom, agreeable to the Result of the Counsel Convened in said Epsom, March 15, 1774, by the request of the pastor, church and people," it was

"Resolved, the Rev. John Tucke a Dismission from his Pastoral and Ministerial Relation, agreeable to the foregoing Notification

"Resolved, that the Meeting-House shall be shut up till the town sees Cause to open the Said House again"

July 25, 1774, at a meeting of the inhabitants and voters called for that purpose,—

"Resolved, there shall be Money raised for preaching.

"Resolved, there shall be Six pounds, Lawful Money, raised for preaching.

"Resolved, Lieutenant Ephraim Lusk to provide a Minister for Said Town, so far as Six pounds will go"

Rev. Benjamin Thurston preached in town about 1779.

On the 19th of July, 1779, the town voted to give him a call, and provided that his salary should be sixty pounds, lawful money, for the first year, sixty-five pounds for the second year, and seventy pounds for the third year, with the use of parsonage and the usual supply of wood, etc. But for some reason Mr. Thurston declined the call.

March 21, 1781, it was "Resolved to raise money enough to Hire eight days' preaching."

After the call had been given Mr. Thurston to settle in the town as their minister it was

"Resolved that there be a Parsonage house and barn built upon the Parsonage lands, where it shall be thought most proper, of the following Dimensions, viz. the House to be 40 by 30 feet, and 2 story high; the barn to be 35 by 30 feet, and our elected Pastor to be consulted as to the finishing the Parsonage House as to convenience.

"Resolved that Mr. Thurston be allowed by the town the keeping of one horse, two cows and eight sheep, from the time of his settlement until the Parsonage land, wherever he shall live, will produce hay and grass sufficient for said stock at the expense of the town, allowing six and one-half tons of good English hay to winter the same

"Resolved that Mr. Thurston's salary (provided he accept the call) be sixty pounds, lawful money, for the first year, sixty-five pounds for the second year and seventy pounds for the third year, and that to be his stated salary. Computing merchantable Indian corn, at 3s. per Bushel; Rye, at 4s.; and wheat, at 6s.; Grass fed beef or two pounds per lb., and stall-fed beef at 3d. per lb.; Pork weighing five, ten or twelve score, at 1d. per lb.; Duffs, from twelve score and upward, 5d. per lb.

"Resolved that Mr. Thurston's salary be paid annually, after the following manner, viz. the full one-half in corn, wheat, Rye, beef and Pork, according to the foregoing stipulated prices; the other half to be paid in the Currency of the United States, which sum shall be computed and allowed annually, according to the prices of Provisions in Genl in Epsom when said salary is to be paid in, which shall be by the twenty-fifth day of December, annually, as long as he shall continue in the ministry in Epsom"

In 1784, Rev. Ebenezer Haseltine accepted a call of the church and town and was ordained.

Mr. Haseltine was a native of Methuen, Mass., a graduate of Dartmouth College, took license to preach from the Grafton Presbytery July 24, 1779. He remained in town till his death, November 10, 1813.

Of him it is said: "He was a man of great modesty and diffidence, unassuming in his carriage among his own people and others; a man of strict integrity, and uprightness in all his dealings; a man of a quiet spirit, a promoter of peace and love among all; a man of hospitality and charity so far as his ability permitted, kind and friendly to all mankind, and in consequence of his virtues was respected by all his acquaintances."

After his death the town "Resolved to bear the funeral expense and also pay to his widow his salary for the remainder of the year, and the privileges of the parsonage."

About a year after the death of Rev. Mr. Haseltine the church gave Rev. Jonathan Curtis a call to become its pastor, but the town refusing to unite, an organization was formed and chartered known as the "Congregational Religious Society of the Town of Epsom."

The following is a copy of the papers presented to the ordaining council, embracing the call of the church and congregation to Rev. Mr. Curtis, and his answer:

"At a meeting of the Congregational religious Society, in the Town of Epsom, July holden agreeably to adjournment, on Saturday, the 1st day of October, Anno Domini 1811, the following votes were passed:

"Resolved, Josiah Sanborn, Moderator, Pro. Tem

"Resolved, Unanimously, to give Mr. Jonathan Curtis a Call to settle in said Society in the work of the Gospel Ministry

"Resolved, Thomas D. Merrill, Sam^l Merrill, Moses Osgood, Joseph Lawrence and Josiah Sanborn a Committee to draught proposals for the temporal support of Mr. Jonathan Curtis, and present the same to the society for their acceptance.

"The Committee made a report, which was unanimously adopted

"Epsom, Oct. 5th, 1811"

"SAM^l MERRILL, Clerk

"To Mr. Jonathan Curtis.

"SIR,—The Church and Congregation in the Town of Epsom, embraced by the congregational religious Society in said Town, being earnestly desirous to re-settle the pre-heretofore Gospel in said Town, and having for some time had an opportunity of acquainting themselves (on some good measure) with your Ministerial and Christian qualifications, are well satisfied that you are possessed of those qualifications which are indispensably necessary in the important Work of the Gospel Ministry. And after mature deliberation, and, as we trust, earnest supplications to Great Head of the Church for divine direction in such an important and interesting transaction, have, without a dissenting voice, voted an Invitation to you to settle with them in said Town as their Gospel Minister; and have also voted the Subscribers a Committee to present you a Call to that Sacred Office, which we do by these presents, together with the annexed proposals for your temporal support should you accept this Call."

"At a Meeting of the Congregational religious Society, in the Town of Epsom, July holden agreeably to adjournment, on Saturday, the 1st day of October, Anno Domini 1811, the following votes were unanimously passed

"1st. Vote, That if Mr. Jonathan Curtis should accept a Call to settle in Epsom as the Gospel Ministry of the Congregational Religious Society in said Town, his stated salary shall be four hundred dollars, to be paid annually from the date of his acceptance of the Call.

"2d. Vote, That the Parsonage Land and Buildings which were occupied by the late Rev. Ebenezer Haseltine shall be occupied by Mr. Jonathan Curtis, should he settle in Epsom during his Ministry in said Town.

"3d. Vote, That Parsonage Buildings be put and kept in decent repair at the expense of the Society.

"4th. Vote, That Mr. Jonathan Curtis be further allowed twenty cords of good hard fire Wood annually, to be delivered at his House some time in the Fall and Winter.

"Epsom, July 14th, 1815.

"To the Committee for the Congregational Religious Society in Epsom:

"GENTLEMEN,—A considerable time has elapsed since I had the honor to receive from you an invitation to settle in your Society in the work of the Gospel Ministry.

"The undertaking presents a situation the most arduous, responsible and important. In this view of it, I hope I have not occupied an unnecessary length of time in consideration. Your proposals I have carefully and seriously considered. The unanimity of your Society, and then arrangements for my support, present a prospect of usefulness which duty forbids me to disregard.

"I accept of your invitation to settle with you in the work of the Gospel Ministry. And if it shall be the appointment of Providence to establish me in that Sacred Profession, let our united prayers ascend to that God who is the great fountain of all wisdom and goodness, that His blessing may attend such a conjunction.

With high consideration, I am, Gentlemen,

Your obedient and humble servant,

"JONATHAN CURTIS.

Until about 1820 the Congregational Church and Society had the free and undisputed use of the meeting-house that was built by the town; but at this time other denominations had made their appearance in the town, and demanded and obtained the privilege of occupying the meeting-house a portion of the time, so that the Congregationalists were obliged to provide themselves with some other place for worship.

Accordingly, a meeting of the society was called April 10, 1820, at the house of Simon A. Heath, when a committee, consisting of Ira Sanborn, Thomas D. Merrill and James Brown, were appointed "to provide a suitable place to assemble for public worship the ensuing season."

At the annual meeting of the society, held May 1, 1820, the above committee reported "that Captain Heath's Hall is the most proper place for public worship for the present season."

At the same meeting it was also Vote, that it is expedient to erect a meeting-house in the town of Epsom for the Congregational Society."

At a meeting held the 7th day of May, 1821, the society chose Josiah Sanborn, Thomas D. Merrill and John Cate a committee to meet a committee appointed by the town to effect a settlement of the existing difficulties between the Congregational Society and the town, which committee presented the following report at a meeting of the society held the 27th of April, 1822, which was accepted:

"We, the undersigned committee appointed by the Town of Epsom and the Congregational Society in said Epsom to settle all disputes between said Town and Society respecting the appropriation of the interest arising from the sale of the parsonage in said Town, agree to report and do hereby report that from and after the expiration of six years from the sale of the parsonage aforesaid the said Town of Epsom shall, at the expiration of each and every year from and after said time, pay to the wardens of the society aforesaid their just and equal proportion of the interest aforesaid, according to the inventories of the members thereof, and we do hereby further report that the manner of ascertaining those who for the purpose aforesaid shall be considered members of said society shall be forever after as follows, to wit: The Clerk of said society shall, on or before the first day of April, A. D. 1822, and each and every succeeding year, furnish the selection of said Town a certificate under the signature of each individual, who for that year wishes that his proportion of the interest aforesaid should be paid to the wardens of said society certifying that such is their wish, and all individuals so certifying being residents in said Town of Epsom and liable to be and are taxed in said Town, shall be considered members of said society for the purpose aforesaid, and it shall be the duty of the Selection of said Town, each and every year from and after the expiration of the term aforesaid, to make an aggregate of the inventories of all the persons so certifying as aforesaid and make a dividend of the interest of the parsonage fund aforesaid in the proportion which the aggregate bears to the inventory of the whole Town, and at or before the expiration of each year pay the same to the wardens aforesaid and take their receipt for the same and the same shall be allowed them by the town. And the said Town of Epsom shall and does forever hereafter relinquish all claims upon the said society or the wardens thereof for any interest of said fund which they have heretofore received, and the said society shall and does forever hereafter relinquish all claim upon said Town for any interest which said Town may have or shall have received prior to the expiration of the six years aforesaid, and both of said parties shall forever hereafter be bound to divide said interest in the manner aforesaid, and said society shall not at any time heretofore claim or be entitled to receive any more than their proportion in the manner aforesaid, and this agreement, when ratified by said Town of Epsom and said Society, shall then, and not till then, be binding on the parties aforesaid.

"Respecting the difficulty between said Town and the said Society about the meeting-house in said Town, the committee have been made to agree to any arrangement consistent with the rights of the several pew owners in said meeting-house; we have therefore agreed to recommend to the pew owners to meet and endeavor to make some compromise, if possible, among themselves and report to the town.

in Town

The Congregationalists continued to occupy the old meeting-house a portion of the time until 1845, when they built a church at what was known as Slab City, and the old meeting-house was sold and removed to Concord.

The Rev. Jonathan Curtis remained with the church until January 1, 1825, when the Rev. A. D. Smith was employed as a stated supply for a year, respecting whose labors among them the society passed a vote of high commendation.

The Rev. A. Burlank was here for a short time in 1827, but on the 1st day of November, 1829, Rev. John M. Putman was installed pastor of the church, and sustained that relation some two and a half years, when he was dismissed at his own request.

Following Mr. Putman, the Rev. Abel Manning was here some two years and the Rev. Francis R. Smith a little longer period, with occasional supplies by different ministers.

January 1, 1837, Rev. Winthrop Fifield commenced preaching here, and so well was he liked by the church and people that a call was given him to settle with them, which he accepted and was ordained the 10th of May, 1837.

Mr. Fifield remained with the church nearly ten years, through the trying period of locating and building a new house of worship, but left very soon after the church was dedicated.

Rev. Rufus A. Putman, a native of Sutton, Mass., and a graduate of Harvard College, was the next minister, being here from September, 1846, to May, 1852.

The following two years the church was occupied only a portion of the time, Revs. M. B. Angier and C. C. Durgin being the supplies.

R. A. Putman and E. H. Blanchard then supplied the pulpit for one year each.

February 22, 1856, a call was given the Rev. J. Ballard to settle with them, which he declined, and the Rev. Charles Willey was engaged as a stated supply. He remained about three years, and was succeeded by Rev. A. B. Peffers, who remained until 1866, and was followed by Rev. George Smith for three years.

Rev. Charles Peabody was the next preacher, and his stay was but three years.

During the following four years there was only occasional preaching, largely by students from the Theological Seminary.

December 1, 1876, Rev. E. C. Cogswell, of Northwood, commenced preaching here Sundays and continued until June, 1881, since which time, with the exception of six months of the summer of 1882, when Rev. L. G. Chase supplied, the church has been without regular Sabbath services. The removals from town and by death have nearly depleted the church membership.

There is a fund of one thousand dollars given by the widow of the late Thomas D. Merrill, the interest of which is to be used for the support of Congregational preaching in the town of Epsom.

The Free-Will Baptist Church of Epsom.¹—This church was organized June, 1824, by Rev. E. Knowlton, of Pittsfield, and Rev. Arthur Governo, of Stratford, consisting of eight persons, the same number that entered into the Ark of old, and these are their names.—Rev. Arthur Governo, Nathan Bickford, Daniel Philbrick, Ephraim Locke, Lucretia Tarlton, Mary Marden, Elizabeth Currier and Sally Osgood. Rev. Arthur Governo, under God, was its founder and first pastor, and by his earnest and faithful labors this little band of disciples continued to grow, and its membership increased to fifty that season. It was like Joseph's fruitful bough by a well, whose branches run over the wall. Union has very generally prevailed, and the church has been ready to co-operate with the pastor in revival effort and benevolent work, and the Lord has often blessed his people with refreshing showers of grace and precious accessions to her numbers. The church has been enterprising and energetic in her labors. She has built two houses of worship,—the first in 1833, the latter, larger and more commodious, in 1861. She has a nice country parsonage, with two acres of land, where the pastor finds a pleasant home. The church has taken high ground on the great moral questions of the age. The cause of missions, Sunday-schools, education, freedom, temperance and moral reform have received due attention and encouragement. Some "born in Zion" have been called to preach the everlasting gospel,—the Rev. Daniel P. Cilley, of Farmington, long a successful preacher and pastor, now venerable with years; the Rev. James McUTCHEON, deceased, for six years pastor of the church; the Rev. John Malvern, of Lynn, Mass., an able and successful minister of Christ; and the Rev. Augustus Towle, Congregationalist, and now in the West, who has worthily magnified the office of the gospel ministry. The church has a fund of eight hundred dollars. Mrs. Mercey, widow of Deacon Thomas Bickford, gave four hundred dollars, and David Marden gave three hundred dollars, the annual interest of which is to be used in the support of preaching. The Rev. B. Van Dame, a former pastor of the church, gave one hundred dollars, the interest of which is to be used to purchase books for the Sunday-school, his name to be placed in the books.

The statistics of the church are as follows: Entire membership, 157; number in the Sunday-school, 125; number of volumes in the Sunday-school library, 209.

Since the organization fifteen brethren have been called to the pastorate of the church, and most of these were young men when they were settled over the church. Their names and order of service are as follows: Rev. Arthur Governo, James McUTCHEON, B. Manson, B. Van Dame, G. P. Ramsey, K. R. Davis, Tobias Foss, M. A. Quimby, Horace Webber, E. Knowles, J. H. Brown, C. E. Haskell, Uriah Chase, Joel Baker and N. A. Avery. The average length of their pastorates has been three years and eight months, and only short intervals have occurred between the dismission and settlement of each pastor, and often one has immediately succeeded the other. The present pastor, Rev. M. A. Quimby, has been settled over the church, in all, nearly thirteen years, and the spring of 1885 is the fourth time that he has been called to the pastorate of the church.

¹ Prepared by Rev. M. A. Quimby.

The Christian Society.—Many of the inhabitants who lived in the southerly part of the town were in the habit of attending church at Allentown, where there was a church of the Christian denomination.

About the year 1800, Edwin T. Philbrick, then living in that part of Epsom familiarly known as "New Rye," left his forge and anvil, reorganized the old church and was ordained its pastor in the month of August, 1809.

As the larger portion of the attendants at the Sabbath services came from Epsom, and the conveniences at the old Allentown Church were very poor, it was decided to build a new church edifice, and the summer of 1861 witnessed the building of the Christian meeting house and the organization of "The First Christian Society of Epsom."

The church was dedicated September 8, 1861, the Rev. A. G. Comings, of Lee, N. H., preaching the dedicatory sermon.

From that time the Christian Church of Allentown became the First Christian Church of Epsom, with the Rev. E. T. Philbrick as its pastor, who continued in that relation for several years, during which time many additions were made to the church and society. Following Mr. Philbrick, the Rev. J. P. Stinchfield, a Methodist minister, supplied the pulpit for one year, from April, 1869.

Rev. Benjamin Dickson, of Wolfborough was the next supply, preaching to them two or three years, and was followed by Rev. M. M. Cleverly, of Lynn, Mass., and he by Rev. George D. Garland, and after him, Rev. James Philipps.

Between the services of the above-named clergymen the pulpit was frequently occupied by different persons for a few Sabbaths at a time.

Since 1881 there has been but little preaching in this church by ministers of the Christian denomination, but the summers of 1881, 1882 and 1883, Rev. E. C. Cogswell, of Northwood, a Congregational minister, occupied the pulpit, and the services were attended by many who formerly attended the Congregational Church in the other part of the town.

Physicians.—Rev. Mr. Curtis mentions Stephen Swett and J. S. Osborn among the first doctors in town.

We find that Obadiah Williams, from this town, was a surgeon in the Revolutionary War, and the records of the town for 1773 show that Dr. Obadiah Williams, with others, was appointed a committee to treat with the Rev. Mr. Tucke.

Daniel Lawrence Morrill was in practice here in 1799 and 1800; went from here to Goffstown, and in 1825 was Governor of the state.

Samuel Morrill was the next doctor, coming here about 1800, and remaining twenty years, when he removed to Concord, N. H. Dr. Morrill, as will be seen by the list of officers of the town, was prominent in the affairs of the town, having been its clerk nineteen years in succession, and was also clerk of the Congregational Society nearly as long.

Dr. Josiah Crosby came into town upon the removal of Dr. Morrill, and remained here four or five years, and was afterwards in practice in Manchester, where he died a few years since.

He was succeeded by Dr. John Proctor, who was here until about 1810, when Dr. Hanover Dickey, Jr., a native of the town, entered into practice and continued it until 1815, when he removed to Lowell, Mass.

Dr. Leonard W. Peabody succeeded Dr. Dickey, and remained here twenty-six years; was town clerk one year, and postmaster ten years. He is now in practice in Henniker, and represents all that town in the Legislature of 1885.

Dr. Sullivan A. Taylor came into town in 1871, and remained here some five years and removed to Concord, but has since located at Gilmanston Iron-Works. Dr. Albon H. French took Dr. Taylor's practice and continued it until 1882, when he sold out to Dr. M. F. Smith, who still remains in town.

Schools.—At a meeting held at the house of Captain Andrew McClary, inn-holder, on the 18th day of June, 1765, agreeably to a notification by the selectmen, to consult about the building of a school-house, it was

"1. Voted, John McClary, Esq., Moderator.

"2. Voted, that the highest of sd house, twenty-one in length & seven feet in breadth."

The meeting then adjourned to the 25th of June inst., at the same place, at which time the following votes were passed:

"1. Voted that the school house be built on the lot commonly called the School Lot, where the Select men think proper.

"2. Voted that the cost of sd house be paid in Land or money

"3. Voted that sd house be bid of at vendors

"Voted, Nathan Marten, Vendor master, sd house bid of to Eus. Megatey, at 312 0 T. to raise bond, stangle, colored A fore."

A complaint being made to Lieutenant Ephraim Lock, grand juror, that the town had neglected to keep a stated school, a meeting of the inhabitants was called May 22, 1780, at which it was "Voted that the second article in the warrant respecting a school shall be left to the discretion of the selectmen (that is) to raise what money they may judge necessary for the support of schools the ensuing year." March, 1781, it was "Voted to raise one thousand pounds, Lawful money, in the present currency, for the support of a school the year ensuing." March 26, 1781, it was "Voted That the school House which stands near the meeting house in said Epsom be this day sold at publick vendue to the Highest Bidder, & the purchased sum be appropriated to the use of the town."

"To the Selectmen of the Town of Epsom

"A number of the Inhabitants of the Western district in Epsom humbly shew—

"That we ever have been & still are desirous to promote public schools in said Town for the instruction of our children, and of late we have used every exertion in our power to have a suitable school house in the district completed for that design, but every such effort proves abortive, owing (as we humbly conceive) to some among us, who, from their conduct, seem to demonstrate a total disregard to the best interests of their families, by depriving their children of the means of instruction and thereby rendering them, in a great degree, useless members of so costly, and by such conduct of theirs, we being classed with them, are denied of that for our children, which we esteem an inestimable blessing.

"This is our grievance, and in this situation we cannot rest easy, to see our numerous offspring, which we are instrumental of bringing into existence, trained up like so many heathen or brutes in a civilized world. A for such neglect we cannot answer, neither to God nor our conscience, and for which they will have good reason to curse rather than bless us. We therefore seek to the Town for redress, as we know no other remedy, and pray that a meeting of said Town may be warned as soon as may be, that this our grievance may be considered, and some method adopted & put in Execution that shall remove the Achan out of the camp and give us speedy relief in finishing the School-house already begun, that a school may be had seasonably for the purpose aforesaid.

"Epsom, 14th of July, 1793.

"James Gray, Geo. Yewin, Reuben Yewin, Thomas Beckford, Simon Towle, Sand Beckford, Sylvanus Moses, Richard Band, John Prescott, Jere Prescott, Jr., Abraham Wallace."

In response to the foregoing petition the selectmen called a meeting at the meeting-house in said town, the 5th day of August, at four o'clock in the afternoon, the second article of the warrant being as follows: "To see what method the Town will take to remove the Achan out of the camp," which article was dismissed at the meeting, and ten pounds voted to be raised from the inhabitants of the western district, to be expended in finishing the school-house in said district. "And should there be a surplusage, the same shall be laid out for school-keeping for the benefit of said district the year present."

The division of the town into districts for school purposes was by common consent or an occasional vote of the town until May 19, 1808, when the selectmen were instructed to make such division, "and affix metes and bounds to the same, and make a return thereof to the clerk, to be by him recorded," and was substantially as follows:

District No. 1 contained all that is now comprised within its limits; also that portion of District No. 7 on the turnpike, below Warren Yeaton's, and from Yeaton's to Deerfield line.

District No. 2 contained all on the turnpike from the east side of the New Orchard road to Chichester line, and all north of the turnpike; also from the shoe-factory to "Cyder Brook" (so called), just south of the house of John Spurlin.

District No. 3 was composed of what is now Districts Nos. 3 and 9 (New Rye and the Mountain), and extended to the corner at Short Falls.

District No. 4 contained all on the west side of the Suncook River lying southerly of the turnpike, and from Short Falls bridge to the Mountain District, near the Short Falls post-office.

District No. 5 contained that portion of the "North Road" District northerly from the turnpike, and on the turnpike from the Northwood road to the mile-post near Henry Knowles' house, and also what is now united with Pittsfield in forming No. 6.

District No. 6 was the New Orchard District, very nearly as it now exists.

"Witness, the undersigned were, on the first day of November, 1821, appointed by a vote of the town of Epsom a committee to examine into the propriety of altering the school districts in said town, and report thereon to said town at their annual meeting, in March next. We, therefore, report that in our opinion many individuals are not well conveyed, and do not have their proportion of the benefit of the school in said town as it is now districted, and that the time may come when an alteration will remedy such evil, but at present we consider it no expedient to make any alteration.

"Epsom, February 19th, 1825.

"JOSHUA SANDERS,
"HANOVER DUCKEY, } Committee.
"WINDHAM FOWLER."

In January of 1833 the school-house in District No. 3 was burned, and the following season the district was divided, forming the New Rye and Mountain Districts, the former taking No. 9, the "Fowler District" having been taken off of No. 4 a few years before, and numbered eight. In 1851 District No. 10, "Marden's," was taken from No 2, and there are two union districts,—one with Pittsfield, No. 6, and one with Chichester, known as the Union District.

Three new school-houses have been built within the last few years, and the others repaired, so at the present there are nine very good school-houses in the town.

March 15, 1820, it was "Voted that the money due the Town of Epsom from the Revd Jonathan Curtis, together with all the interest which has accrued on said sum since said debt was contracted, and all the money which is due the Town aforesaid from the several purchasers of the School lot, so called, together with all the interest on the same, not heretofore appropriated, and all other moneys due said Town from the sale of any property belonging to the same, not heretofore appropriated by said Town to a different use, be forever heretofore appropriated for the use and support of a free English Grammar school in said Epsom.

"Voted that Jonathan Steele, Hanover Dickey, Richard Tripp, Thomas D. Merrill and John Chesby be a committee to carry the above vote into effect."

There is no evidence that the above vote was ever carried out.

Although the scholars of the town have never been favored with any special advantages for an education, yet, during the summer of 1854, the town hall was fitted for a school-room by certain interested citizens purchasing the seats that had been removed from Pittsfield Academy to make room for more modern furniture, and the 3d day of August, of that year, Samuel G. Lane, now a prominent lawyer of Concord, began a school which proved to be both interesting and profitable; and for the next six years a school was kept there every autumn, taught by the following persons:

James Webster, now one of the leading teachers of Boston, taught two terms, and the following persons taught one term each: Cyrus O. Brown, George W. Morrill and Thomas M. Chase.

Since then there has occasionally been a school taught by some of our local teachers.

Of the early teachers it is impossible to get any accurate information. Among some old papers we find the following receipt:

"Received two pound Eight Shillings for Eight weeks' School-keeping Over the river, in 1781, by me,

"JOSEPH GLOSS.

"Epsom, March 8th, 1785."

James Gray is said to have been a school-teacher here before the Revolutionary War, and tradition tells of School-masters Sutton and Casey, and the same authors tell that the former became impoverished in his declining years, and was assisted by the town, and the latter, for some unlawful act, was obliged to leave the town.

At a later period we learn of Thomas D. Merrill, for many years a leading man in town affairs and a successful trader, as a school-master; also "Master Batchelder," noted for the severity of his punishments; "School-master Ham," "Gen. Locke," John Chesley, the Dickeys (Hanover, David and Abram), James Hersey, Esq., Andrew M. Heath and many others.

The following list comprises those sons of Epsom who have received a college education or have become professional men:

Dr. James Babb studied with Dr. Josiah Crosby and succeeded him in his practice. He lived for a time in the parsonage house on the hill, and then built the house now owned by Husca L. Hilliard, in "Slab City." He left town about 1840, and moved to Manchester. He married Maria, daughter of Captain Bickford Lang.

David Dickey graduated from Dartmouth College, and studied law.

Hanover Dickey graduated from the medical college at Hanover, and practiced in his native town until 1873, when he went to Lowell, Mass., where he died in 1873, and was brought back here for burial.

Abram Dickey, also a graduate of Dartmouth Medical School, studied dentistry also, and practiced in Lyme several years, and then removed to Worcester, Mass. While on a visit to Lyme, in 1882, he rode with Dr. Marshall, of that town, into Vermont, and both of them were found drowned in a pond, their team being also in the water.

John M. Steele graduated from Dartmouth, class of 1844, became a minister and went West. He died in New York in 1857.

Joseph W. Tarleton graduated from Dartmouth at about the same time as Mr. Steele, and adopted the same profession, and preached several years at Hooksett and afterwards in Massachusetts. He died at Waverly, Mass., February 27, 1883, aged sixty-six years.

Daniel P. Gilley became a Free-Will Baptist minister, and now lives at Farmington, N. H., suffering from diseases incident to old age.

Jonathan A. Knowles, after farming several years upon the old homestead, felt it his duty to preach the gospel; so he fitted himself at the Methodist Biblical School, at Concord, and was ordained a Free-Will Baptist minister, and preached at Lake village, Manchester, Danbury and other places in New Hampshire.

Silas Green was a prominent minister in the Methodist denomination, and was located at Manchester, Rochester, Salmon Falls and Candia, where he died November 10, 1874.

John Malvern came into town from England when a boy. After working at shoemaking a few years he attended school and entered the ministry. He is now settled over the Free Baptist Church of Lynn, Mass.

Orren S. Sanders, at present one of the leading physicians of Boston, Mass., and Henry Sanders, of Chicago, sons of Colonel Job Sanders, will be remembered by the older residents of the town. They attended school at Pembroke Academy. The former began his practice in Chichester. The latter was for several years a school-teacher, but afterward studied medicine and went West.

Frank H. Wallace and Andros P. Chesley, both graduates of Dartmouth College, are both in medical practice, the former in Boston, Mass., and the latter in Concord, N. H.

Edwin B. Harvey, a graduate of Wesleyan College, of Middletown, Conn., is a practicing physician of Westboro', Mass. He has been a member of the Massachusetts Legislature from Westboro'.

Charles W. Tarleton, a graduate from Brown University, Providence, R. I., after teaching a few years in Worcester, Mass., was obliged to come home to care for his parents, where he still resides.

Andrew J. Goss, class of 1861, Dartmouth College, became afflicted with asthmatic troubles and went to Florida, and from thence to San Diego, Cal., where he still lives, a great sufferer.

Charles A. Towle graduated from Dartmouth in 1864; studied theology at Andover and Chicago; preached at Sandwich and South Chicago, Ill.; at present at Monticello, Iowa.

Walter H. Sanborn, class of 1867, Dartmouth, taught school at Milford, N. H., then went to St. Paul, Minn., studied law and entered practice with his uncle, John B. Sanborn.

Almon F. Cate, of the same class, taught school in the West several years, then went to Manchester, N. H., where he now lives. He is now in business as an architect, contractor and builder.

Harry F. Towle and Edward P. Sanborn graduated from Dartmouth in 1876. The latter went to St. Paul and entered the law-firm with his uncle and brother. The former has been a public teacher. He taught at Hollis, N. H., Abington, Mass., and Yonkers, N. Y. At present he is teaching in Brooklyn, N. Y.

Samuel O. Griffin became a successful physician in Pascoag, R. I., but died suddenly while on a visit to his parental home.

John M. Moses graduated from Dartmouth, and divides his time between teaching and farming. He lives in Northwood, N. H.

John B. Tarleton graduated from Cornell Institute, studied architecture and is in business in Detroit, Mich.

Thomas L. Steele graduated from Dartmouth in 1847, studied law, practiced in New York and is now at Montreal, Canada.

Albert L. Marden graduated from the Medical School at Dartmouth and practices his profession in Vermont.

Summer D. Marden graduated from the same school and is in practice in Concord, N. H.

Daniel Lincoln Locke, son of Captain A. C. Locke, took his degrees from a medical school in Vermont and is practicing in his native town.

Willie F. Wallace, son of William Wallace, went West in early life, became a teacher and editor, and afterward returned East and practiced medicine at Epsom, London and Milton.

Henry F. and John B. Sanborn, sons of Deacon Frederick Sanborn, entered college, but did not finish the course. The former returned to the old homestead, became a successful farmer and prominent in town affairs, having represented the town in the Legislature and a member of the State Senate two years; was superintending school committee a long time, and taught several terms of school. He removed to Princeton, Mass., in 1882. John B. studied law, went West, and settled at St. Paul, Minn., where, with his two nephews, he has an extensive and profitable practice.

Charles H. Griffin, son of Nathan Griffin, and Edward H. Sanders, son of Edward T. Sanders, both died while pursuing their studies at Dartmouth College.

Edward J. Burnham entered Bates College, of Maine, but circumstances prevented his graduating. He learned the printer's trade and now has an important position on the editorial staff of the Manchester Union.

Military History.—The patriotism of the citizens of the town has never been called in question.

The events that made the War of the Revolution necessary had aroused the people, and when the battle at Lexington was announced "by a swift rider, blowing a horn, who passed through Nottingham and reached Epsom, it found Captain Andrew McClary plowing in the 'old muster-field.' Like Cincinnatus of old, he left the plow in the furrow, and hastened to obey the summons. With little preparation, he seized his saddle-bags, leaped into the saddle, swearing as he left that he would kill one of the devils before he came home!"

"Jocky Fogg," who was his servant in the army, used to speak of his horse as "a large, powerful iron-gray, four-year-old stallion, so exceedingly vicious that no one could mount or govern him except the captain. He could spring upon his back, and, by the power of his arm, govern him with the greatest ease."

He was accompanied by his nephew, the young and chivalrous Michael McClary, who served with credit four years; Amos Morrill, the first selectman of the town, lieutenant, then captain, then major, serving in the army four years, with honor to himself and town; also James Gray and Andrew McGaffey, who became officers of distinction, and many more of the sturdy yeomanry of the town.

It is impossible to give a correct list of the men that went from this town into the Revolutionary Army, as the town records give no account of them, and the rolls do not in every case give the residence; while if we depend upon the memory of our oldest inhabitants, we find them unreliable, because some who were in the army went from other places and moved here after the war closed.

The following is as nearly correct as we have been able to obtain:

The following is a copy of votes passed by the town relative to the men in the Revolutionary War, March 24, 1781, it was "Voted, a Gift or Consideration to each of those soldiers who are engaged during the war in the Continental service for the town of Epsom five Heifers on the following conditions, according to their continuance in the service of the States, viz for three years' service from this date five of three-year-old heifers; for two years' service, five of two-year-old heifers, and for one year's service, five yearlings. But should any or either of these soldiers die or be killed in the service within the term of three years, the heirs of such, upon producing a certificate of the death or death of such to the selectmen of Epsom for the time being, shall receive from said town the aforesaid consideration, computed according to the time of service."

A meeting was called by the selectmen, to be held at the meeting-house the 30th of July, 1781.

"To see what steps the Town will take to procure the remainder of the Town's proportion of Beef for the Continental Army this present year. Whereas, the present selectmen find from experience that the sum already raised in Continental currency for that purpose is altogether insufficient to answer the end;

"Therefore, it is expected that every voter will come properly prepared and be ready to give instructions to the selectmen how to proceed in procuring the residue of beef. Experience has taught that silver money is the principle object of these persons that have beef-cattle to dispose of."

At a meeting the following vote was passed:

"That Town's proportion of beef, not yet furnished for the use of the Continental Army for the year current shall be bought on the following conditions, viz :

"That the present selectmen for the Town be & are hereby empowered to buy the same, and engage therefore Silver money, Indian corn, rye, wheat or Continental currency at the common exchange; and also it is hereby voted That the price by them given for 50 Beef shall be agreeable to the minds of the Town Universal."

At a meeting of the inhabitants of Epsom, duly warned and held November 3, 1794,—

"Resolved, That all the men in this Town who are hereby belonging to said Town who are required to go into the Service of the United States, agreeably to a late requisition of Congress, the sum of eight dollars per month, with what is or shall be given by the United States for their actual services.

"That for further encouragement to said soldiers to enlist, Voted to give to each soldier that shall enlist the sum of two dollars, to be paid at the expiration of eight months from this date, unless they should be called to march sooner; then to be paid the time of marching."

May, 1776, it was

"Resolved, That all the men in this Town that went Down to Cambridge when the Rattle was at Concord shall be paid a half a dollar per Day while gone."

DELEGATES TO CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS

1788, Captain James Gray; 1791-92, John McClary; 1850, James Martin; 1876, Parson Philbrick.

The following residents of Epsom have been members of the New Hampshire Senate: John McClary, three years (president of the Senate, 1784); Michael McClary, five years; James H. McClary, one year; Josiah Sanborn, three years; John McClary, one year; Henry F. Sanborn, two years.

Population.—The number of inhabitants in the town the several years when the census was taken by the United States was as follows: 1767, 194; 1791, 799; 1800, 1034; 1810, 1156; 1820, 1336; 1830, 1418; 1840, 1205; 1850, 1366; 1860, 1216; 1870, 993; 1880, 909.

Postmasters.—James H. McClary was postmaster in 1809; Samuel Morrill, 1813; Josiah Crosby, 1819; James Babb, 1824; Robert Knox, 1840; Benjamin L. Locke, 1844; Robert Knox, 1846; John Wallace 1853; Leonard W. Peabody, 1862; Captain A. C. Locke, 1869; Dr. L. W. Peabody, 1870; John T. Cotterell, 1872; Henry S. Knowles, 1885.

The post-office was established at Short Falls in 1871 with James B. Tennant postmaster.

Another office was established in town in 1882, at Gossville, and Andrew J. Silver appointed postmaster.

Secret Societies.—It is reported that several of the leading men of the town in the early part of the present century were members of the Masonic fraternity, and we find that Michael McClary was Master of the lodge at Nottingham. But we can learn of no such secret organization in the town until about 1854, when the "Americans," or "Know-Nothings," began to hold their mysterious gatherings in the hall over Major Griffin's store, the result of which gatherings was that the town was captured by them at the election in the spring of 1855, electing all the officers; but its life and strength were transient, for at the election the following year they were defeated, and the Democrats successful.

EVERGREEN LODGE, No. 53, I. O. O. F., was organized in the New Rye Church, Friday evening, May 10, 1872, by a delegation of the Grand Lodge of the State, Amos Jones, Grand Master.

The charter members of the lodge were Paron Philbrick, Warren Tripp, James B. Tennant, John H. Fife and Charles A. Chapman.

It held its meetings in a hall over the store of James B. Tennant for a few years, but finding themselves outgrowing their accommodations, they built the commodious and convenient building that they now occupy, which was dedicated to the purposes and uses of Odd-Fellowship Tuesday evening, September 5, 1876, by the officers of the Grand Lodge, George A. Cummings, Grand Master.

The lodge has received, during the thirteen years of its existence, one hundred members, and lost by death six; has paid more than one thousand dollars for relief, and received upwards of three thousand dollars in the way of fees and dues. The lodge has held a levee every year, which has been fully attended, and has always been a success financially.

The officers of the lodge for the term beginning July 4, 1875, were as follows: James F. Towle, Noble Grand; Morrison S. Bachelder, Vice-Grand; John H. Dolbeer, Recording Secretary; Samuel Martin, Per. Secretary; George W. Lane, Treasurer; William H. Straw, Junior Past Grand. Its meetings are held every Saturday evening.

GOOD TEMPLARS.—There have been various temperance organizations in the town from time to time, but their existence has been brief until, on the 22d day of February, 1882, Grand Worthy Chief Temple of the State, George A. Bailey, of Manchester, assisted by officers from Catamount Lodge, of Pittsfield, instituted Linwood Lodge, No. 62, L. O. G. T., and installed the following persons as officers for the first term. John T. Winslow, Worthy Chief Templar; Mrs. Mary C. Swain, Vice-Templar; Mrs. Emily G. Bickford, Secretary; John T. Cotterell, Financial Secretary; Mrs. Emma L. Robinson, Treasurer; Rev. N. A. Avery, Chaplain; Albert L. Sanders, Marshal; Lilla A. Robinson, Deputy Marshal; Mrs. Emma F. Winslow, Inside Guardian; Fred. Marden, Outside Guardian; Sadie D. Swain, Right Supporter; Annie M. Marden, Left Supporter; Dr. William Wallace, Past Worthy Chief Templar.

They held their meetings in the town hall until July, 1883, when they moved to Grand Army Hall at Gossville, where they now meet Wednesday evenings.

The lodge has been successful in point of membership; at one time their roll contained the names of over eighty active members, but in the report for the quarter ending August 1, 1885, there were only forty.

Two members only have died since its organization,—Goram R. Worth and Willie Edmunds.

GEORGE H. HOYT POST, No. 66, G. A. R., was organized March 14, 1883, by Department Commander John Linnihan, assisted by Assistant Quartermaster General J. H. French, and Officer-of-the-Day Holbrook, all of Pennacook, and by the George W. Gordon Post of Suncook. The following officers were installed, viz.: Charles W. Leighton, Commander;

George S. Sanders, Senior Vice-Commander; James W. Marden, Junior Vice-Commander; George H. Haynes, Adjutant; Christopher T. Heath, Quartermaster; Joseph Roderick, Surgeon; Henry E. Dotey, Chaplain; Thomas J. Ames, Outer Guard; George H. Rand, O. M.; Samuel T. Bickford, Quartermaster-Sergeant.

Its first meetings were held in the town hall, but in the summer of 1883, Silver & Robinson enlarged their store building, and finished a hall, which is known as Grand Army Hall, and was dedicated by the post September 20, 1883, in which they have since held their meetings.

The post has had fifty-six different members, and lost only one by death, Comrade Elbridge Bachelder.

It has observed Memorial Day, having public services in their post-room, and the memorial services in the cemetery at Gossville, which have been very generally attended by the citizens of the town.

At the March meeting, 1885, the sum of fifty dollars was donated by the town to the post for the expenses of Memorial Day. The services of the Gossville Cornet Band were obtained for this day, and the Rev. Mr. Hillman, of Concord, was the orator.

THE RELIEF CORPS was organized in April, 1884, by Mrs. Foster, of Milford, Mrs. Deering, of Chichester, and Mrs. Greene, of Pittsfield, and the following officers installed: Mrs. R. W. Heath, President; Mrs. Jennie Leighton, Senior Vice-President; Miss Lizzie Roberts, Junior Vice-President; Miss Grace Edmunds, Secretary; Miss Ida Leighton, Treasurer; Mrs. Oldis Dotey, Chaplain; Miss Carrie Yeaton, Conductor; Mrs. Mary Hill, Guard.

McCLARY GRANGE, No. 102, PATRONS OF HUSBANDRY, was instituted at Short Falls by George R. Drake, of Pittsfield, District Deputy, October 10, 1884, and the following officers installed: Warren Tripp, Master; George Sanders, Jr., Overseer; Horace Fowler, Secretary; William Fowler, Treasurer; William Goss, Chaplain.

They meet in Odd-Fellows' Hall the second and fourth Tuesdays of each month.

No historical sketch of Epsom would be complete or satisfactory without more than a passing notice of a family that figured so conspicuously in its early history as did that of the McClarys. From a sketch of the family, printed in the Suncook Valley Times in 1868, the following has been selected by permission of the author, John C. French, Esq.:

Historical Notes—THE McCLARY FAMILY.—The old town of Epsom has furnished many worthy men during the past hundred and fifty years, who have held prominent positions of trust and honor in the State and nation; but none stand out in so bold relief, or are more worthy of remembrance, than the McClarys.

In fact, no family in the Suncook Valley fills so large a space in its history or the hearts of the people. For nearly a century the McClarys were the leading, influential men in all our civil, political and military affairs, and were identified with all the important events and measures that received the attention and governed the acts of the successive generations during that long period of time.

There is something mournful in the thought, however, that a family and name once so familiar in our midst is but a record of the past, and that no lineal male descendant is living to inherit the honors so dearly won by a noble ancestry, or to transmit the name to a grateful posterity.

And it is passing strange that so little has been written or preserved concerning their noble deeds and many years' service in public life, and that no testimonials are in existence, except public records, to aid in preserving their memories.

We know of no instance in our State, where history has so sadly neglected to do justice to a family which has rendered so efficient service in defending the rights, and promoting the interests of our commonwealth and nation, as in this instance.

The only official effort made to perpetuate the name, as of national interest, has been to honor one of the fortifications of Portsmouth harbor with the name,—Fort McClary,—and a privateer, which had but a short existence. The name of only one, Major Andrew McClary, appears in our printed histories, while several others of the family are equally deserving of mention.

The early proprietors and settlers of Epsom were of good English stock, though there was a small company of Scotch-Irish from Londonderry who bought lands here about 1738.

Among the number were the McClarys, McCoys, McGuffeys, Dickeys, Wallaces, Knoxs etc.

Among the number who felt the wrongs and oppressions, and sought an asylum for himself and children in the wilderness at Londonderry, was Andrew McClary. He soon died, but two of his sons, Andrew and John, grew to manhood and settled in Epsom, where they carved for themselves a farm and fortune.

By the records, we find that Andrew McClary held town office in 1739, and for eighty-three successive years some members of the family were promoted to positions of trust and power by their townsmen.

This forcibly illustrates the popularity and appreciation of this family by their kinsmen and townsmen.

Epsom, at that time, was a frontier town, with a few scattering pioneers, striving to find a "local habitation and a name" in the unbroken forests.

Theodore Atkinson, a wealthy land-holder, was the leading spirit, among the proprietors, in inducing a few families to push a settlement so far into the woods. None of the adjoining towns were settled till many years afterward. This was nearly thirty years before Chichester, Pittsfield or Barnstead were settled, twenty years before Concord received its present name, twenty years before Northwood and Deerfield were incorporated and thirty-six years before the Revolution.

The first settlement in the Suncook Valley was here, and not a tree was cut between this and the Canadas, and not a clearing, or friendly smoke, or any signs of civilization to break the monotony of the unbounded forest or cheer the loneliness of the early settlers. The sentiment that prompted the line,

"Oh! for a lodge in some vast wilderness," could have been here gratified. Meagre, indeed, are the records and traditions concerning these hardy foresters during their many years of border-life, before the Revolution.

Nottingham fort was the nearest neighbor and the asylum for safety.

The Indians frequented the valley, and bears, wildcats, deer and catamounts roamed through the forest undisturbed.

The proprietors built a block-house, or garrison, for refuge in case of danger. It was built near Andrew McClary's, and the old foundation was disturbed last summer by building the new house for Augustus Lord, Esq. Mrs. McCoy and family were hastening to and had nearly reached this garrison, when captured by the Indians in 1754.

Though the Indians were generally friendly, the inhabitants were greatly annoyed, and the growth of the settlement slow and difficult.

Andrew and John McClary were the leading influential men in all town or military affairs.

During the French and Indian War, commencing in 1756, Epsom was one of the frontier towns; the people lived in fear of the scalping-knife and tomahawk, and suffered by the incursions of the prowling savages.

Garrisons were established at Epsom, Buck Street, Pembroke, and a fort at Canterbury. Government frequently sent small detachments of troops up through this section scouting for the enemy and to protect and encourage the settlers. Captain Andrew McClary was the leading man in this region in all military matters, and rendered the colony efficient service during these perilous times. He had the personal acquaintance of the highest officials of the colony, and such noted fighters and rangers as Stark, Goffe, Rogers, etc.

His name frequently appears on the State records. In 1755 he applied to Governor Wentworth and obtained a company of troop to go in search of the Indians that committed the massacre and captured the McCall family at Salisbury. At another time he obtained a small company to aid in doing garrison duty at Epsom while the Indians were seen lurking about. As an officer, he was ever ready for any exposure or danger, while his men had the most implicit confidence in his ability and integrity. His command was authoritative, and no man refused obedience. In case of an emergency he could swear enough for a battalion, enough to frighten the Penacooks out of the Suncook Valley and cause the Old Scotch Covenanters to hold up their hands in holy horror. He built a one-story frame house, and kept tavern on the height of land on the road leading from Epsom village to Pleasant Pond. The place is now owned by Joseph Lawrence, better known as Lawrence's "muster-field." His home was the common resort of the settlers, proprietors and scouts, and all who had occasion to travel in this direction. Town-meetings were held here until the "new meeting-house" was built, jurors were drawn here for His Majesty's Court, training of His Majesty's soldiers, and many rude frolics and exciting incidents which have long since passed into oblivion, never to be recalled. His wealth increased as well as his popularity. He owned all the land on the north side of the road to Deerfield line. He had the advantages of a fair English education. He served as town clerk, and his records on the town-books indicate a thorough knowledge of business, a good use of language and a style and beauty of penmanship seldom found at the present day. His last writing on the town-books, the year before he was killed, evinced care, accuracy and precision.

He took a lively interest in the affairs of the colonies, and early espoused the cause of the people against the arbitrary encroachments of the mother-country before the commencement of the Revolutionary War.

His ancestry, education and experience would naturally lead him to take sides with the people in defending their liberties when assailed by British oppression. Frequent meetings were held at his house, and measures taken to co-operate with adjoining towns for mutual rights and protection.

The Seven Years' War, which closed in 1760, had completely aroused the military spirit of the province, and organizations, with experienced officers, had been maintained up to the time of the Revolution. A new regiment was then formed, the Twelfth, comprising the towns of Nottingham, Deerfield, Epsom, Northwood, Chichester and Pittsfield. "Coming events cast their shadows before." The people were expecting a serious conflict.

The location of McClary's tavern made it a common resort for the rustic foresters to meet and talk of the difficulties, while the popularity and ability of the jovial landlord rendered him the political and military oracle of the Suncook Valley.

The battle of Lexington, on the 19th of April, 1775, sounded the tocsin to arms. Signals flamed from the hill-tops, and fleet messengers transmitted news from town to town.

The sturdy yeomanry of the Suncook Valley snatched their trusty firelocks and powder-horns, and started for the scene of hostilities with spirits as brave as ever animated a soldier, and with hearts as noble and honest as ever throbbled in the cause of liberty and freedom.

They were governed by one common impulse, and came from blazed paths and crooked roads that wound through the forests and thickets. They were all known to each other as brothers and townsmen. Each soldier represented a household, and they and their cause were commended to the protection of heaven at the morning and evening devotions, and in the service of the Sabbath; donations of food and clothing were freely sent to them by the families at home.

The men from this section reached Nottingham Square about one o'clock, where they found Captain Cilley and Dr. Dearborn, with a company of about sixty men, making, with themselves, about eighty men.

Who would not like to see those men—some with broad-tailed black coats, worsted stockings, three-cornered hats; others in coarse homespun; all with long stockings, knee and shoe buckles, and thick cow-hide shoes? Their guns and equipments were as various as their costumes. Some had the old Queen Anne that had done service in the French War; some, long fowling-pieces; some, a fusée; only one had a bayonet. Powder-horn and shot-pouches took the place of cartridge-box.

If we were to choose a subject for a historical painting, we would prefer the scene on Nottingham Square, April 29th, where were paraded the noblest band of patriots that ever left New Hampshire to vindicate her honor and protect her liberties. We would like to hear the roll-call, and see a photograph of these heroes.

Captain Andrew McClary was by common consent the leading spirit of this noble band of patriots, though there was no previous organization.

There is much to be written concerning the achievements and adventures of this distinguished company, and many of the able men composing it, but the most remarkable and thrilling incident in this connection was their famous march to Cambridge.

There is not a parallel in the annals of all the wars in our country, and such wonderful powers of endurance by a whole company of men excites our surprise, as their patriotism does our pride and admiration. No other locality can boast of sending braver hearts or tougher men to aid, by their valor and perseverance, in establishing the noblest republic that ever cheered and blest a prosperous people. This noble Spartan band opened a series of brilliant exploits by performing one of the most remarkable physical feats ever recorded in our nation's history. Dr. Dearborn gives an account of it, and Bancroft a passing notice, and tradition relates it from generation to generation, but it should be familiar to every son and daughter of New Hampshire as one of the brightest testimonials of our devotion to the cause of freedom and independence.

Accustomed as they were to life in the open air, and trials of strength by long journeys, hunting, trapping and scouting, they knew little of fear and fatigue. Leaving Nottingham Square at one o'clock in the afternoon, they pushed on at a rapid pace, as if the destiny of the province or hopes of the nation depended upon their alacrity and speed. At Kingston they took a double-quick or "dog-trot," and followed it without a halt to Haverhill, crossing the Merrimack River in a ferry-boat at sunset, having made twenty-seven miles in six hours.

But this is not all,—they halted at Andover for supper, and then started for a night march, and on the morning of the 21st, at sunrise, they were paraded on Cambridge Common, "spiling for a fight." Those from Epsom had traveled seventy miles in less than twenty-four hours, and the whole company from Nottingham fifty-seven miles in less than twenty hours.

Did bone and muscle ever do better? That was the "spirit of '76;" that was the kind of stuff the men were made of who lived in the Suncook Valley one hundred and ten years ago.

Upon the organization of the New Hampshire troops John Stark was unanimously chosen colonel and Andrew McClary major. Conspicuous for his coolness and bravery, Major McClary moved among the men encouraging and calming them by his own example and word.

When, after a hard fought-battle and their ammunition all gone, the American forces were compelled to leave the field, the New Hampshire troops retired in excellent order. They were the last to leave the field, and Major McClary was in the rear maintaining order and discipline.

As the Americans retreated across the neck Major McClary was remarkably animated with the result of the contest. That day's conflict, and the glorious display of valor which had distinguished his countrymen, made him sanguine of the result. Having passed the last place of danger, he went back to see if the British were disposed to follow them across the neck, thus exposing himself to danger anew. His men cautioned him against his rashness. "The ball is not yet cast that will kill me," said he, when a random shot from one of the frigates struck a button-wood tree and, glancing, passed through his abdomen. Throwing his hands above his head, he leaped several feet from the ground and fell forward upon his face—dead.

Thus fell Major Andrew McClary, the highest American officer killed at the battle, the handsomest man in the army and the favorite of the New Hampshire troops. His dust still slumbers where it was lain by his sorrowing comrades in Medford, unhonored by any adequate memorial to tell where lies one of the heroes that ushered in the Revolution with such auspicious omens. Major McClary had a splendid physique and soldierly appearance.

With all the bravery of Stark, he possessed greater mental endowments and culture. With the natural ability of Sullivan, he possessed the magic power to incite his men to nobler deeds. With the popularity of Poor, he was more cool and discreet. In fact, he combined more completely than either the elements that tend to make a popular and successful commander, and had his life been spared, he would doubtless have ranked among the most able and noted officers of the Revolution. He married in early life Elizabeth McCrillis, a strong-minded, resolute Scotch-Irish girl, who proved a valuable help-meat and capable mother to his seven children. After her husband's death she kept the farm, tavern and store alone, assisted at first by her husband's partner in business, John Casey, and afterwards by her eldest son, James Harvey. Rumor says she was at one time published to be married to the above-named John Casey, but the match was prevented by the interference of a younger rival and the advice of her friends. After the children had grown up and nineteen years of widowhood, she married Colonel Samuel Osgood in 1794. She died in 1800, aged sixty-seven. The oldest son, James Harvey, was born in 1762, and as he grew to manhood, continued the business of his father and rendered valuable service to the family. He prosecuted an extensive business for those times, having two stores and a potash-factory, besides the farm and tavern.

He was highly respected, exemplary in his habits, early promoted to offices of public trust and honor, which he held for a series of years. He was one of the leading spirits in the organization of the Eighteenth Regiment, and one of its first commanders, afterwards promoted to a brigadier-general of the militia.

He married Betsey Dearborn, of North Hampton, an estimable lady, in 1789, by whom he had six children, but the whole family have gone to their long home except one daughter.

The second son, Andrew, born in 1765, was smart and active; he received a good education, but had a wild, roving inclination. He entered the regular army, was soon promoted to the rank of captain, served for a time on the frontier, and for several years was clerk in the War Department at Washington, where he died in middle life. The third son, John, born in 1767, a man of fine abilities and credit, followed his brother into the regular army, and also rose to the rank of captain, served on the frontier and died at Fort Gilson. He married Abigail Pearson, of Epsom, in 1791; they had one son, Charles, who went to Stanstead, Canada.

The fourth son, William, was a blacksmith by trade; he married Isabel Dickey in 1795, and in company with quite a number of young men from Epsom first settled in Stanstead, Canada.

There were also three daughters,—Elizabeth married Captain Simon Heath, well-known in Epsom and vicinity; Margaret married Rev. Mr. Haseltine, who was the pastor of the Congregational Church in Epsom for thirty years; Nancy, the youngest daughter, married John Stevens. No family record or papers have been found to aid in this humble sketch, but we have given many official and well-authenticated facts which are rescued from oblivion, and may be interesting to some of the readers of the times, and may aid the future historian in giving this family more extended mention than they have yet received in our written histories.

But in this connection we earnestly desire to call attention to one great duty yet to be rendered to Major Andrew McClary. The family, town or State have shown little patriotism, gratitude or affection in neglecting to erect some monument or stone to mark his burial-place. He was buried near the encampment of the New Hampshire Brigade at Medford, near some two hundred New Hampshire soldiers who died of disease and wounds.

John McClary was born in Ireland in 1719, and emigrated with his family to America when he was thirteen years old, A. D. 1733. His father and the family settled in Epsom in the year 1738.

John became industrious, methodical and exacting, a stern Presbyterian, as rigid as the old Scotch Covenanters,—very different from his jovial, rough, impulsive, convivial brother, Major Andrew.

He had no advantages of schooling; still he possessed a large share of common sense, a strong mind and good judgment.

He early became one of the leading men in Epsom, was chosen moderator and for over forty years was one of the principal officers and advisers in town affairs.

He was justice of the peace under the provincial government, and all cases of litigation in this vicinity came before Esquire John McClary for trial.

He was well versed in Indian affairs, was called out to do scouting duty in the French and Indian War, was a captain of the militia at that time and rose to the rank of colonel before the Revolution.

Though closely connected with the Royal government, he took a decisive stand with the colonists to resist British oppression; and while his brother represented the military spirit of the Suncook Valley, Esquire John represented the civil authority both under monarchical and republican rule.

The towns of Epsom, Allentown and Chichester (including Pittsfield) were classed together, and Esquire John McClary was annually chosen to represent them at the convention at Exeter. With such men as Colonel Joseph Badger, of Gilmanton, Esquire John Cram, of Pittsfield, and Hall Bergen, of Allentown as leading spirits, the hardy settlers of the Suncook Valley were true to the cause of independence.

Not a single instance of Toryism is recorded. Esquire John McClary was a prominent member of the first convention to organize a colonial government and afterwards in framing our State government, and was an active member nearly twenty years.

He held the responsible office as one of the Committee of Safety from 1777 to 1783. This committee had power to call out troops at such time and in such numbers as they deemed necessary and expedient.

In 1789 he was elected to the Council, and annually for the four succeeding years. In 1784 he was chosen to the Council and also to the Senate, and served as member of that honorable body three years.

He was tall, erect, commanding, dignified and made an excellent presiding officer.

In early life he was married to Elizabeth Harvey, of Nottingham. She was also born in Ireland, and came to this country in the same ship with the McClarys. They had four children. The oldest son, John McClary, Jr., who had many of the characteristics and promising qualities of his father, entered the army of the Revolution and was killed at the battle of Saratoga in 1787, while serving as lieutenant in General Whipple's brigade ("Adjutant-General's Report" says Lieutenant Michael, which is an error). The second son, Michael, will be the subject of another sketch. The third son, Andrew, was sent to Dummer Academy to be educated, and died there during the war, aged sixteen. He was buried at Medford, by the side of his uncle, Major Andrew McClary.

They had but one daughter, Mollie, who married Daniel Page, of Deerfield.

Captain John McClary had three sisters, who settled in Epsom, besides his parents and brother Andrew. The eldest, Margaret, married Deacon Samuel Wallace. The second, Jane, married John McGaffy, and the third, Ann, married Richard Tripp.

After a long and useful life, he died at the green old age of eighty-two, A. D. 1801.

The McClarys owned a very large landed estate, which was divided into several valuable farms for the sons and daughters. They are of good soil and location, commanding a fine prospect. Esquire John built a one-story house on the south side of the road. The house was enlarged at various times and became a venerable-looking mansion. It is now owned by Michael McClary Steele, of the fifth generation of the McClarys and great-grandson of Esquire John.

The old mansion is a place of peculiar interest. Here, for many years, Esquire John received the friendly and official visits of the leading men of the province. Here civil courts and military tribunals were held, and here, for half a century following, his son, General Michael, dispensed his hospitalities to his townsmen and the distinguished men of the times. Among the number were such as Generals Sullivan, Dearborn, Stark, Governors Gilman, Langdon, Plummer, Smith, etc.

That honorable and distinguished body, the New Hampshire Branch of the Society of the Cincinnati, held three of its annual meetings at this house.

Near by, the huge liberty-pole was erected in 1783, at the close of the Revolution, on the declaration of peace, when the scattered settlers of the Suncook Valley met to celebrate the happy event which they had so nobly strove to win. Good speeches, good-cheer abounded; but "tell it not in Gath," publish it only in the local "Times," the glorious occasion wound up in a glorious drunk.

In fact, no house in the valley, or all the section around, has so many rich historical associations connected with it as the old McClary homestead.

The arrangement of the interior is reverently preserved, and as one passes through its spacious rooms, viewing the relics of the past, and reflects upon the large number of honorable and distinguished men who have met within its walls, reason seems to lose its bounds, and one fancies he is wandering through some ancient baronial hall or old Scottish castle built in the age of chivalry, rather than viewing a spacious farm-house in the dull, quiet, old farming town of Epsom.

GENERAL MICHAEL McCCLARY, second son of Esquire John McClary, was born in Epsom in 1753. He received the advantages of a fair education, was a smart, active lad, and, in common with other members of the family, had very decidedly a military turn.

At the age of twenty-three he joined the army, at the breaking out of the Revolutionary War, and was appointed ensign in Captain Henry Dearborn's company, in Stark's regiment. His company, mostly from the Suncook Valley, rendered heroic service at the battle of Banker Hill. In 1777 he was promoted and made captain in Colonel Scammell's regiment.

He served four years in the army, taking part in some of the most decisive engagements of the war, and suffered with his men some of the severest privations and fatigues. Many interesting incidents pertaining to his company ought to be published. His soldierly qualities, engaging manners and family connection gave him the acquaintance and friendship of the leading officers of the Revolution, and by a severe experience in the army he gained a thorough knowledge of men and national affairs, which proved of great practical advantage in after-years.

On returning from the army he at once took a prominent position in social and political life, which he held for half a century. He took an active part in the organization of the State government, and being well versed in military affairs and of good executive ability, he was appointed adjutant-general for the State of New Hampshire. He organized that department, and held the office twenty-one consecutive years. In 1796 he was elected Senator, and was a member of that body seven years, and such was his popularity that the votes in Epsom were unanimously in his favor, and nearly so in the adjoining towns.

He was United States marshal for a long time, which, during the last war with England, with the large amount of privateering prosecuted at Portsmouth, was a very responsible office. He was tendered the nomination as candidate for Governor, but declined to accept.

Though well known throughout the State, and with positions of honor and trust at his command, his popularity, power and influence in his native town was the most remarkable. He seemed to control the affairs of Epsom with almost universal consent. For over fifty years he served his townsmen in some capacity, either moderator, town clerk, representative or auditor. He was decidedly the most popular and influential man that ever lived in town. Said an old Federalist: "If I had a family of children who would obey me as well as the people of Epsom do (General McClary, I should be a happy man."

Though once a Federalist, he cast his lot with the Democratic party and carried the town with him almost unanimously. One year, only one Federal vote was thrown.

During the last war with England party feeling ran high, and party lines were clearly drawn. Governor Plummer, through Adjutant-General McClary, called out detachments of the militia without calling together the Council or Legislature, which provoked a great deal of controversy. General McClary procured supplies for the troops, made preparations for the defense of Portsmouth, purchased cannon and munitions of war, but in 1814, when the Federalists rallied and elected John T. Gilman as Governor, General McClary resigned with virtuous indignation his office, which he had filled with credit and ability, and in which capacity he had reviewed every regiment in the State. The town of Epsom strongly supported the war. A full company, under Captain Jonathan Godfrey, volunteered for the defense of Portsmouth.

Michael McClary also did much business as justice of the peace and probate judge. Most of the court business for this vicinity was done at Epsom, and most cases of litigation were brought before him for trial.

He took an active part in organizing the New Hampshire Branch of the Society of the Cincinnati; he was the first treasurer, and held the office twenty-five years. This honorable body of Revolutionary officers met annually on the 4th of July; three of their annual meetings were held at the house of General McClary. This society is worthy of more extended mention, and their annual meetings probably called together more noted men than ever assembled on any other occasion in the Suncook Valley. He was also a zealous Free-Mason. As is well known, many of the officers of the Revolution were Masons. While in the army young McClary had met in secret conclaves such men as Washington, Lafayette, Sullivan and other brothers of the mystic order, and became an earnest worker in the craft. In connection with other ex-officers, he was instrumental in organizing a lodge at Deerfield, and in honor of General Sullivan, it was named Sullivan Lodge. He was the first Senior Warden of this lodge, and afterwards Worshipful Master.

In appearance General McClary was tall, commanding, well-proportioned and prepossessing. He made a fine appearance as a military officer, either on foot or in the saddle, which, with his position, means and hospitality, rendered him exceedingly popular. He was remarkably affable and engaging in his manners, interesting in conversation, graceful in his movements, convivial in his habits, generous, hospitable and public-spirited, possessing the elements of popularity, though fond of power, and when opposed, displayed some traits not recorded among the Christian graces. His acquaintance and correspondence was remarkably extensive, embracing many of the most distinguished men of the country. He married, in 1779, Sally Dearborn, an intelligent, interesting and accomplished lady, daughter of Dr. Dearborn, of Northampton. The marriage was a happy one. They entered company with style and grace, and around their festive board have been many happy meetings of the prominent men of the times.

They had five children that survived the perils of childhood. The oldest son, John, born in 1785, was of great personal beauty and accomplishments. He was early promoted to offices of trust,—Representative, Senator and a clerkship at Washington. He was killed by a falling building when but thirty-six. He was the most popular and promising young man in this region, and his death caused great demonstrations of grief. The funeral was the largest ever held in the Suncook Valley, and was attended by Rev. Jonathan Curtis, an able divine, especially on funeral occasions.

The second son, Andrew, born in 1787, was also unusually smart and prepossessing, but was wild and roving. He entered the army in the War of 1812, and served as captain. He married Mehitable Duncan, of Concord, in 1813, and had one daughter. Shortly after this event he sailed for Calcutta, and was lost at sea.

General McClary also had three daughters of rare attractions. The oldest, Nancy Dearborn, born in 1789, married Samuel Lord, of Portsmouth, whose ability and wealth are well known. One of his sons, Augustus, has purchased a large part of the old McClary estate. The second daughter, Elizabeth Harvey, born in 1791, married Jonathan Steele, a lawyer from Peterborough. They settled on the homestead now owned and occupied by their son, Michael McClary Steele. The third daughter, Mary, born in 1794, married Robert Parker, and is still living in Fitzwilliam.

General McClary and wife both lived to a good old age. The sad fate of their sons fell with crushing and disastrous weight upon the parents, wearing away by inches their life and vitality, and their poignant grief was only assuaged by the grave.

He died in 1825, aged seventy-two, and was buried with his ancestors in the old burying-ground in Epsom, where rests the dust of many heroic dead, whose lives and deeds are fast fading from the memory of passing generations.

The papers following are copies of votes, petitions and other papers that are interesting as curiosities:

To the Honorable Genl Assembly Convened at Exeter 19th April, 1780.

"The petition of Michael McClary Humbly Sheweth that your petitioner was, by the authority of the State, appointed to the Command of a Company in Defence of his Country; the eighth of November, 1776, Continued in his command till Sept., 1778. Then, by reason of a bad state of Health, was obliged to resign his command. And Notwithstanding the many Fatigues & hardships he has been obliged to encounter (which has ruined his Constitution), he is by a late resolve of the Genl Assembly deprived of having the depreciation of his wages made good. Therefore prays you would take the matter under your wise Consideration and make the depreciation of his wages good up to the time he left the service."

"And your petitioner as in duty bound will ever pray.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

NOAH MARTIN, M.D.

The active and energetic family of Martin has impressed itself on many nationalities, and those bearing that name have attained eminence in various fields of honor and usefulness. The American family goes back through the Scotch-Irish stock to the time when France and Scotland were so intimately connected, and, perhaps, to the time when William, the Conqueror, marshaled his adherents and retainers for the bloody battle of Sanguelac or Hastings, which decided the fate of England and changed the course of civilization, for on the list of those who accompanied him were several of the name. In France it has been an illustrious name in law, science and literature. Five of the Popes have borne the name. Everywhere we find among the members of the Martin family ambitious hard-working, successful, men of more than ordinary ability.

Early in the eighteenth century, when the stalwart and freedom-loving defenders of Londonderry, Ireland, emigrated to America to found a new Londonderry in a land where religious persecution should not seek their blood, Nathaniel Martin, the earnest man, with Margaret Mitchell, his wife, and son William, were among the early settlers who made a home in this wild and strange country. Nowhere in America have been found more honest virtues or more sterling qualities than were in this notable settlement, and the descendants of these people may well look with pride upon their Scotch-Irish ancestry.

William (2) was born in 1712; married Hannah Cochrane. Their children were Mary, James, Nathaniel, William, Robert, Samuel and Hannah.

Samuel (3), born May 26, 1762; married Sally, eldest daughter of Major James Cochrane, of Pembroke, N. H., and had Polly, Thomas, James, Noah and Nancy.

Noah (4), born in Epsom, N. H., July 26, 1801; married, October 25, 1825, Mary Jane, daughter of Dr. Robert Woodbury, of Barrington, and had two daughters.—Elizabeth A. and Caroline M. He died May 28, 1863, of apoplexy. Mrs. Martin died June 30, 1880.

Noah Martin, M.D., was studious from early life, and, his tastes leading him in that direction, he elected to follow the study of medicine, and persevered through many difficulties until he had acquired a thorough classical and professional education. After the usual attendance at the district schools and private tuition of Rev. Jonathan Curtis, he became a pupil at Pembroke Academy, where he had the benefit of instruction from those able preceptors, the Rev. Amos Burnham and Professor John Vose. His professional studies were commenced in the office of Dr. Pillsbury, of Pembroke, with whom he remained one year, and he finished his preparatory medical education with Dr. Graves, of Deerfield, being with him two years. He then entered the Medical Department at Dartmouth College, and was graduated in the class of 1824, and soon after was associated with Dr. Graves and in practice in Deerfield one year. In 1825, Dr. Martin removed to Great Falls, and, being a thorough student, he felt that to keep abreast of his profession he must have a catholicity of thought that would allow him to discriminate and use those discoveries in medical science which could be made beneficial to his fellow-men, and he soon showed that skill and energy which is the key-note of success, acquired a large and lucrative practice, and was a leading member of the medical fraternity. After nine years' residence in Great Falls he removed to Dover. His established reputation, both as a physician and surgeon, brought him at once into the confidence of the people in Dover. And now, after ten years of professional life, Dr. Martin was considered one of the best physicians and surgeons in the State; in fact, the leading physician in that section, and the consulting physician in cases requiring superior medical skill. His natural dignity of mien and courteous bearing, united with his social qualities, pleasing address and sympathetic heart, made him very popular. Generous in the matter of his services, prompt to answer the call of those from whom no remuneration could come as well as that of the wealthiest man, all who sought his counsel found him faithful and sure, always ready with kind words of advice and encouragement, and in the many delicate offices connected with his profession he displayed that discriminating sense, judgment and tact, conjoined with a nice observance of a tender and scrupulous confidence, which were among his characteristics, and endeared him to the hearts of his patients. He was deeply devoted to his profession, pursuing it with ceaseless ardor, giving it his greatest thought and study, making many sacrifices of a personal nature for its benefit, keeping thoroughly informed regarding all matters pertaining to it and calling to his aid its most advanced thought. His career was an eminently successful one and he demonstrated what determination, perseverance, untiring application and love for his noble art could do, and filled an honorable and high position.

In politics Dr. Martin was Democratic, of that honest and stable Jacksonian type which holds the object of the nation to be the paramount good of the people. With but little ambition for political preferment, he was not always able to resist the importunities of political and personal friends, and was often brought forward for political office. He was elected to the New Hampshire House of Representatives in 1830, 1832 and 1837; to the New Hampshire Senate in 1835 and 1836; and in 1852 and 1853 he was elected to the highest office of the State, that of Governor.

Dr. Martin was elected a member of the Stratford District Medical Society in 1835, and was chosen its president in 1841 and 1842; a member of the State Medical Society in 1836, and its president in 1858; and a member of the American Medical Association in 1849. He was one of the founders of the Dover Medical Association, and its first president in 1849, and re-elected in 1850. He was elected a member of the New Hampshire Historical Society in 1853, also New England Historical Genealogical Society the same year, and vice-president of the same, for New Hampshire, in 1855. He was one of the organizers of the Dover Library, and its president in 1851, 1852 and 1853. He was a member of the board of trustees of the New Hampshire Asylum for the Insane in 1852, and 1853, and member of the board of trustees of the House of Reformation for Juvenile and Female Offenders in 1855. He was one of the incorporators of the State Agricultural Society, and was elected vice-president of the same in 1851. He was chosen president of the Savings-Bank for the County of Stratford in 1844, holding the office until 1852, when he declined a re-election; was a leading director of the Dover Bank from 1847 to 1855, when he resigned; also a director of the Stratford Bank from 1860 to the time of his death. He also held various other offices of trust. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity and of the Order of Odd-Fellows.

In all the various relations of life, the kindness of heart of Dr. Martin, his gentlemanly and unostentatious manner and his pre-eminent abilities won him warm friends and admirers. Never was a man more conscientious in the discharge of official duties or private trusts, and never could the evil-minded find ought against his integrity or the purity of his motives.

SAMUEL MARTIN.

Prominent among the families dating back to the pioneer settlements of this section of the State, and members of which have in every generation been agriculturists, is that from which Samuel Martin traces his ancestry. This branch of the Martin family is "Scotch-Irish"—that is, they were of Scotch lineage, born on Irish soil,—and it was necessary that a people of one nationality and born on alien soil should have a distinctive name, hence the appellation of "Scotch-Irish."

The line of descent to Samuel is Nathaniel (1), William (2), Samuel (3), James (4), Samuel (5). William (2), born in 1712, the great-grandfather of Samuel, accompanied his parents to America when very young, and his childhood was passed amid the privations incident to the pioneer life of the new country, and in the labor of converting the wilderness and rough, stony soil into fruitful fields. His father, Nathaniel Martin (1), was a robust, persevering and adventurous man, of sterling worth, and much esteemed. His mother, Margaret (Mitchell) Martin, was a true-hearted woman, who did not hesitate to follow her husband into a new and almost uninhabited region, and to brave the hardships appertaining, if there they could only find that which their firmly-fixed faith so strongly desired: "Freedom to worship God." William (2) attained manhood, inherited the qualities of his parents, became "a tiller of the soil" and, in due time, married Sally, eldest daughter of Major James Cochrane, of Pembroke. He followed the occupation of his father, that of farming, and also learned the shoemaker's trade. He made his home in Pembroke, and was an industrious and honored citizen. He died July 6, 1828. His children were Polly, Thomas, James (4), Noah (see biography of Dr. Martin) and Nancy. James (4) was born in Pembroke, N. H., July 1, 1799. He was a resident of Epsom, where he had a large farm, which he cultivated. Intelligent and thoughtful, he kept himself cognizant of matters pertaining to public affairs, held numerous town offices and also served as representative for the town of Epsom. He married Elsie Bailey. Their children were Sally (born December 25, 1822, now Mrs. Sleeper; has four children), Samuel, James (born January 5, 1830; now residing in St. Louis; has three children), and Thomas (born July 1, 1832; has three children, and is living in Wisconsin.)

Samuel Martin, eldest son of James and Elsie (Bailey) Martin, was born in Epsom January 28, 1828. From a mere lad until he was fourteen years of age Samuel worked at farming, assisting his father in his labors. He then went to Dover, N. H., and made his home for three years with his uncle, Dr. Noah Martin, afterwards Governor, who kindly gave him the opportunity of availing himself of the valuable instruction of the eminent John R. Varney, whose enthusiasm in this calling was such as to inspire his pupils to laudable endeavor and friendly rivalry, and of whom the historian writes: "He left a record of a life of true manliness, consistency and purity." Improving these favorable circumstances, the young man acquired quite a proficiency in the studies pursued. Returning to Epsom, he remained a year, and then, like many New England boys, he thought he would try his fortune in another field of labor, and went to Boston, where he entered the employ of S. T. Parker, dealer in West India goods. He continued with this firm about two years; then made a change of employers and business, engaging with Cutler & Co., furniture dealers, to whom he gave faithful service for several more years, until, in 1851, he returned to his native place, preferring its pure air, pleasant surroundings and quiet, rural occupations, and commenced farming and lumbering in company with his father. Since his death Mr. Martin has added one hundred and sixteen acres to his farm, while he has a large holding of real estate (two hundred acres) in Allentown.

Mr. Martin is a consistent and unswerving Democrat, and as such represented his town in the Legislature of 1868-69. He is an honorable and estimable citizen, and has been elected to many offices of trust; has served as selectman for twelve years and town treasurer nine years, faithfully performing the duties entrusted to him.

Inheriting a strong physique from his sturdy Scotch ancestry, together with many excellent characteristics of heart and mind, Mr. Martin is a representative farmer and worthy descendant of those men of activity, earnest labor and endurance who were important factors in the formation of the American character.

WILLIAM GOSS.

William Goss was born in Epsom, N. H., July 13, 1820. His grandfather, Samuel Goss, came to Epsom from Greenland, N. H., and was one of the pioneers of the town. Like most frontiersmen, he possessed a rugged frame and strong constitution, fitted to battle with the hardships and privations of life in the wilderness. He lived to be seventy-five years of age. He was a soldier in the War of the Revolution, as was Mr. Goss' maternal grandfather, Yeaton, who was a sea-faring man, and served on the water in his country's struggle for independence.

Jonathan Goss, the son of Samuel, was a native of Epsom; was by occupation a blacksmith and farmer, and was a soldier in the War of 1812. He married Sally Yeaton, and had a family of seven children: Noah, died in infancy. William, the subject of this writing. Hannah Y. married Nathaniel Edmunds, of Chichester; died, leaving five children. Nancy L. married, first, Edward Edmunds, by whom there is one living child; second, Jeremiah Mack, by this marriage there is no offspring; and, third, Jonathan Marden, both are yet living, no issue. Sally married Jefferson Edmunds; they have six children living. Mary C., now Mrs. George Morse, of Loudon; they have no children. Andrew J., now residing in Santiago, Cal. He was for many years collector of customs at Saint Augustine, Fla. He was a graduate of Dartmouth College, and afterward studied medicine, but declining health forbade his choosing medicine as his profession.

Jonathan Goss was a strong, vigorous, active man of untiring energy, indomitable courage, and for those times a successful man. He was an ingenious man of inventive turn, and originated many new devices, some of which are in use at the present day. He possessed wonderful muscular strength, and many extraordinary feats of his are remembered by the older inhabitants of the community. One, related by his son, is that when more than fifty years of age, he lifted with one hand a forty-gallon cask of cider. He was a man of broad and liberal views, and gave his children what educational advantages his circumstances in life would afford.

William Goss inherited his father's qualities of activity and energy, and was early taught to labor. When not at work on the farm he assisted his father in the shop, and remained at home with his parents until about twenty-five years of age. He married, June 2, 1846, Maryett, daughter of William and Esther (Fowler) Abbott, of Pembroke, N. H. He then went upon a farm adjoining his father's, and resided there until March, 1855, when he sold this farm and purchased the place where he now resides, within a few rods of the present railroad station at Epsom. Since that time, owing chiefly to Mr. Goss' enterprise, a village has grown up around him and bears his name, being called Gossville in his honor. He has been a prudent and industrious farmer, making a stock-farm of his acreage, trading a great deal in cattle, dealing considerably in real estate and in various ways adding to his income. He has built most of the houses in the village of Gossville. He purchased the house in which his father was born, and also the one in which he himself was born, moved them over to Gossville, fitted them up, and they are still used as residences. He bought the old Baptist Church building, moved it into the village and converted it into a store. In this way he has constantly and assiduously labored to build up a prosperous village around his chosen abode.

In the building of the new church in Gossville too much credit cannot be given Mr. Goss for the energy, perseverance and persistence with which he advocated and assisted the enterprise. When others were discouraged and ready to abandon the matter altogether he took the leadership and bore, for the time being, the burdens himself, and carried it forward to completion, and this same spirit has characterized him through life.

Like other men who undertake and achieve difficult enterprises, he has met opposition, and borne heavy burdens,—burdens under which one less resolute would have faltered; but being of stern stuff, with vigorous mind and body, Mr. Goss kept up courage and endeavor, and has lived to see the "waste places made glad," and the barren hills dotted with comfortable and cozy homes. They have now in the village a shoe-factory, which has employed as many as sixty or sixty-five hands. This was built by a stock company, but Mr. Goss was the prime mover in the enterprise, and now owns more than half the stock. His son, Nathan J., is the agent and manager of the shop.

Mr. Goss has twice represented his town in the State Legislature, and has been a selectman of Epsom.

Mrs. Goss died May 3, 1873. She was the mother of four children: John Abbott, born August 26, 1847, married Electa Ann, daughter of Charles H. Carpenter, of Chichester. They have two children,—Charles C., born February 9, 1871, and Clara H. M., born July 11, 1874. Mr. Goss is cashier of the Pittsfield, N. H., National Bank, and manager of the Opera-House in that town; also treasurer of the Farmers' Savings-Bank, and also treasurer of the Pittsfield Aqueduct Company. Elizabeth J., born September 2, 1849, married Alfred Porter Bickford, of Epsom, January 2, 1870. They have four children,—William P., born February 15, 1871; Nathan A., born July 17, 1872; Alfred G., born February 1, 1875; and Harry, born May, 1883. Noah William, born July 12, 1861, now in the grain and grocery trade at Pittsfield. Nathan Jonathan, born September 13, 1863.

Mr. Goss married, as his second wife, December 23, 1873, Mrs. S. Rebecca Crockett (née Randall); no issue. Mrs. Goss had by her first husband one daughter,—Annie R., who married James Yeaton, of Epsom. She has three children,—John C., Helen E. P. and George H. Mrs. Goss is a native of Deerfield, but most of her life has been spent in Concord.

In politics Mr. Goss is a Democrat, as were his father and grandfather. He is a member of the Baptist Society. In all the relations of life, as son, husband, father, neighbor or citizen, Mr. Goss has been a true man, and probably no man in the community is more highly respected by his fellow-townsmen.

ORREN STRONG SANDERS.

Orren Strong Sanders, M.D., Boston, Mass., was born in Epsom, Merrimack County, N. H., September 24, 1820. He is the eldest son of Colonel Job and Pollie Sanders, being the senior of four sons. The palms of his hands were hardened before he reached his teens in handling the implements of an industrious farmer.

At the age of thirteen years and a half he went to live with General Joseph Low, Concord, N. H., for one year as a servant, receiving for his services two months' schooling and fifty dollars, the whole of which sum, with the exception of five dollars, he gave to his father.

The succeeding year he served seven months as a farm-hand with Judge Whittmore, Pembroke, N. H., for nine dollars a month, rising early and working late. During the following winter he attended the town school in his father's district.

In April, when fifteen years and a half old, he went to Northwood, N. H., to learn the trade of a carpenter with the late Luther and William Tasker, receiving fifty dollars and three months' schooling that year.

In March, 1836, as soon as the district school closed in Epsom, he decided to change his purpose in life, and, with his neighbor and friend, Henry F. Sanborn, went on foot, with a bundle of clothes, a few books in hand and seventeen dollars in his pocket, seventeen miles to Gilmanton, N. H., where he commenced in earnest to obtain, in the middle of the spring term, an education. In the summer term he again went to Gilmanton, boarding himself, with three other students, for ninety cents each a week.

In the autumn of the same year, a younger brother desiring to attend school, he changed his plan, and went to Pembroke, N. H., it being less than half the distance to "Old Gilmanton," and there he continued his studies for several successive terms, practicing the economical method of "playing house-keeping."

Shortly after he had attained his sixteenth birthday he commenced his first school in Chichester, N. H., known as the Meeting-House, or Reed District, for the sum of eight dollars a month and "boarded round." This school had about thirty scholars enrolled, and the sixteen dollars appropriated to the object of education for the winter months secured for them the benefit of young Sanders' earnest efforts to stimulate them to increased mental activity, to make up for brevity of opportunity.

The following winter this persevering youth was re-engaged to instruct in the same district, and at the termination of this school term he commenced teaching the school in Bear Hill District, and at the end of twelve weeks closed his efforts with a brilliant exhibition.

In the following autumn he spent fourteen weeks in Northwood, teaching in the lower part of the town; following this school, he served as teacher in the "Young District," in Barrington, returning to Northwood the succeeding winter, and gave another term of service in the same locality as before.

His last and final experience as "school-master" was in the Cilley District, in his native town, where he was favored with a large attendance and secured a successful result.

Six months after he had passed his nineteenth birthday he commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Hanover Dickey, Epsom. In the autumn of 1841 he attended his first course of medical lectures at Dartmouth College, after which he pursued his medical studies in the anatomical laboratory with Dr. Haynes, Concord. When he had completed his studies in anatomy, physiology and hygiene with Dr. Haynes he entered the office of Drs. Chadburne and Buck, with four other students, forming an interesting class, with daily recitations, taking up several branches of the medical course.

In the spring of 1843 he went to Lowell, Mass., and entered the office of Drs. Wheelock, Graves and Allen. In this new relation he had not only the assistance of Dr. Allen as a private medical tutor, but saw much practice with Dr. Graves. In the fall of 1843 he graduated at the then very popular medical college, Castleton, Vt.

On the 27th of November, 1843, he united in matrimony with his present wife, Miss Drusilla, eldest daughter of S. M. Morse, Esq., Ellingham, N. H. In December following he commenced the practice of medicine in Centre Ellingham, where he remained till June, 1847. He then moved to Chichester, where he entered upon a large and lucrative practice; but in the autumn of 1848 he became interested in the science of homeopathy, as best embodying the true principles of healing. At this time he disposed of medicines and equipments, and went to Boston, entering the office of Dr. Samuel Gregg, a distinguished homoeopathic physician; remaining with him, investigating, by study and observation, this new method of the healing art, for eighteen months; and from that time to the present Dr. Sanders has followed his profession in Boston, and has been, from the first, conspicuous among the physicians of that city for his extensive and lucrative practice and his successful treatment of disease.

The habits of industry and frugality, formed in youth and student-life, not only gave to Dr. Sanders a vigorous constitution, but laid a broad foundation for that power of endurance so essential to enable him to bear that long, continuous professional strain which has secured him unparalleled success and a high professional reputation.

While he is a "medical winner" in every sense of the term, with aspirations ever for the right, he has enjoyed the confidence of his numerous friends, not only in the city government and Masonic fraternities, but also of the members of the church to which he has so long been attached.

His generosity has been equal to his success, and he has contributed with no stinted hand to public institutions, and freely given aid to the deserving poor. He is ever ready to give his support to any worthy object; and if his large-hearted charities, for the most part secretly performed, find no place in newspaper reports, they are written in letters of light by the recording angel in the Book of Life.

His munificence in establishing the "Home for Little Wanderers" is but one of the many grand and noble acts of his life.

For several terms Dr. Sanders was a member of the Boston School Board, and, despite the exigent demands made upon his time by his extensive practice, he was unflinching in his attendance, and his utterances were always valued for their suggestiveness and practicability. In fact, industrial education has long been with the doctor a favorite study, and he has written some excellent essays on the subject.

He is not, in any sense of the term, a politician, and yet he has always endeavored, from a consideration of the duties of citizenship, to make himself familiar with the ever-varying phases of political life, to thoroughly comprehend the tendency of each political movement and to give his intelligent support to every measure which he has regarded as conducive to the public welfare. His judgment has frequently been appealed to, his influence solicited and nominations to office have been tendered him by appreciative friends; but hitherto his professional tastes and duties have led him to decline to have his name appear in the list of political aspirants.

Within the pale of his profession, however, honors have been thrust upon him, and on the medical platform he has been a frequent and eloquent speaker.

In 1872 he delivered, before the Massachusetts Homoeopathic Medical Society, a masterly oration on "Progress without Change of Law." In 1875, before the same body, his address on "Dynamization" was pronounced to be an able production; and in 1878, when elected president of the society, his oration on "Homoeopathy, the Aggressive Science of Medicine," was received by the audience as a new revelation of the triumphant progress of similia similibus curantur. He has frequently lectured before the Ladies' Boston Physiological Society, and his lucid expositions of hygienic law were always listened to with marked appreciation; and the records of other medical societies will bear witness to his readiness to contribute his quota of original thought to the medical knowledge of the day. His article on cholera, which appeared in the Boston Globe July 5, 1855, is exhaustive of the subject and has attracted much attention.

As a speaker, he is forcible and earnest, and his appearance on a platform is such as to at once win the sympathies of an audience. As a writer, his style is vigorous and terse; and his clear-cut sentences make it peculiarly attractive. If his studies had been so directed, he might have excelled as an orator or obtained a conspicuous place in the ranks of literature.

We give an engraving of his present commodious residence, at 541 Columbus Avenue, Boston, which was finished in 1872. This house, which is his own property, and which was erected at a cost of some hundred thousand dollars, was designed throughout by himself, and seems to indicate that, if he had not been a doctor, he might have become eminent as an architect. The sanitary appliances are perfect, the decorations in excellent taste, the arrangements for comfort and convenience the best possible, and from basement to attic it bears testimony to the high development of the doctor's constructive faculties.

The lion, life-size, which is placed in couchant attitude on the corner of the house, and is a conspicuous ornament to the avenue, was carved from a block of granite selected by the doctor himself, and, as a work of art, may compare favorably with the famous lions of Landseer, which adorn Trafalgar Square, in London.

To my own knowledge, the benevolent deeds done by this physician during his residence in the city of his adoption are sufficiently numerous to fill a volume, but in such an outline sketch as this it would be impossible to enumerate them, and I can only say, in closing, that what Dr. Sanders has done for God and humanity is but an example of what other young men may accomplish, if they will only model their lives after his perseverance, self-denial and unblemished habits.

"M."

GEORGE SANDERS, JR.

One of the representative agriculturists of this section, whose keen practicality, industry and devotion to that science well deserves more than a mere mention, is George Sanders, Jr. He is a son of George and Polly (Twombly) Sanders, and was born in Epsom, N. H., November 6, 1832. The ancestor of the American family of Sanders was Christopher Sanders, who came from England prior to 1671. We cannot fully trace the line to George, nor tell from which one of the sons of Christopher he is descended.

The great-grandfather of the one of whom we now write was George Sanders, a resident of Rye, N. H., where he passed his days, a quiet and useful citizen. His son John, the pioneer of the family in this town, was born in Rye, and when a young man came to Epsom, married and became a resident. He was a stalwart man, vigorous and energetic, and devoted himself to his farm with all the force of his strong nature, and as a citizen was much respected. About 1850 he removed to Concord, where he resided until his death, March 13, 1870, aged nearly eighty-nine years. George Sanders, Sr., son of John and Anna Sanders, married Polly Twombly, of Barrington. They have had three children,—George and Mary (twins), and John. Mr. Sanders, inheriting the strong physique and hardy nature of his father, became a farmer, and in 1832, shortly after his marriage, he purchased a farm of one hundred and twenty acres, and by his unremitting labors and constant care he brought the land into such a state of cultivation that it soon became remunerative, and he was able to increase his first ownership in land some hundreds of acres by adding to it at various times, and at present the Sanders family have five hundred and thirty acres in their possession. It is located in different tracts, but the home-farm is considered one of the best farms in the town of Epsom. Mr. Sanders, Sr., has been selectman, and held some minor town offices. His religious convictions are in accord with the Free-Will Baptists, of which church he has been a member about twenty years. He is now living, at the age of eighty-one. Mrs. Sanders died December 22, 1884, aged eighty-one.

George Sanders, Jr., could hardly have consistently followed any other vocation than that of the farmer, having been born and passed his childhood days where everything about him revealed the bounteous gifts of Mother Nature, and also inheriting, in some measure, from his father and grandfather the characteristics of a good agriculturist. He received a good common-school education, supplemented by a term at Pembroke Academy. He has always resided on the old place. He married, January 5, 1875, Nancy A., daughter of David and Mary Ann (Carr) White, of Antrim, N. H., a descendant in the fifth generation from John White (1), of Ireland, whose son, Patrick (2), studied for the priesthood; but renouncing his faith in the doctrine of the Catholic Church, he was obliged to flee to this country, where he made a home. David (3), son of Patrick, married Sarah Dutton, of Peterborough, and when the clarion notes of the trumpet called the brave and the willing to their country's defense, he responded and proved a faithful soldier to his father's adopted land. David (4) married Mary Ann Carr, a descendant of William Carr, a prominent man in the early days of Godstown. Mr. Carr, in 1787, went to Antrim and built the house and settled on a farm which is now occupied by David White. He married Ann Boyce, of Bedford, and died at the age of eighty-three years; his wife lived to be ninety-three. Mary Sanders, (twin sister of George) married Nathaniel Twombly, of Barrington. They have four children.

George Sanders, Jr., has always pursued that oldest and most honorable calling among men, farming, and has proved himself the right man in the right place. To be convinced of his wisdom and care, you have only to look on his fields and meadows, his walls and buildings, his barns and stalls, his stacks and cribs. But, with all these cares, he has identified himself with the civil and religious interests of the town, has been selectman for several years, and is an earnest and liberal member of the Free-Will Baptist Church. Democratic in politics, he represented Epsom in the Legislature of 1874-75.

This family, for several generations, have been mostly "tillers of the soil," industrious, careful, practical working people, doing their duties well in the sphere of life to which they were called. They have been men of good judgment, active temperament, strong physique, and have performed their share of the public matters of the town, and discharged their social, public and religious duties conscientiously.

CHARLES CURRIER DOE.

Charles Currier Doe was born in Durham, N. H., July 21, 1823. He is the son of James and Patience (Langley) Doe, and grandson of John Doe. His father, James Doe, was a farmer, and when Charles C. was but two years of age removed to the town of Lee, in Stratford County, where he resided ten years. He then spent about a year each in Newmarket and Nottingham, when he removed to Barrington, where he made his home for several years. He then moved to Grafton, and there his wife died (1845). Mr. Doe continued to reside there, making his home with his eldest son, till 1856, when he came to Pittsfield, where he died (1862).

He reared a family of eight children,—

John, married Abby Davis and resides in Pittsfield; has two children, a son and daughter.

Nancy, married John Garland, of Nottingham. They have one daughter.

Drucilla married, first, L. Kimball; no issue. Second, Moses Brown, of Andover. By this marriage she had two children. She is now deceased.

Abigail, married John T. Gilman; resides in Deerfield; has two sons.

Charles C., subject of this sketch.

Gilman L., married Nancy Ellenwood. They reside in Iowa; have three sons.

Mary J., married David Garland, of Nottingham. They have one son.

Hezekiah H., married — Sleeper; had one son. Hezekiah enlisted in Company B, Ninth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and died in hospital at Nicholasville, Ky., August 31, 1863.

Charles C. Doe, like so many of the sons of the yeomanry of New England, had but limited facilities for obtaining an education, the public school of the town in which his father chanced to reside affording the only opportunity he enjoyed. Being one of a somewhat numerous family, in very moderate circumstances, he had to contribute his share of labor to the support of the family as soon as he was old enough for his services to be of any avail. When he was sixteen years of age he hired out away from home to work on a farm, and from that time till he attained his majority his wages went to the support of his parents. December 15, 1845, he married Melitable P., daughter of Amos and Nancy (Libby) Davis, of Epsom, N. H., and went to reside with his father-in-law and manage the farm. Mr. Davis lived but a few months after his daughter's marriage. There still remained, however, three old people in the family,— Mrs. Davis, her mother (Mrs. Libby) and a bachelor brother of Mrs. Davis. Mr. Doe took charge of the farm and assumed the care of the old people, a trust which he most faithfully performed to the time of their death.

He has followed farming as his chief occupation through life, and has been successful. In addition to farm labor, however, he has usually employed the winter months in teaming and lumbering; and for many years, while his sons were growing up to manhood, they employed their time at shoemaking and thus added to the family exchequer.

Mr. Doe represented his town in the Legislature during the two years of 1865 and 1866. He has been selectman of his town and has been a member of the Christian Church for more than forty years.

Mrs. Doe's ancestors, both on the paternal and maternal sides, came from Rye, N. H., to Epsom, about a century ago, when this country was almost an unbroken wilderness. Her grandfather, Davis, settled on the spot where Mrs. Doe now resides. The old homestead has never been out of the possession of the family. Her grandfather, Libby, was a soldier in the War of the Revolution, and her uncle was in the War of 1812.

The children of Mr. and Mrs. Doe are,—

Walter C., born November 12, 1846; married Elva Cass, of Epsom; resides in Lynn, Mass.; is a shoemaker by trade.

Amos, born September 11, 1849; married Mellie Holman, of Dixfield, Me.; resides in Boston; is by trade a carpenter.

James A., born March 7, 1852; married Augusta Ladd, of Deerfield, N. H.; resides in Manchester; is a surveyor of lumber, etc., in a large sash and blind-factory and lumber-yard.

Sarah A., born November 1, 1854; married Calvin D. Clark, of Barnstead, N. H. He was for four years engaged in the grocery trade in Pittsfield, N. H., but in 1884 he sold out his business and went to reside with his father-in-law on the farm.

George W., the youngest of the family, was born

Charles C. Doe

David M. Philbrick

August 24, 1857; died December 17, 1883; unmarried. He always resided with his parents. He was a young man of bright intelligence and more than ordinary ingenuity in mechanical matters.

Mr. Charles C. Doe is an honest, upright, sincere man; unobtrusive, attending strictly to his own affairs, and of a generous, manly, frank disposition. The world would be better for more such men.

DAVID MORRILL PHILBRICK.

D. M. Philbrick was born August 26, 1823, in the north part of the town of Epsom, N. H. He is the son of Daniel and Polly (Loeke) Philbrick, and grandson of Daniel and Ruth (Morrill) Philbrick. His paternal grandfather was a native of Hampton, Rockingham County, N. H., and moved to Epsom when a young man, and when the virgin forest of the "Catamount" and surrounding hills was almost unbroken.

The Philbricks belong to that sturdy, self-reliant and self-contained class of men who have played so important a part in the rise and progress of civilization in New England. In the county of Rockingham, and in other parts of Eastern New Hampshire, the name is a frequent one, and all bearing it show unmistakable evidence of descent from the same common progenitors. They are calm, earnest, industrious, persevering men and women, with the reputation of being law-abiding and just, useful citizens. Daniel Philbrick, Sr., became quite a large land-holder in Epsom. He had a family of twelve children, of whom Daniel was one. Daniel settled on a part of his father's farm, where his son David M. now resides, and was a tiller of the soil all his life. He had a family of eight children, of whom David M. was the only son. The names of the children were Abigail, died in childhood, Ruth, married first a Mason; second a Merrill; has four children. Mary, unmarried, resides with David M. Asenath, unmarried, resides with David M. Abigail (2d), married E. B. Sargent; has four children. Betsy, married Stephen F. Ring; no issue. David M., subject of this biography. Peggy Almira, married George Buffum; has one child.

David M. Philbrick may be fairly said to stand as a representative farmer of his town and section. He has all his life made agriculture his chief pursuit, and by constant and intelligently directed effort he has made it a success. He owns, in various tracts, about six hundred acres of land, a very large farm for New Hampshire. He is probably the largest land-owner in town. In the winters, after work on the farm is impracticable, he has employed his time in cutting and hauling wood and lumber.

He is a man who is respected and confided in by his neighbors and townsmen, and was chosen to represent them in the Legislature in 1876 and 1877. He has been selectman of Epsom two years, and survveyor of highways twenty-five years. In politics he is a Democrat.

He married, November 27, 1850, Sarah A., daughter of John and Margaret (Wallace) Stearns, of Deerfield, N. H. Their children are: A babe (unnamed), died in infancy; Clara L., married Frank Buffum, of Berwick, Me.; has five children. Daniel, David F., died aged seventeen. Mary A., married George Giles, of Pittsfield, N. H.; no offspring. John S., Susan M., George H. and Augustus T.

Mrs. Philbrick's grandparents were John and Ruth Stearns, both natives of New Hampshire, and descended from the early Pilgrim stock.

NATHAN BICKFORD.

Nathan Bickford was born in Epsom, N. H., December 2, 1797. He was the son of Thomas and Olive (Haynes) Bickford. Thomas was a farmer, shoemaker and tanner, and at one period of his life was quite a prosperous and successful man; but most of his substance was spent before his death. He had a family of seven children, viz.,—John, Mehitable, Samuel, Nathan, Daniel, Olive and Dearborn.

Nathan was born at the old Bickford homestead, near the present village of Gossville. When he was a lad of sufficient age he went to serve an apprenticeship as clothier with a Mr. Currier. His service expired when he was nineteen, and he then went to Boston, where he remained till his twenty-third year, when he returned to his native town and bought out a clothing and carding-mill on Suncook River. He met with success in this enterprise and continued it for more than a dozen years, when, leasing his mill business to another party, he embarked in the lumber trade. At this he did, for a period of about ten years, quite a large business, rafting down the Suncook and Merrimack Rivers. In the mean time he conducted farming on a considerable scale, having purchased, about 1830, a farm lying adjacent to his mill.

After he relinquished the lumber business he gave his entire attention to his farm, and added to the original tract at intervals during his life. He was a man who was held in high esteem by his fellow-townsmen, and he had ample proof of their confidence by the various positions of office and trust in which they placed him. He was selectman of his town for many years and held various minor offices. He was a member of the State Legislature in 1836, and throughout a long and busy life he retained the implicit confidence and sincere respect of those who knew him.

In politics he was an advocate of the Free-Soil party, and upon the organization of the Republican party and up to the time of his death he affiliated with that party.

In religious matters he was a Free-Will Baptist, and contributed largely to the support of that church.

He was a man of large benevolence and generosity, and gave of his means freely and with unstinted hand to all worthy charities.

He married, May 12, 1823, Eliza W., daughter of Robert and Hannah (Osgood) Dickey, of Epsom. They had five children.—

Susan G., born February 25, 1824; married Rev. Jonathan A. Knowles. They have two children and reside in Manchester, N. H.

Salina O., born August 5, 1829; married Captain Arthur C. Locke. One child living. She died June 2, 1877.

Eliza A., born July 25, 1833; died, unmarried, December, 1878.

Morrill D., born October 3, 1836; married Eliza J. Hoyt, of Epsom, November 28, 1862. They have two bright and accomplished daughters,—Susie A. and Addie E. He was elected Representative of Epsom to the State Legislature in 1885. He has always kept up the lumber trade which was started by his father.

Alfred P. married Lizzie J., daughter of William and Maryett Goss, of Epsom. They have four children,—William P., Nathan A., Alfred G. and Harry M. He has always conducted the farm of his father.

Nathan Bickford died January 15, 1879, aged eighty-one. Mrs. Bickford still survives (1885), aged seventy-six.

HISTORY OF LOUDON.

BY HENRY J. OSGOOD.

CHAPTER I.

THE name Loudon is of Scotch origin, and means "Low Hills." The hills in this town are but a few hundred feet in height, and the general configuration of the surface suggests that it is a hilly town. Bear Hill in the southerly, Oak Hill in the westerly and Brown's Hill in the northerly are the highest, with Clough's Hill in the centre of the town. Brown's Hill is the highest of all, and, a few years since, the United States Signal Service erected upon it a signal, to be used in the survey of the State; but its height was not sufficient to be of practical use.

Another reason why it was so called is given as follows: A Scottish landlord, called Lord of Loudon, meaning a low, hilly country in Scotland, was one of the grantors of the town of Canterbury in the year 1727, and when the town was divided, it was suggested that the new town be called Loudon, from the circumstance that it resembled the land in the dominion of this lord. The town of Canterbury originally included all that tract or territory now known as Loudon, Canterbury and Northfield, and was named for the Lord of Canterbury.

Loudon lies upon the northwesterly line of the city of Concord; is bounded by Canterbury westerly, by Gilmanton northerly, and by Pittsfield and Chichester easterly. It is largely an agricultural town, and ranks as the third in the county in the value of its agricultural products. But two towns in the county raise as many bushels of corn, and none as much wheat or produce as many pounds of maple sugar. It is also an excellent grazing town.

Soucook River, running in a southeasterly direction through the town, is the principal stream, and affords water-power, which is improved to some extent by mills at both the north and southerly parts of the town.

The population of the town at the present time is about 1200, having decreased since 1860 from 1638 to 1224 in 1880. It has an area of 28,257 acres, two-thirds of which is improved land. A large amount of lumber has been taken from the remaining land within a few years.

Indian Tribes.—Sabatis, an Indian chief, occupied Sabatis Heights (now called Loudon Ridge) from 1740 to 1750, and it was the capital of the tribe. Individuals of this tribe exist in the vicinity at the present time, although the race is nearly extinct. They are known by the name of Battis, and present the complexion and cast of the Indian, greatly modified by intercourse with the white race. This tribe lived near the "Great Rock" in the pasture of Levi F. Sleeper.

There was another tribe, called the Soucooks, who made their headquarters at the ridge near the "Great Rock" in the field of David J. French, according to the best legendary history to be obtained. Two arrow-heads and a stone pestle have been turned up by the plow upon the farm of Mr. French, and kept as relics. About the year 1750 the chiefs of these tribes were followed and killed while intoxicated, for offenses committed by their tribes upon the white settlers at different times. The persons concerned in this matter were arrested and carried to Portsmouth and lodged in jail. A mob followed, beat down the door of the jail, and, liberating the men, carried them triumphant to their homes.

CHARTER OF THE TOWN BY THE KING.

[1. 8.]

"George, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King, Defender of the faith—

To all the people to whom these presents shall come, Greeting.

*"Know ye, that of our special knowledge, for the encouragement of settling a plantation, by and with consent of our Council, have given, and by these presents do give and grant in equal shares, unto our beloved subjects, whose names are entered in a schedule, that inhabit or shall inhabit within the said grant, all that tract of land within the following bounds: Beginning at the head of the town of Chichester, and to run North-west by the town of Gilmanton to the Wampagoose Pond, then from the first-mentioned place, southwest, seven miles on the head of the aforesaid Chichester, thence North-west to the river that comes out of the great Pond aforesaid, then by the river to the second-mentioned bound. That the same be a town corporate by the name of Canterbury. To have and to hold the said land forever, upon the following conditions: First, That the Proprietors, within three years, build seventy dwelling-houses and settle a family in each, and clear three acres of land fit for planting or sowing. Second, That a meeting-house be built within four years. Third, If any Proprietor neglect, he shall forfeit his share of the land. Fourth, That a share be reserved for the Ministry of the Gospel, another for a Parsonage, and another for the benefit of the schools in the town.*

Provided, that if war break out with the Indians within three years, then three years shall be allowed them after the war, rendering therefore to us or our officers the Annual Rent of one part of corn in the said town on the first Thursday in March yearly forever, reserving also all most growing on said land, according to the Act of Parliament in that case made and provided. For the calling of the first meeting, we do appoint Paul Gerrish, Paul Wentworth and John Smith, Select men of said town, and that they continue in said office until the third Thursday of March, 1778, when others shall be chosen in their stead. In testimony whereof, we have caused the seal of our Province to be affixed.

"WATSON—JOHN WENTWORTH, First Governor."

"Given the Twentieth day of May, in the fourth year of our reign, Anno Domini 1778."

"By order of his Honor Isaac Tinkern, Governor."

"ROBERT WATSON, Chief of Council."

The Town incorporated in 1773.—The following is a copy of an act to set off part of the town of Canterbury into a distinct parish by the name of London, as passed in the House of Representatives, January 22, 1773:

"Whereas, a number of the inhabitants of Canterbury, in the county of Rockingham in this Province, have petitioned the General Assembly to be set off and erected into a distinct Parish agreeable to a vote of said town set forth in said petition, and after due notice thereof being given, no person hath appeared to oppose the same, and the same appearing for the public good. Therefore, be it enacted by the Governor, Council and Assembly, that all that part of the town of Canterbury, beginning at the northeast corner thereof, at the Buckhorn Bush-tree, thence southwest on the head line of Chichester eight miles to the line between Canterbury and Bow, thence on the line between said Canterbury and Bow, five miles, thence across said Canterbury, northeast eight miles, to Gilmanston line, and by that to the bounds first mentioned, be and is hereby set off from said town of Canterbury, and erected into and established to be a distinct and separate parish by the name of London, and that the Inhabitants thereof be invested with all powers and privileges by law invested in any Parish within this Province, and are fully exempt from paying further tax to the town of Canterbury.

"And Nathan Bacheelder of said Parish, is hereby Authorized and empowered to call the first meeting of said Parish of London for the choice of Parish Officers, by setting up a notification thereof in some public place in said Parish seven days beforehand, and to govern said meeting until a Moderator be chosen, and then they are to proceed to the choice of officers as the law directs.

"Province of New Hampshire. In the House of Representatives, January 22nd, 1773.—This Bill having been read three times, Told, That it pass to be enacted.

"J. WENTWORTH, Speaker."

In Council January 23d, 1773.—This Bill was read a third time and passed to be enacted.

"THEODORE ATKINSON, Secretary."

"Consulted,

"J. WENTWORTH."

"Copy examined by

"GEORGE KINGS, Deputy Secretary."

First Meeting.—The first meeting of inhabitants of the parish of London was called and held at the house of Abraham Bacheelder, Jr., on the 23d day of March, 1773, by a warrant under the hand and seal of Nathan Bacheelder. The business to be transacted was as follows:

"1st. To choose a Moderator for said Meeting.

"2nd. To choose a Parish Clerk, Selectmen, Constable and all other Parish officers as the law directs for the ensuing year.

"3rd. To see if the said Freeholders and Inhabitants will agree upon and vote to raise a sum of money this present year for the benefit of the poor in said Parish.

"4th. To see if said Freeholders and Inhabitants will vote to raise a sum of money for schooling the present year in said Parish.

"5th. To see if the said Freeholders and Inhabitants will vote that the charges in getting the said Parish of London set off from Canterbury shall be collected by a rate, according to the Polls and Estates in said Parish.

"6th. To send the said Freeholders and Inhabitants will vote the sum of thirty-two dollars, which his Excellency John Wentworth was pleased to give in when signing the charter of the Parish of London, the same having been worked out on some highway in said Parish.

"7th. To agree upon and see how much money shall be raised this present year for highways in said Parish.

"8th. To see if the Freeholders and Inhabitants will agree upon and vote to sell Twenty acres of trees on the Passageage for this present year in said Parish.

"9th. To see if said Freeholders and Inhabitants will agree upon and vote to build two or three school-houses the present year.

"10th. To see if the Freeholders and Inhabitants will agree upon and choose one set day to hold the Annual Meeting in said Parish, and to transact any other matter or thing that may be thought advisable for the interest of said Parish."

The proceedings were as follows:

"Chose Mr. Jethro Bacheelder Moderator for said meeting;

"Chose Nathan Bacheelder Parish Clerk.

"Chose Jethro Bacheelder, Moses Holman and Jacob Towle Selectmen

The Religious History of London.—The same year in which the town was incorporated measures were taken for the building of a meeting-house. At a meeting of the parish held in November, 1773, it was "Voted to build a meeting-house, and that it stand upon the southeast end of the school lot, part or all in the road, if the land is best." At a meeting held November 10, 1777, "Voted to set up a meeting-house by a rate or tax;" also "Voted to get the timber and haul it to the spot this winter, and that labor be three shillings per day." Eliphalet Rawlings, Abraham Bacheider, Nathaniel Bacheider, Ezekiel Morrill, Jethro Bacheider, Moses Ordway and Jonathan Clough were chosen for the committee to build the house. "Voted to have the house the same size of the Epsom house;" also "Voted seven hundred dollars to get the frame to the spot, and frame it." December 4, 1778, "Voted to add six feet in length and two feet in width." In the year 1779, "Voted to raise one thousand dollars and lay it out in labor at eight dollars per day," also "Voted to sell the pew privileges at auction to the highest bidder, and that the purchasers of the privileges be allowed twelve months after the house is raised, boarded, shingled and clap-boarded, and the lower floor is laid, to build their pews in, and that those who do not build in that time, their privilege shall return to the parish." "Voted to buy two barrels of rum for the raising." The selectmen's account shows that they paid Josiah Bacheider for rum one hundred and eight dollars, and paid Reuben Greeley for two quarts of snake-root, for the raising, twelve dollars. "Voted to leave the finding of the supper to the committee." "Paid the Rev. Mr. Noble, for ministerial services at the raising, one dollar and fifty cents; also paid Mr. Blunt, who lived in the old "Martin house," for the trouble to him at the raising." The parish bought of Mr. Blunt a strip of land in front of the meeting-house in order to have better accommodation. The first meeting held in the house was a parish-meeting for town business. August, 1789, "Voted to build two porches, one on the east and one on the west end of the house;" also "Voted to put in joist, lay a rough floor and put up the finish in front of the gallery before the ordination of Mr. Tucker." The house was lathed by Jonathan Smith, plastered by John Sargent and finished in the year 1797; the posts in the lower part still bear the figures on the top as painted in 1797. An article was, in 1795, inserted in the warrant to paint the outside, but failed to pass in the meeting. The house appears to have been used for religious meetings as soon as it was boarded and shingled. The plan of the house was very peculiar. The pulpit was built upon the back side of the house and was elevated at least six or seven feet from the floor of the room, and was reached by ascending a flight of eight or nine stairs. It was finished with pine wood and displayed the best of skill and workmanship. The minister, while speaking, stood upon an elevation of about seven inches, and the Bible in front of him was at that height, that he could swing his arms above it when speaking with earnestness. Above the pulpit and over the minister hung the sounding-board, which was built in an octagonal shape, and was at least six feet across it, and was suspended from a large beam in the roof by an iron rod, one and one-half inches square. The workmanship displayed in the finish of this sounding-board was of the highest order. When taken down at the time of making the alteration, in 1845, it required the strength of about ten men to lift it. The deacon's seat or pew was directly beneath and in front of the pulpit, with a half-round table at his right, constructed in such a manner that when not in use it dropped down, and was held by hinges to the top rail of the pew. Upon the left of the pew was a smaller stand or table of the same form and supported the same, which was used to hold the tankard of wine and the wine-cups. The pulpit and surroundings were painted of a lead color, while the tables were painted a dark brown.

The pews were square in form, and the outside row next the wall around the house were elevated to the height of three steps from the floor. Seats were placed upon the four sides and were hung with hinges, and during prayer were turned up to prevent any one from sitting during that very important part of the service. A walk extended in front of each around the house. Upon the floor below this row were placed four other groups of pews with four in a group, with an entrance from the walk mentioned. Upon the right and left wings, and almost in front of the pulpit, were built long, narrow seats, which were used and known as the "anxious" seats in time of revival. When not thus used, they were occupied by persons who were unable to purchase or own pews. One side of the aisle was used only by the men, the other by females.

The gallery extended around three sides of the room, with pews corresponding in form and location to those beneath. The singers' seats were in the gallery, and were situated directly in front of the pulpit. The entrance to the gallery was only by the porches upon either end of the house, which consisted of several flights of stairs, winding around upon each of the four sides. The frame was of the strongest and best of timber, the posts being of white oak; the beams are of old growth pine, and were hewed fourteen and sixteen inches, while the roof is self-supporting, the rafters being double-trussed. In the year 1845 two stories and two rooms were made by extending the gallery over the whole of the upper story, which is used for a meeting-house, while the lower story is used for town and other purposes. A belfry was added, in which hangs a bell, the gift of Captain Solomon Caverly to the society worshipping in the upper story.

For a long time this house convened all the people in the town. There was but one creed and belief in religious matters in all the town, and that was known as Congregationalism. The church and state were one and inseparable. The laws of the State compelled people to support the gospel and the ministry, and the selectmen of the town raised and assessed upon property of the inhabitants sums as large as were thought to be expedient and necessary. In the year 1774 there was raised by the town the sum of fifty dollars, and the same in the years 1776; and in 1777, "Voted one hundred and fifty dollars." In 1779, "Voted three hundred dollars for preaching." In the year 1780 the article in the warrant was, "To see if said Parish will vote to raise a sum of money for the use of preaching and how much; and if voted, to see if they will vote to pay it in corn or grain next fall." And it was "Voted, to take the money the Parsonage was let for preaching." In 1781, "Voted to hire preaching for only eight Sabbaths." In 1782, "Voted not to raise any." In 1783, "Voted to raise thirty pounds." Previous to this year no person had been settled as minister. The Rev. Mr. Blydenburg had preached more than any other one, he at that time being the owner of a lot of land lying and adjoining the parsonage and school lot upon the north. A minister tax was assessed for the first time, the list embracing the names of ninety-one of the tax-payers of the town.

The Rev. Israel Day was given a call to settle with the people at this time; but, upon examination, his belief upon certain doctrinal points was not in accordance with that of several of the people, and he declined the call. The following, taken from the records of the town, had some effect upon the matter, probably:

"LOUDON, March 13, 1784.

"By these Lines, we, the subscribers, do enter our dissent against Mr. Israel Day being settled as a preacher in Loudon.

"Garshom Mathes, Abel French, Joshua (his X mark) Rawlings, Eben Josiah (his X mark) Bines, Philip Brown, Nathan Raubolder, John Droe, Moses Morrill, Daniel Laidl, James Silver, Joseph Smith, Charles Sargent, Jr."

Mr. Day, in his letter, says,—

"Another difficulty that is lying in my way in this affair is the church to which I belong have declined to give me a dismission and recommendation, for sufficient reasons, as they suppose.

"Dated this first day of May, 1784

"ISRAEL DAY."

In the year 1785 thirty pounds was raised. In 1786, "Voted, to lay out the back money, and to hire the Rev. Mr. Cummings three Sabbaths." In 1787 no money was raised, as appears by the town records. Several difficulties arose within the parish upon local matters, which divided the people, and from the frequency of holding town-meetings it may be concluded that much unpleasantness of feeling existed. These difficulties were, in part, the feeling caused by the letter and course pursued by the Rev. Mr. Day, and a further division came up in regard to the location of the meeting-house. Several meetings were held in order to change the location and build the house near the south part of the town, but all such propositions were voted in the negative. Then a meeting was called "To see if the town will vote to Set off all the southwest corner of the town, and have the same annexed to Concord or Canterbury, as may be most convenient, commencing at the town line and running southeasterly to the mouth of Pine Island Brook, and then follow the river to Bow line." This was voted in the negative. In the year 1788 the Rev. Jedediah Tucker commenced preaching to the people of the parish. At a town-meeting held the 17th day of January, it was "Voted to give the Rev. Mr. Tucker a call, and chose a committee, consisting of Joseph Tilton, Nathaniel Bachelder, Stephen Wells, Jeremiah Clough and Daniel Ordway, to agree with Mr. Tucker and report at the next meeting."

At a meeting of the parish, held on the 14th day of February, "Voted to give the Rev. Mr. Tucker that piece of land bought of Mr. Blunt for a settlement in London." Also, "Voted to give him the income of the parsonage during his ministry in London, with the privilege of cutting his wood with prudent usage." Also "Voted to give him sixty pounds for the first year, sixty-five for the second, seventy for the third, and seventy-five for the fourth year of his ministry." Also, "Voted that he shall have three Sabbaths yearly to visit his friends."

"Lot 68, June 22^d, 1789.

"By these lines, we, the subscribers, do enter our dissent against Mr. Tucker being settled in the ministry in London.

"Daniel Smith, Levi Chase, Dinon Fittsall, James Merrill, Nathaniel Rawlings, Isaac Lowell, Samuel Jacob, Joseph Drue, Robert Drue, Abiel Chamberlin, Nathan Clough, Ebenezer Parker, Jonathan Wiggins, Jonathan Clough, Jonathan Chase, Moses Rawlings, John Clough, Samuel Merrill, Samuel French, Captain John Sabin, John Drue, Jacob Tole, Samuel Hill, Bomou Collins, Stephen Cole."

At a meeting in September, 1789, "Voted to choose a Committee of seven to join Mr. Tucker in appointing a day for Ordination. And chose Nathan Bachelder, Esq., Moses Ordway, Thomas Bachelder, Abraham Bachelder, Joseph Moulton, Timothy French and Nathaniel Bachelder." This committee appointed the 21st day of October following, to be the day. Also, this committee chose the following gentlemen to compose the council:

Rev. Mr. Adams, of Stoughton, Second Church; Rev. Mr. Howard, of Stoughton, First Church; Rev. Mr. Robins, of Milton; Rev. Mr. Tucker, of London; Rev. Mr. Thatcher, of Dedham; Rev. Mr. Upham, of Deerfield; Rev. Mr. Colby, of Pembroke; Rev. Mr. Evans, of Concord; Rev. Mr. Smith, of Gilman-ton; Rev. Mr. French, of Andover; Rev. Mr. Babcock, of New Andover; and Rev. Mr. Merrill, of Plaistow.

The selectmen paid the expenses of the ordination, and Mr. Tucker continued to preach for nearly thirty years. He also was the practicing physician and surgeon for the parish, making no charge for such service within its limits.

"We, the Subscribers, Inhabitants of London, hereby notify the Congregational Society in said London that we consider it both illegal and unconstitutional for any society whatever to lay a tax on any person or persons by the authority of a majority of a Town or Society vote. And we, the undersigned, hereby give notice that we are determined to pay no more ministerial taxes for the purpose of the support of any preaching or minister whatever in that way after this date.

"London, March 14, 1803.

"Stephen Pickering, James Palmer, Isaac Smith, Archelus Moore, Jonathan Smith, Jr., Elizabeth Swan, Thomas Bachelder, John Carter, Elisha Sweet.

"A true copy. Attest.

"ENOCH WOOD, Town Clerk."

Mr. Tucker, as minister of the gospel, united nearly all the people in town who were married, commencing in 1795. The records of the town show that he married two hundred and thirty-two couples, with one or both of the parties living in London.

In the years 1812 and 1813 he also served as chairman of the Board of Selectmen for the town. In looking at the record books of the town, one may gain an impression of the man, particularly in the boldness of the signature of his name, which is imitated by no other person. It seems that after his dismissal he gave his attention more to public business and to the practice of medicine. The reason for the vote of dismissal is unknown. It might have been at his own request or from other causes. Just before the vote of dismissal the following dissents are recorded:

"This is to let you know that I do not believe in paying minister rates to Mr. Tucker.

(Signed)

"DANIEL LOVERING."

"March 18, 1804."

"I do hereby dissent against paying taxes to Mr. Tucker, as I do not belong to his Society.

(Signed)

"JOHN CULL"

"March 9, 1804."

"I do hereby enter my dissent against paying a Minister tax to Mr. Tucker.

(Signed)

"JONATHAN LOGGEE."

"April 15, 1805."

"I do hereby enter my dissent against paying a Minister tax to Mr. Tucker.

"NATHAN MANFIELD."

"March 31, 1805."

After the dismissal of Mr. Tucker, in 1810, by vote of the town, the Rev. Enoch Coursier was ordained as minister, in 1816, and continued as such for a number of years. The Rev. Samuel B. Dyer and the Rev. Enoch Coursier both continued to preach to the churches of London for nearly thirty years. They lived in the same neighborhood, and as the sectarian strife which had grown up in the parish continued to increase, unkind feelings existed between the two men. Both were strong and powerful men, of large and well-proportioned bodies, unyielding in disposition, and the consequent result was that feelings of the most bitter animosity, as individuals, existed between them, which extended to the churches over which they were the pastors. The Rev. Mr. Dyer was a member of the Legislature from the town of Loudon in the year 1818. While at Concord he boarded with one Mr. Davis, with fifteen others, four of whom were ministers. On Friday noon a convention was held at the boarding-house, Mr. Dyer, chairman, and it was "Voted that we will not drink any ardent spirits till the session closes."

The law which authorized the selectmen to tax the citizens for the support of the minister was very distasteful to many of the tax-payers. The town became involved in lawsuits in consequence of it. The case of Isaac Smith was one of expense. The largest tax assessed against him in any year was $1.60, which he positively refused to pay in any manner. He was arrested and put in jail for one day and released. The town carried on the lawsuit for some years, until the expenses in the case amounted to two hundred and seventy-five dollars, after which the law was repealed.

The hardness of feeling growing out of the workings of this law led several persons to organize a society, to be known as the first Free-Will Baptist Society in Loudon, which was done by John Sanborn, Jonathan Clough, Abner Clough and Nathaniel Martin, in the year 1807, and held meetings one-fourth part of the time in the old meeting-house, with the Rev. Samuel B. Dyer as minister.

In May, 1823, one-half of the old meeting-house was given up to the Free-Will Baptist people. The Congregational Society made a renewed effort in 1826 to build a new house, to be located nearer the south part of the town, and the following year erected a new one at the village. This led to an unhappy division. Mr. Courser preached the dedicatory sermon, but declined further services. In 1837 the condition of the society became discouraging; he was dismissed and left the town after twenty years of labor. The rapid rise of the Free-Will Baptists was its first shock. A severer one was from its own division, attended by the personal difficulties of Mr. Courser with some of his church members. Both the churches for several years were supplied by several preachers for short periods of time. In the year 1839 a new church edifice was erected near the old one, at a cost of sixteen hundred dollars. The Rev. Cyrus W. Wallace was the first minister. The church and society failed in settling him, for want of pecuniary means. Parker Pillsbury followed, and further divided the church upon the question of slavery. He was succeeded by the Rev. John Le Bosquet, followed by Rev. Ezekiel Dow, Jonathan Ayres, E. F. Abbott, Jarius Ordway, Rev. Mr. Caswell and finally the venerable Rev. Mr. Courser returned and preached for one year or more, which was the close of his life-work in the gospel ministry. The Second Church at the village has had but two ordained pastors,—the Rev. Henry White and the Rev. Thomas N. Jones. Other supplies, such as Calvin White, Henry Wood and the Rev. Charles Willey, have preached to this people. In the year 1883 the Rev. C. Roper was the pastor of this people, and largely by his efforts the church was repaired. The Methodists have had a church for several years in this place, and the Rev. Silas Green, during some years, was the preacher of both the Methodist and Congregational Churches. Since, the preachers have been of the Methodist order, and at this time, 1885, no preaching is sustained by either.

About the year 1847 the Free-Will Baptists, by a vote of the town, obtained control of the old meeting-house for meeting purposes, by altering and making an upper story, which they have occupied as a place of worship, at a cost of one thousand dollars. The Rev. John Norris was called as the pastor of this people after the alteration. He was succeeded by William A. Sargent, who was ordained as a minister. During the stay of Mr. Sargent a meeting was held for several weeks under the labor of Elder Phinney, of Maine, in which the Rev. E. F. Abbott, of the Congregational Church, joined, which resulted in large accessions to either church. Elder Sargent was followed by the Rev. E. G. Knowles, Rev. Josiah P. Stinchfield, Rev. S. S. Brooks; and the Rev. John George was ordained and remained three years. After his removal the church was thoroughly repaired, and alterations made upon the inside, a new pulpit and furniture purchased. At the same time Captain S. Damon Caverly, a former citizen of the town, presented the society with a church-bell. The house was rededicated, and Carter E. Cate, a townsman and graduate from Dartmouth College, was engaged and ordained as a minister of the gospel by the Free-Will Baptist denomination, and remained for one year. He was followed by the Rev. Charles E. Burd, who remained four years, and was succeeded by Rev. D. L. Quint, who is the present minister in the year 1885.

Bean and Judith Thompson, John Leavitt and Polly Emery, Valentine Hill and Polly Thompson, Nathaniel Merrill and Hannah Rowell.

1802.—Nathan Bacheher and Nancy Rollins, Byley Lyford and Lois Lyford, Henry Tobbetts and Polly Beck, Leonard Hill and Betsey Drew, Benjamin Fitch and Sally Bacheher, Matthias Haines and Polly Fernald, Benjamin Brown and Peggy Beck, Chandler Gilnes and Betsey Davis, Abraham Bacheher and Hannah Kelley, Jeremiah Child and Nancy Rollins.

1802.—Levi French and Betsey Clough, John B. Blake and Polly Maxfield, Jacob Carter and Betsey French, David Ingalls and Sally Fernald, Charles Golden and Ruthy Hill, Jonathan Worth and Eliza Taylor, Charles Cate and Dolly Bacheher, William Sanborn and Peggy Cross, Peter Wallbridge and Abner Smith, Levi Chase and Suskey Clough, Benjamin Wells and Abia Moore, John Gilnes and Suskey M. Daniels.

1803.—Daniel Perkins and Hannah Davis, Josiah Sargent and Hannah Smith, Josiah Bacheher and Dolly Sargent, Caleb Gilman and Judith Harvey, Samuel Haines and Hannah Bacheher, Benjamin Thompson and Abigail Rollins, Stephen Gale and Abigail Dimond, Jonathan Greely and Hannah Bacheher, Jacob Gerrish and Sally Ames, Samuel Osborne and Comfort Tasker, Benjamin Palmer and Polly Jacobs, Thomas Holden and Eleanor Willey, Daniel Jones and Sophia Parkinson, Daniel Blanchard and Ester Parkinson, Joseph Greely and Nancy Wells, Samuel Moor and Rachael Brar, Samuel Perkins and Sally Bennett, David Foster and Sally Dearborn, David Bacheher and Hitty Lang, Samuel Currier and Sally Bliss.

1804.—John Clark and Polly Currier, Samuel French and Suskey Tilton, Charles Beck and Sally Sargent, Joshua Wallard and Polly Langmaid, John Peveley and Betsey Sanborn, Samuel Elliot and Eunice Sargent, Stephen Hobbs and Lydia Perkins.

1805.—Joseph Thomas and Polly Osgood, Joshua Thompson and Eunice Bacheher, Richard Palmer and Susannah Perkins, Daniel Hort and Sally Flanders, Sarah Cate and Betsey Chamberlin, Benjamin Rowell and Merrimack Child, John Plidwick and Nancy Avery, Aaron Stevens and Sally Gilnes, Joseph Hort and Betsey Buswell, James Ingalls and Louisa Wheeler, Josiah Emery and Betsey Osgood, William Munsey and Joanna Barton.

1806.—Samuel Palfinstee and Kitty Clifford, John Hill and Rachel Haines, Theodore Ring and Betsy Blake, Nathaniel Greeley and Sally Holden, John Avery and Hannah Eaton, James Bacheher and Polly Wheeler, David Harvey and Nancy Thompson, William Tenney and Peggy Flanders, Ebenezer Bean and Deborah Dow, Josiah James and Deborah Goss.

1807.—Benjamin Munsey and Sally Haines, John Moore and Catherine Blaisdell, James Maxfield and Hannah Bacheher, Deborah Bunker and Mary Bacheher, William Berry and Abigail Brown, Charles Fernald and Statura Avery, Samuel Elliott and Judith Chamberlin, Jonathan Moore and Theodate Emery, Joshua Berry and Polly Bacheher, Phineas Burdett and Nabby Grant.

1808.—Anthony Sherman and Sally Piper, Benjamin Jones and Sophia Gleason, Phineas Weeks and Lydia Rogers, Moses Kimball and Cynthia Eastman, Jonathan Cate and Charlotte Blanchard, Samuel Currier and Rachel French.

1809.—Timothy French and Polly Towle, Paul Twombly and Sally Weeks, Daniel Colby and Sally Bacheher, James Osgood and Sally Bacheher, Ebenezer Parker and Abigail Fernald, Paul Winkley and Abigail Rollins, Thomas Manster and Polly Rowell, Moses Merrill and Elmer Osgood, Zebulon Winslow and Estrope Brown, Jacob Bacheher and Dorothy Garland, William Jackson and Betsy Osgood, Timothy Hillard and Anna Sleeper, Gleason Ladd and Polly Osgood, Samuel Merrill and Sally French.

1810.—Levi Brown and Polly Morse, Jonathan Hinesman and Susannah Kenney, Nathaniel Flanders and Polly French, Joshua Sargent and Betsy French, Enoch Gerrish and Ruth Clough, Josiah Drake and Nancy C. Winslow, Jeremiah Emery and Lydia Morse, Joseph Bacheher and Suskey Tilton.

1811.—David Rollins and Lydia Stevens, Timothy Mureck and Judith Wells, Thomas Potter and Susannah Tilton, Stephen Wells and Eliza Tilton, Bennett Akerman and Eunice Ring, David Sargent and Polly Page, Abraham Bean and Sally Clough.

1812.—Lewis Flanders and Betsy Piper, John Emery and Abigail Osborn, John Cummings and Mary Lovring, Benben Lovring and Betsy Bacheher, Theophilus Norris and Rhoda Dimond, John Sargent and Betsy Brown, Isaac Argin and Susannah Bacheher, Timothy Brown and Dorothy Bacheher, Levi Swann and Rachel Bennett.

1813.—Philip Brown and Sally True, Nathaniel Sherburne and Jane Piper, Alexander Brazz and Sally Eaton, John Merrill and Hannah Osborn, Thomas Backett and Sarah Lovring, Timothy Tilton and Susannah Osgood, Enoch Brown and M. L. Hittable S. Rollins, Joshua Drinfeld and Comfort Durzin, Bradley Shawcross and Betsy Barber, Daniel J. Smith and Joanna French, Johnson Lovring and Mary Root, John Longee and Lucy Wells, Amrose Starbuck and Eunice Berry.

1814.—Benjamin Winslow and Betsy French, Theodore Ring and Betsy Maxfield, Philip Brown and Anna Wedgwood, Jewett Sanborn and Judith Bacheher, Joseph Tasker and Polly Quint, Jesse Sanborn and Charlotte Bacheher, John Messer and Sally Stevens, Manly Bacheher and Nancy Gleason, Jonathan Bacheher and Lois Wells.

1815.—Jeremiah Towle and Susannah Maxfield, Phineas Healy and Polly Barber, Nathan Clough and Hannah Kenney, Osgood Ring and Sally Brown, John Moore and Betsey Holman, Peter French and Lydia Starbuck, Ephraim Huse and Sally Hamdell.

The foregoing were all married by the Rev. Jedediah Tucker, from 1790 to 1815, amounting to two hundred and thirty-two marriages.

Schools.—The town voted to raise for schooling, in the year 1776, ten pounds, lawful money. From 1776 to 1779 the school money was used for war purposes. In 1779, "Voted to raise two hundred pounds for schooling." In 1781, "Voted to hire a school-master for six months, and voted to raise five thousand dollars for schooling." In 1782 no money was raised. In 1786 it was "Voted to raise forty pounds for schools." Also "Voted to build four school-houses by a Parish rate to be paid in specie, and that said houses shall stand, one about half-way between the pound and Mr. Caleb Pillsbury's; the second to stand at the mouth of Esq. Sias' mill-road; the third to stand at the mouth of Bear Hill road; the fourth to stand near Isaac Pillsbury's house." These divisions were known as classes. It was also "Voted that the four classes have the privilege of sending scholars from one class to another upon town money." For a number of years the town voted sixty pounds annually for schooling. In 1792 one of the school-houses was burned, and the parish voted to build a new one, and for the selectmen to build it at vendue.

In the year 1796 "Voted two hundred dollars for schooling." About 1780, Timothy Gleason came to this country from Scotland, he being of Irish descent, and followed the occupation of school-teaching. It seems that he taught the four classes in town for a number of years. He was a most excellent penman, and was employed by the selectmen to make the record of taxes and town proceedings, and for a century no person has equaled him in skill, clearness and beauty in this fine art. Mr. Philip Brown taught school for a number of years after Mr. Gleason; also Dr. Benjamin Kelley, of Gilmanton, Henry Jackson, John Bachelder and others. In 1809 the town "Voted to number the school districts. The easterly class to be No. 1; the class near Moses Ordway's to be No. 2; the new south district to be No. 3; the class near Samuel Piper's to be No. 4; the Timothy French class to be No. 5; the class near John Moore's to be No. 6; Thomas Moore's to be No. 7; Elliot Carr's to be No. 8." Amount of money raised this year for schooling, five hundred and thirty-two dollars.

In the year 1810 a school-house tax of $56.23 was raised in No. 1 for repairs; also in No. 2, $52.11 was raised for the same purpose. The school money continued to be more each year, until at the present time the selectmen raise and pay to the different school districts about fourteen hundred dollars. School-teachers formerly were males. It was the custom for young men to attend school until they were twenty-four and twenty-five years of age, and it was not uncommon in some of the largest districts for as many as ten or fifteen of this class of scholars to attend school, the teacher having no laws or regulations to aid but his own. The labors of all such were heavy, requiring men of strength and power to meet the emergencies required. Those who followed the business soon became tyrants to an extent in their school duties, and often made them irritable and vexatious in other duties. The school laws of our State are ancient as they now exist. The school-district system is the same as nearly a hundred years ago. At different times efforts have been made to revise and change them in some of their aspects, but nothing has been effected until the present year.

Intoxicating drinks.—The custom of drinking liquor was in practice for many years, and was common. There are several instances where rum was furnished by the selectmen upon different occasions. At the raising of the meeting-house a barrel of rum was bought, and paid for by the selectmen. The selectmen also paid for the rum used when bridges were built. Constables advertised that at the sale of land for taxes each sale would be followed by a drink of flip or toddy. It was considered as one of the important things in settling the township, to set out an orchard of apple-trees, which soon produced fruit bountifully. The chief use of them was to make cider. Almost every farm had its cider-mill, and large quantities of it were made and placed in the cellars, to be drank. Not unfrequently fifty barrels, and sometimes more, were made in a single year. The custom of using liquor was so general that it was not regarded as among the bad habits indulged in. Ministers drank it, and the old decanter was placed upon the table whenever they visited their parishioners. Fast days, Thanksgiving days, the birth of children and the visits of relatives were some of the great occasions when it was used, and often to excess. It is said that the Rev. Mr. Tucker, by this habit, lost his usefulness as a minister, and that it was one of the causes of his leaving the ministry in town.

In the year 1735 a law was enacted requiring any person that sold liquor to obtain a license from the selectmen of the town. In this year Jonathan C. Perkins, Enoch and Abner Wood, Philip Brown, Nathaniel Bachelder, Jr., and Nathaniel Rollins were licensed. In 1797, Samuel Piper, Daniel Lowell and Wm. Stevens were licensed. In 1800, J. Bachelder, Wm. Stevens, J. Dearborn, Moses Rollins, Philip Brown, David Eastman, Nathaniel Hill, William Brown, Daniel Lowell, Benjamin Kelly and Stephen Perkins were licensed. In 1801, Joseph Dearborn, Jethro Bachelder, Samuel Piper, Philip Brown, Samuel Osgood, Enoch Wood, Brown & Ladd and Daniel Lowell were licensed. In 1803, Philip Brown, Timothy Barnard, Samuel Osgood, David Eastman, Moses Chamberlin, Samuel Piper, John Ladd, Moses Flanders and Samuel Elliott were licensed. In 1805, Philip Brown, Samuel Osgood, David Eastman, Levi Dearborn, Daniel Lowell, Enoch Wood, Samuel Wales, Samuel Elbott and Gould Diamond were licensed to sell at their dwelling-houses by the one-half pint and gill. Several of these men were licensed as inn-holders, or taverners, for the purpose of putting up and providing food and all the accommodations for the large teams which were employed in drawing goods and groceries from Portsmouth and Newburyport to towns north as far as Laconia. Large teams of oxen, as well as horses, were used in the transportation, and the amount thus drawn was large.

As early as the year 1777 the parish took some action in relation to the use of liquor. At a parish-meeting, held to vote for five persons as members of the council, the following resolution was passed:

Resolved, That no person be allowed a seat in the council or assembly who shall, by himself or any other person for him, before said choice, treat with liquor any Elector with the apparent view of gaining their vote, or afterwards on that account. Elected Mr. Samuel Chamberlin as Representative of said Parish for one year, and he is to vote for delegates to the Continental Congress.

It is generally conceded that the use of alcoholic drink as a beverage has decreased since the organization of the township, in 1773.

Carriages and Customs.—The introduction of carriages with wheels was of a more recent date. At first journeys were made on horseback. A family of four could comfortably ride in this manner, the husband and father sitting in the saddle, with the wife upon a pillion behind, carrying a child in her arms, while the father took one before him in front of the saddle. The wife maintained her position by holding with one arm the body of her husband. Horseback-riding was the custom in practice by all who owned a horse. Women in 1700 rode with skill and grace, and were more healthy and robust than at the present time. Horse-blocks were placed at public places for the purpose of mounting the horse. In front of the meeting-house one was made of a large log, hewed square, and elevated sufficiently so that one could mount with ease. At the White School-House, which was used largely for meetings on the Sabbath, there was a large stone placed at the southeasterly corner of the house, which was known and used as a horse-block. The first vehicle used for riding was seen on the old Canterbury road, and consisted of two poles fastened to the saddle or girth of the horse, while the large ends dragged upon the ground, and were fastened together by a cross-piece, upon which a seat was fastened for those who rode. Sleights were made and used in the winter, and were of wood principally, heavy and cumbersome to the horse, and affording but little style to the rider.

The first chaise used in London was bought in Newburyport, Mass., by Mr. Enoch Wood. It is related, in regard to this chaise, that upon its first appearance on the Sabbath, as Mr. Wood and his family rode to the meeting-house, the people came out and gazed with astonishment as it was driven up to the door. Afterwards Mr. William Tilton and Mr. Stephen Wells each bought and used one, and in a few years they became quite common. Their cost was nearly two hundred dollars each. Carriages with four wheels soon afterwards came into use, they being made without springs, with the body setting directly upon the axle. The seat was movable, and was so arranged upon wooden springs that the force of the jolt of the rough ways and roads was somewhat modified to the rider. A great improvement was made in the use of a leather thorough brace, as it was called, and a still greater, when the steel elliptic spring was invented and became general upon nearly all carriages. Cart-wheels were made largely of wood, the rims or felloes being wide and heavy, and at first with no iron or tire. Later, strip or streaked tire was used. This was wide iron cut into strips and spiked upon the outside of the rim. It was claimed that tire thus used was more durable than when used whole.

Other implements used in farming have greatly improved, while some have become obsolete; new and better inventions have taken their place. Mr. Elkins Moore, of London Ridge, was a plow-maker; also Oliver W. Morrill and Mr. James Osgood. These men built wood plows, with the plow-share of iron. The mould-board was worked out from a tree with a winding or twisting grain in order to give the furrow taken and cut a right turn. Cast-iron plows have been in use for nearly fifty years, and have superseded the wood-plow entirely. Like every invention, the cast-iron plow had its opposers, who thought it would prove worthless from the great liability to break. Shovels have been changed from wood with an iron edge to cast-steel; hoes from iron with a steel edge to all steel. Forks of all kinds have changed in the form and material from which they were formerly made. Mowing-machines take the place of the hand-scythe, and horse-rakes have taken the place of the old hand-rake.

Buildings.—The old proprietors, when settling in town, built, generally, very large, two-storied, double dwelling-houses; and, in most instances, upon the top of some eminence or high hill, and then made a way or road to the same, so that the old highways were mostly very hard and hilly. Many of these large houses were built at the close of the year 1790, and up to 1800. It was a very popular, as well as a fashionable idea, to build a large house, and if the expense was too heavy, a two-story half-house, as they were called, was built first, and the other half added whenever able. There are now standing about thirty of these ancient and honorable landmarks. These large houses required a large amount of lumber to finish them, while the timber in the frames is very large and heavy. Most of them had but one chimney, which was in the centre, resting upon a strong foundation of stone-work beneath, which was often ten feet square at the base. The old-fashioned barns were built long and narrow, with two floors, and were cold and inconvenient to both the farmer and his cattle. No cellars were ever built, and probably were never thought of. Mr. Joseph B. Sanborn has recently built, at a great expense, the most thorough and best constructed barn now in town, and it is a marked contrast to those of 1700.

About the year 1820 the stove in the meeting-house was purchased, and was the first one ever used in the town. This stove remained in the town-house and was in use until the winter of 1884—a period of over sixty years. There was no way of warming this large house for thirty years previous, upon any occasion or in any weather, save a small box or foot-stove, as it was called, which was about seven by eight inches, and was made of tin, and inclosed in a wood frame, with a bail or handle for carrying, and inside was placed a basin which was filled with hot coals from the fire. This utensil was used more especially to give warmth to the feet, and was used chiefly by the women. Cooking-stoves were introduced several years later. There was at first a strong feeling against the use of them, and it required much effort and persuasion to induce a person to buy one. The kind first in use was called the "Moore Cooking-Stove." After several years the prejudice existing against their use subsided, and they gradually came into use.

All cooking had previously been done over the fire-place and in the large brick oven. A change took place in both the manner and kind of food used. Indian corn and rye, which had been chiefly used for bread, were used in less quantities, and wheat became more common. Potatoes were but seldom used, and but few were raised. The large families of children were fed largely upon the old-fashioned dish of bean porridge, which was both palatable and healthy. The olden-time utensils in use were the heavy iron pots and kettles and the long-handled frying-pan, in which pancakes and flap-jacks were fried. Much skill and labor was practiced in frying for a large family of children. These cakes were made of rye meal which had been bolted or sifted, and made into a thin batter and poured into the pan until the bottom was well covered, when it was placed over the fire and well shaken to prevent burning. When ready to turn, a smart shake and a toss did the business without taking the pan from the fire, and the skill consisted in tossing over the crane while being turned.

Cloth and its Manufacture.—In connection with the subject of food and the different methods of raising and preparing the same for use, may properly be mentioned the mode of manufacturing cloth and some other of the most necessary articles which were used and especially needed. Wool and flax were the chief resources from which the people made all kinds of cloth. Wool was raised by the farmer, and it was carded and spun by the housewife, and wove in a hand-loom, colored and made ready for use by the same person. Cotton was used but very little, the cost of goods manufactured from it being so great that but few purchased it when first introduced. A calico dress was a fashionable fit-out for any woman, and was prized nearly as high as silk. Articles of bedding, table linen and clothing were made from flax, every farmer sowing the seed and raising his required amount. The process of getting the linen from the raw material was one requiring much care and hard labor. After the process of rotting it, certain men used to make it their business in the winter season to go from place to place and work the flax into tow and linen, ready to be spun. Most of the farmers had in their barn an apartment, or room, called the flax-room, and in it were placed the flax, break, swingle-block and flax-comb. The process was extremely dusty and disagreeable to the person engaged in it. The article called tow was the coarser part of the material, and was spun upon the large wheel, while the linen was that part saved by combing thoroughly upon the flax-comb, and was spun upon the small wheel and made into thread, table-cloths and other articles which were necessary. It was not uncommon for women to spend the afternoon in visiting each other, carrying their small wheel with them, and, while talking, spin a quantity of linen for some family use. These linen wheels are now but seldom seen; if one is found, it is preserved as a curiosity and a relic of "ye olden time."

Boots and shoes were made by hand also, and from stock which required a year at least to properly tan the same. It was called a good day's work for one to make a pair of shoes, and it took two days to make a good pair of boots. In almost every neighborhood some one made and mended boots and shoes, which was, of course, his trade. In the easterly part of the town Newell Sanborn was the shoemaker; in the other parts were Samuel Haynes, William Rines, Daniel Blissdell, Deacon Tilton, with some others who were the shoemakers of the town.

The Town Constable was an officer of great importance. His duties consisted in collecting the State, town and minister taxes, which were committed to him for that purpose, and he also paid out all the money received. The selectmen's account upon the record-books was made through the constable, he being credited with the bills paid and charged with all money received. In all the records of the town, only one person, while performing the duties of constable, was in any manner found to be dishonest. In the year 1795, Ensign Hanson Hoyt was chosen to the office of constable, and an entry appears for that year, under the form of a certificate, signed by the selectmen, John Sanborn, Samuel Piper and John Clough, that the said Hanson Hoyt refused to account for $375.54, which was in his possession as money belonging to the town.

The town purchased, for one dollar, a cane, which was known as the "Constable's Cane," which was carried by each successively, during their term of office, as the ensign of their authority, and the pointing of it to any disorderly person upon public occasions produced quiet and order at once. The duties of tythingman were somewhat similar to those of constable, so far as disorder was concerned. Their duties were upon the Sabbath-day, and they often removed from the house persons who disturbed the meeting by whispering or laughing; also, they were required to arrest any one seen traveling, if he were a stranger, upon the Sabbath, and have him fined.

Respect for Titles and Titled Men.—In all the records of the town, for a period of more than fifty years, it is a very noticeable fact that great respect was shown the business men of the town, as well as all who were connected with the militia, and the title was invariably used in addressing them, and also in writing their names upon the tax-list and all matters of town affairs. The following instances are examples: Esquire Ephraim Blunt, Captain John Sanborn, Ensign Samuel Piper, Quartermaster Smith, Lieutenant Ladd, Colonel Jonathan Rollins, General Richard Brown, Major Bachelder, Esquire Archelaus Moore. This respect and honor given and practiced by these ancient worthies toward each other was intended as a mark of true worth to the individual thus addressed, as everything to them partook of, and was built upon that noble and great characteristic and principle of their nature,—honesty of purpose. This feeling of respect was taught to their children, and when they arrived at manhood the parental restraint and advice often continued for a long time afterwards. The boys were taught to take off their hats and make their bow to respected men whenever they chanced to meet in the street. Scholars were taught to rise in their seats and stand during the entrance of the committee, or minister, and to perform the same act of courtesy upon their departure.

Burying-Grounds.—The first person who died in Loudon was a man who was a stranger, and being taken suddenly sick, died, and was buried in front of the old Dr. Tenney house. The building used as the office of Dr. Tenney, when he resided in town, covers the grave. At that time no burying-ground was laid out. In the year 1773, Mr. Nathan Bachelder and Mr. Jethro Bachelder were chosen as a committee to lay out the burying-ground. Two and one-half acres were laid out at the southeast corner of the parsonage lot, and some years afterward it was inclosed with a stone wall, and upon the front side long hewed timber was laid upon the wall, and covered with boards, which were painted black. There was but one entrance to the ground, and that was through a door about six feet wide, in front. This door was painted black, and was hung upon stone posts upon either side, with a stone cap-piece connecting them at the top. The first person buried in the yard was a very tall man, the grave being at the right hand of the entrance and is now visible. The name of the man is not known.

One acre was reserved in the original laying out for future use, which was inclosed recently.

A few years after the laying out of the ground at the Centre, the town bought of Philip Brown a piece of land at the village, for the burial of any who might wish, in that part of the town. This land was conveyed to the town for a public burying-ground by a deed from Philip Brown to the town of London, which is recorded at the register of deeds' office at Concord. These are the only public grounds in the town, and are repaired at the expense of the same. These two grounds contain the remains of nearly all the first and oldest settlers of the parish, several of whom were noted townsmen. Mr. Stephen Moore has recently given attention to the convenience and care of the dead, by laying out a ground at the village and the building of a tomb. Mr. Moore has made a very desirable and pleasant location, which in after-years will be filled, probably, with those of the present generation. There is also, besides, the Wells burying-ground. At the northerly part of the town is a new one, in a pleasant location and tastefully laid, and it contains some costly and elegant monuments.

There are at least twenty-three burial-grounds in the town, and a large part of them are in the westerly portion. The public ground at the Centre was originally one of the most gloomy and dreaded places in town. The high stone wall on the front, and made still higher with large timber laid on the top, and painted black, with its high, gallows-like posts, and narrow, black door through which no carriage ever entered for more than fifty years, certainly made it a terror to the children by day, as well as to men by night. The custom of beautifying these ancient "cities of the dead" is most excellent and commendable. At the village there is also a new and very pleasantly laid-out ground, adjoining that of Stephen Moore, which contains many valuable and costly monuments of marble, among which are several of the Bachelder family, the descendants of Jethro Bachelder, one of the original settlers of the parish.

The Laying of the Lots in London.—The lots in the town were laid in two divisions, called first and second division of hundred-acre lots. The first division includes that part of London taken from Canterbury, and contains forty whole hundred-acre lots. The second division includes the north and easterly parts, and contains one hundred lots of one hundred acres each, besides several parts of lots. These lots were laid one hundred and sixty rods long and one hundred rods wide, and each contained one hundred acres of land. The settlers who first came into the town pitched upon certain lots for their farms, and such lots were called pitched lots. There are thirty-two of this description, and they were situated near the White School-house and upon Clough's Hill, and are those now owned by J. T. Sanborn, Benjamin Bachelder, C. H. Osgood, C. B. Green, G. Mason, J. M. Ladd, H. Johnston, Abner Clough, H. J. Osgood and others. Besides these, there were several granted lots (so called), which were given for some service rendered in the laying of lots or highways. In the southerly part of the town the lots were laid smaller, and contained but thirty-eight acres, and were called common lots. The laying of the lots were full measure, and most of them include one or more ranges, either upon the side or end, and if it were not for the pitched lots, would be parallel and regular in form.

Highways.—In the year 1761 a committee was chosen from the town of Canterbury to lay out a road from the Canterbury meeting-house the nearest way to some sea-port town. This was the first road laid, and was called the old Canterbury road. In the year 1774, Jethro Bachelder and Jacob Towle, selectmen, laid the road from Moses Ordway's, over Bear Hill, to Chichester line. The same year the road from the meeting-house to Samuel Morrill's corner was laid; also one leading from Captain Sias' mill to John Moore's corner. In 1778, Nathan Bachelder and Ephraim Blunt, selectmen, laid the road from Gilman-ton line to Quartermaster Jonathan Smith's. March 22, 1774, Jethro Bachelder and Jacob Towle, selectmen, laid the road leading from the meeting-house southeasterly to the Raccoon road (so called).

"DEEDS, July 26, 1779.

"This may certify, inasmuch it may concern, that I have given a road the selectmen have laid out thro' one corner of my hundred-acre lot, No. 109, by me, in London, per me. "JONATHAN WOODMAN, Jurer."

"LETTRES, June 24, 1796.

"This day received a range-way at the west end of Lot No. 101, the whole width of said lot and no further, in full satisfaction for the road that leads from my house to Bachelder's mills.

"August 24, 1790.—Samuel Poyer and John Clough, Selectmen, this day laid out a road from Lieut. Abner Clough's corner, by John Clough's, to John Moore's. Whereby, the above road runs through land of Jonathan Chase, John Clough, Moses Caverly, Dimond Fernald, we, the selectmen, agree to give them in compensation the following Ranges: Jonathan Chase to have the Range across his lot, and no further; also, one half of the Range across his Lot No. 157. John Clough to have the other half of the range across Lot No. 157. Moses Caverly to have the range across his Lot No. 129, and no further. Dimond Fernald to have the range across his Lot No. 128, and no further. In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands.

"March 9, 1796.—John Sanborn and Samuel Pierce, selectmen, this day laid out a road beginning at Loudon line a little easterly from Leavitt Clough's dwelling-house; thence running to Moses Lovering's house, had three rods wide."

"September 9, 1799.—Stephen Wells and David Eastman this day laid out a road three rods wide leading from Stephen and Nathaniel Maxfield's to the road that leads from Henry Beck's to Samuel Hill's."

The return of this road reads as follows:

"We allow this road to be as much profit as it is damage to the owners of the land it goes through."

"LUCAS, July 28, 1779—This day the Selectmen laid out a road through my hundred-acre lot, No. 103, and 1, the subscriber, have given said road to the parish of Loudon, per me.

(Signed)

"ABRAHAM BACHELDER, Esq."

"LORDON, July 28, 1779.—This day received fifty dollars for a road the selectmen laid out through my land from Abraham Bachelor's to the Voted road. I say received in full by me.

(Signed)

"LETT. JOHN SANBORN."

"July 8, 1779—Ephraim Blunt and Jonathan Clough, Selectmen, laid out the road from Canterbury line to Otis Hill's."

"November 16, 1784—John Sanborn, Samuel Chamberlin and Joseph Tilton laid out the road from Jacob Osborn's to Gilman's road."

"June 17, 1799—John Sanborn and John Moore laid the road from Canterbury line, by William Wheeler's, to the road leading from Lovering's mill to Little Bachelor's house."

"LORDON, March 21, 1800.—We, the present Selectmen of Loudon, agree with LEAVITT CLOUGH, of Canterbury, to give the said Clough the range at the west end of the Lot No. 103, beginning at the lower end of the pond, and to extend northerly to the line between Loudon and Canterbury, in exchange for the road that goes by said Clough's house, and 1, the said LEAVITT CLOUGH, do agree to take the above range as full compensation for said road.

(Signed)

"LEAVITT CLOUGH,
"STEPHEN WELLS,
"DAVID EASTMAN, } Settled.
"JAMES THOMPSON.

"June 23, 1800.—Samuel French, Jr., David Eastman and ELIAS MOORE, selectmen, laid out a road beginning two rods south from Mr. Philip Brown's Well, southerly to Mr. Dearborn's house; thence north to the easterly gutture of the stone Bridge over the Soucook river, near the tail of said Dearborn's saw-mill, to the road that leads to Concord and Canterbury."

The highway leading from Buswell's corner to Howarth Mills was laid as follows: One of the owners of the land through which this road was to be laid became offended at the proceedings of some neighbor who was interested, and, as a matter of revenge, gave the selectmen one gallon of rum to lay it in the worst place they could find; and they did accordingly.

The laying out of most of the highways in town is generally on record, giving the location, distance and width laid out.

CHAPTER II.

LOUDON—(Continued).

THE GENEALOGY AND BIOGRAPHY OF MANY OF THE CITIZENS AND FAMILIES OF THE TOWN.

The Bachelor Family.—REV. STEPHEN BACHELOR,¹ the founder of the family in this country, was probably from the southern part of England, as he certainly preached at a village a few miles north of South Hampton, in the county of Hants, England. The town of Hampton, N. H., was so named at his request. Rev. Stephen lived in Holland a number of years, and sailed from Loudon to Boston, Mass., in 1682, and went directly to Lynn, where he planted the first church. His daughter, Theodate, wife of Christopher Hussey, also lived at that place. He lived at Lynn until 1686, and went from there to Newbury, Mass., and from there to Hampton, in 1688, and then to Portsmouth, about 1647; lived there until 1650, and went back to England about 1655, and died at Hackney (now London), in 1660, in his one hundredth year. His third wife, Mary —, whom he married in 1650, was a bad investment, and he could not live with her. She was a widow, whose real character he did not understand. This third wife, Mary, petitioned court for a divorce soon after, upon the ground that he had married a fourth wife, which there is no evidence of whatever, as he was ninety-four or ninety-five years of age when he went back. His son Nathaniel had three wives and seventeen children; was a man of prominence for many years; in fact, he held a leading position until his death, in 1710. The woman whom Mr. Bachelor was justified in leaving was soon convicted of immorality that brought a sentence of thirty lashes and marking her with the letter A.

There were at least six Bachelors who settled in Loudon, and with families, and were descendants of the Rev. Stephen Bachelor, of England.—1st, Josiah, born in January, 1767, who was son of Deacon David, of Hampton Falls; Deacon David was son of Josiah, of Hampton Falls; Josiah was son of Nathaniel, Jr., of Hampton; Nathaniel, Jr., was son of Nathaniel, Sr., of Hampton; and Nathaniel, Sr., was a grandson of the Rev. Stephen Bachelor.

¹The name Bachelor was changed to Bachebber in spelling it by all the descendants of the Rev. Stephen, who settled and have since lived in Loudon.

MAJOR NATHAN BACHELDER was born October 25, 1734, and was son of Deacon Ebenezer, of East Kingston. Deacon Ebenezer was son of Deacon Nathaniel, Jr., of Hampton. Nathaniel, Jr., was son of Nathaniel, Sr., the grandson of Rev. Stephen Bachlor. Major Nathan was a brother to Richard. Richard was born October 5, 1736. Nathaniel, brother to Major Nathan, was born February 21, 1740. Abraham and Jethro were sons of Jethro, Sr.; Jethro was the son of Nathaniel, Jr., who was the son of Nathaniel, Sr., who was grandson of the Rev. Stephen Bachlor. Abraham and Jethro were cousins of Major Nathan, Richard and Nathaniel. Major Nathan settled at London Ridge, N. H., where are living some of the descendants of this line. After the Major came to London he took the name of Esquire Nathan in all the business matters of the town. The descendants of the Bachelders who reside in London are noted for being good citizens, are public-spirited, firm in their principles and honest in their purposes and aims.

ABRAHAM BACHELDER, Esq., and Jethro, his brother, came to London (then Canterbury) near the year 1760, as Abraham Bachelder was chosen as constable in 1765 in the town of Canterbury.

Abraham Bachelder, Esq., was a man of large business capacity; was a surveyor of land and was engaged in laying out the town of London in lots. Also, he served as one of the selectmen of the town, and laid out and made the return of a large number of the highways. Abraham Bachelder settled on land near the White School-house, he having, while traveling in the locality and looking for meadow-land with his son Abraham, Jr., found the swell of land bordering upon the pond, covered with a most beautiful growth of birch, oak and white ash, and, at the earnest request of his son, concluded to settle at this place. They built a log house just north of the one upon the Ira Osgood farm, and the land in the southeasterly direction towards the school-house, was the first cleared. Afterwards Abraham, Jr., built the northeasterly half of the old red Bachelder mansion, as it now stands.

This lot of land was called a pitched lot, and contained one hundred acres. It was afterwards divided by the highway leading to Gilmanton, and that part lying westerly of said road passed into the ownership of another person. The irregularity of the line of the boundary of some of the adjoining lots is caused by the pitching of the owner. Several other lots were pitched upon in the same manner. During the first years of clearing the land many privations had to be endured. In the first year they were short of food for bread, and Mr. Bachelder was obliged to cut some of his rye before it was ripe, dry it as much as possible, and carry it upon his shoulder to Canterbury for grinding, a distance of several miles. The corn raised and used for bread was pounded in a wooden mortar into meal. This same mortar is still in existence, and consists of a maple log about two feet long, with the bark still on, standing upon one end, while in the other is a cavity, made by burning out the wood by fire, in which corn or salt was placed and pounded with a wooden pestle. The mortar may be seen by examining the attic of the old mansion.

JETHRO BACHELDER located at the village then known as Bachelder Mills. He was a large land-owner, the proprietors giving him four hundred acres as an inducement for him to build mills upon the privilege at that place. The land given embraced that tract now owned by Joseph P. Bachelder, and also the Cate farm. Mr. Bachelder built the first house at the village, and it is known as the Captain P. Robinson house. He was the ancestor of the race of Bachelders at the south part of the town, and Abraham was that of the line living at the Centre. The line of descent from Abraham was Abraham Bachelder, Jr., born in 1744. His wife, Anna Judkins, was born in 1750, married in 1772. Their children are Nathan Bachelder, born in 1773; Abraham and Josiah Bachelder (twins), born in 1775; Hannah Bachelder, born in 1776; Josiah Bachelder (2d), born in 1779; Philip Bachelder, born in 1781; James Bachelder, born in 1783; John Bachelder, born in 1785; Sally Bachelder; Jonathan Bachelder, born in 1790; Judith Bachelder.

JONATHAN BACHELDER married Lois Wells and had a family of twelve children.—Abraham, Mary Ann, Stephen W., True, William T., Nathan, Nancy G., Sarah S., Hannah E., H. John, John (2d) and Benjamin.

Benjamin Bachelder married Mary E. Bachelder, of Meredith, N. H., and has a family of two children, named Martha E. and John. He resides upon the farm and occupies the original house in part that was built by Abraham Bachelder, Esq., his great-great-grandfather. He has held the office of postmaster at London Centre, N. H., for a number of years.

CYRUS BACHELDER, who was the son of James, brother of Jonathan, lived in London, and had two children, named James K. P. and Georgia, who married the Rev. Warren Applebee. Mr. Bachelder has been elected to the office of selectman, has held that of town treasurer and has represented the town in the Legislature.

JETHRO BACHELDER was born in 1723, married Abigail Lovering and had a family of eight children, named William, Abram, Jethro, Daniel, Libby, Nathaniel, Jacob and Aaron.

Mr. Bachelder was at one time the largest tax-payer in the town, but from some reason lost and consumed his property, until he was in his old age provided for by his children, who built a small house upon the hill near Mr. Abram Bachelder's, where he died, and was buried in the old village burying-ground.

LIBBY BACHELDER and Esquire Nathaniel lived in London and had large families, and were men of note in their day.

CAPTAIN ABRAHAM married Betsy Bachelder. She was born in 1759, and they had a family of eleven children, named Smith, born 1785; Zephaniah, born 1786; Olive, born 1788; Nathaniel, born 1790; Gardner, born 1792; Betsy, born 1793; Asa, born 1795; Lois, born 1797; Enoch W., born 1798; Joseph, born 1800; and Clarisa, born 1802.

GARDNER BACHELDER married, first, Clarisa Bradley, and, second, Nancy Young, and had a family of sixteen children, named Nathaniel S., Emory B., Judith, Stephen, William, Abby, Henry F., William, Winthrop, Abram and other infant children.

HENRY F. BACHELDER married Lydia S. Rogers, and has three children, named Marion, Emma and Hellen. Marion married Fred. Lawrence and has one son, named Henry B. Emma married Frank E. Robinson. Hellen died in 1883. Henry F. Bachelder has been a trader in groceries and dry-goods for a large number of years and has acquired a good property. He has held the office of postmaster at Loudon for twenty-four years. His life has been marked in his dealings with others by integrity and uprightness, and he is a respected citizen of his town. His business is now carried on under the firm-name of Bachelder & Robinson, and they are extensively engaged, in addition to their trade, in lumber business, and at present are the largest business firm in the town.

ABRAM BACHELDER married — Whitney, of Canterbury, and they have one child, named Ivy.

ASA BACHELDER, brother of Zephaniah, married, in 1795, Rachel True, and had a family of seven children, named Augustine, Abram, Roscoe G., Ancie and three others, who died in infancy.

ANCE BACHELDER married Joseph Wiggin, and had two children, named Nattie and Gertrude. Mr. Wiggin married, first, Eliza Walker, daughter of Ruel Walker, and had four children, named Eddie, Willie, Gertrude and —. Mr. Wiggin commenced the business of a tanner when a young man with Mr. Walker, and afterwards married his daughter. He soon became the owner and has since carried on an extensive business, and is a prominent and valuable citizen.

ASA C. BACHELDER, son of Abraham G., married Jennie Badger and has a family of five children, named Edwin, Emory, Kate, Genette and Lillian.

NATHAN BACHELDER married Margaret Bean, April 8, 1756, and had a family of seven children, named Richard, born December 8, 1756; Phineas, born November 16, 1760; William, born March 19, 1762; Joseph, born January 2, 1764; Ebenezer, born October 2, 1769; Dolly, born February 13, 1772; Josiah, born January 24, 1775. Esquire Nathan settled at Loudon Ridge.

WILLIAM BACHELDER, son of Richard and grandson of Esquire Nathan, married Mary Sargent, of Canterbury, N. H., and had a family of six children, named Mary E., Jeremiah, Nettie P., William N., Sarah A. and Park B.

NATHANIEL BACHELDER had the following children: Betty, born February 10, 1783; Sally and Fanny (twins), born November 23, 1784; True, born July 20, 1794.

WILLIAM BACHELDER had the following children: James, born March 18, 1784; John, born July 25, 1786; William, Jr., born May 28, 1791; Hazen, born April 16, 1793. (See Biographical Department for Joseph Batchelder).

MOSES LOVERING came from Exeter, N. H., and settled in Loudon in 1787. He married Nellie Taylor, of Exeter, and had a family of thirteen children, named Willabee, Nellie, Osgood, Taylor, Nancy, Moses, Jesse, Mary, Zebulon, John, Daniel, William and Sarah, all of whom lived till from forty-five to ninety years of age, and were married and raised families of children. He came with nine children on horseback, and drove one cow, upon which depended the sustenance of the family in a large degree. The country through which he had to travel, when near Loudon, was a wilderness, and the settlers in those towns below furnished him aid in getting through. He moved into a log house between the dwelling of S. B. Lovering and the highway near the saw-mill. Zebulon had a family of eleven children; nine of them lived, and were named, Samuel B., True, Almira, Annis J., Sarah B., Louisa, Laura L., Abigail and Alonzo B.

SAMUEL B. LOVERING married three times and had a family of ten children, named Nancy A., James B., Harlan P., Abigail M., Clara A., Frank O., Clara A. (2d), Frank O. (2d) and Edward E.

The Lovering families settled the adjoining land, and owned at one time nearly five hundred acres. Samuel B. Lovering married, first, Mary S. Rogers; second, Lucy Grace; third, Lavina Hoyt. He owns and has run a saw-mill for fifty years, besides being a thrifty farmer. He has represented the town in the Legislature in the years 1866-67, and been a justice of the peace for forty years.

ELIPHALET WOOD married Elizabeth Tilton in 1788. Their children were named Eliphalet, Betsey, William, Sophia, Harry, Mary, Jonathan and Julia. The Rev. Harry Wood was a minister of the gospel and editor of the Congregational Journal at Concord, N. H. During the administration of President Pierce he received an appointment as minister to one of the eastern countries.

ENOCH WOOD, brother of Eliphalet, was a trader at the old Wood place, near the Dr. Tenney corner. He was a fine penman, and was chosen to the office of selectman and clerk for several years. The records of the town, while kept by him, present a handwriting that is very plain and distinct.

SAMUEL MOORE was born in Canterbury, and had two wives and a family of ten children, among whom was Thomas, who was born in Canterbury, and married Comfort Perkins, and had a family of nine children, named Polly, Samuel, Joanna, Alexander, Samuel, Sophronia, Comfort, Thomas and Myra. DR. WILLIAM TENNEY came to Loudon in the year 1793, and married Abigail Rollins; married, the second time, Peggy Flanders, and had four children, named Abigail, Richard P. J., William D. B. and Joseph J. M. Dr. William Tenney practiced medicine for a long time in town, and at his decease Richard P. J., having studied medicine, commenced his practice in his father's place, and continued until the year 1846, when he located at the enterprising village of Pittsfield, N. H. He had a large practice and was extensively known as a physician. After his removal he was chosen as a member of the Governor's Council, and filled other places of honor and trust, and died at Pittsfield in 1879. He married Hannah A. Sanborn, and had one daughter, named Abby.

J. J. M. TENNEY, after having spent some years in travel, settled upon the Tenney homestead and devoted the last of his life to agriculture, and died in 1876.

MOSES ROWELL, SR., was the son of Christopher Rowell, of Amesbury, Mass., and was born June 11, 1764. He married Alice Currier, of Amesbury, and moved to Loudon in 1791, and located upon Bear Hill (so called), where he died November 4, 1846. He married, the second time, Nancy Leavitt, of Chichester, N. H., and had a family of ten children, named Captain John, Moses, Jr., Nancy, Micajah, Ruth, Asa T., Harris, Cyrus, Rufus and Sally L. Mr. Rowell was engaged for some length of time in teaming from Newburyport, Mass., to Salisbury, N. H.

MOSES ROWELL, JR., was born March 21, 1793, and married Sophia French, daughter of John Leavitt French, of Loudon, and had three children, named Perley W., John F. and Sarah Ann.

PERLEY W. ROWELL was born December 22, 1823, and married Caroline Clark, of Pittsfield, N. H., March 28, 1869, and have a family of two children, named Sarah W. and George W. Mr. Rowell lives upon the homestead of his father, and is a useful and highly-respected citizen of his native town.

JOHN F. ROWELL was born January 6, 1826, and is unmarried. He commenced his education at the common school in London, and afterwards attended at Weare, Lee and Pembroke, N. H., and graduated at Haverford College, Pennsylvania. He was eminently fitted for a teacher, which avocation he successfully followed for many years in his immediate locality. Afterwards he was called to the Friends' School in Providence, R. I., and remained for twenty years. In 1875 he retired from this school, and, wearied with the duties of a teacher's life, went to California, and is extensively engaged in agriculture, together with the manufacture and sale of lumber, of which he has purchased a large and valuable tract. He is an enterprising and deserving man, and has, by his own efforts largely, acquired the position which he has so ably filled. The Rowell family are noted for intellect, ability and great firmness of principle, and are citizens who are interested and active in everything that advances and elevates the human race.

NATHANIEL MARTIN, Esq., came to London and was first taxed in 1808. He was twice married and had a family of nine children, named Rue, Jane, Elizabeth and Hannah (twins), Mary, Abigail, Nancy, Sally and Theophilus B. Esquire Martin was engaged often in town business, and was an important and useful man of the day in which he lived. His name appears often upon the town records as having been chosen to discharge some public duty, which was carefully and satisfactorily performed.

THEOPHILUS B. MARTIN, Esq., married Sally L. Rowell, and had a family of four children, named Nathaniel (who died), Mary E., Abby and Nathaniel E. But few men have ever lived in town who have been so frequently chosen to positions of trust as Esquire Martin. He has represented the town in the Legislature, and been chosen as county treasurer, besides performing a large amount of probate and private business as a justice of the peace. He early engaged in the calling of a school-teacher, and continued in it until the middle age of life with success. He was a member of the church, and was deeply interested in all matters pertaining to the welfare and best interest of the public. He moved with his family to Concord, N. H., where he died.

NATHANIEL E. MARTIN, his son, obtained his education at the Concord High School, and afterwards studied law with William E. Chase, Esq., after which he opened an office in Concord, and is now connected with the firm of Abin, Tappan & Martin. That success has attended his efforts which is always the reward of labor and diligence in every calling in life.

The Cate Family in London descended from STEPHEN CATE, who came from Deerfield, N. H., in 1784. He had seven children, named Shadrach, born August 10, 1779; Charles, born January 2, 1781; John, born March 29, 1783; Stephen and Jonathan (twins), born March 3, 1785; Sally, born April 1, 1787; Meshach, born July 6, 1789.

STEPHEN CATE settled upon the farm now owned by William W. Cate, where he built a log house for himself and family of two children, the eldest being two and one-half years and the youngest but eighteen months old. He rode from Deerfield, N. H., on horseback with his wife, each carrying one of the children in their arms as they rode upon the same horse. The following year Mrs. Cate, whose name was Anna, gave birth to the twins, Stephen and Jonathan, whose weight at birth was twenty-two pounds, who lived and grew to very large and strong men, looking so nearly alike as hardly to be distinguished from each other. Three of these boys settled in London,—Shadrach, John and Stephen.

SHADRACH CATE had a family of eleven children, of whom eight lived, named, Hiram and Hannah (twins), Rebecca, Eliza, Sally, Judith, Shadrach and Moses. He married Rebecca Chamberlin, an intelligent and estimable woman. Of this family, Shadrach studied medicine and is a skillful practitioner as well as a gentleman of influence and culture, in the city of Washington, D. C.

JOHN CATE settled upon the home farm; married and had a family of four children; the eldest died at birth. The others were named Nancy, Miles and Benjamin. At the birth of Nancy Cate, John, her father, planted an elm-tree, which has been growing seventy six years and measures seventeen feet in circumference at the base.

BENJAMIN CATE was born March 23, 1814, and married Eliza A. Wells, daughter of Stephen Wells, of London, and has two sons, named William W. and Carter E. Cate.

He was a man of large ability and when a young man was often given places of trust. His public life and influence were extensive, and he became one of the leading men of the town in which he resided. He was chosen to various town offices and represented the same in the Legislature. He was a man of genial turn and manner to every one, and his assistance and counsel were sought and obtained by his neighbors and friends in time of need. He was every man's friend. His life was noted for the integrity and uprightness of character which he ever maintained. His religious principles were firm and deeply fixed, from which there spread an influence that shaped and guided the thoughts and acts of those with whom he associated.

WILLIAM W. CATE lives upon the homestead of his father, and he is of the fourth generation of the Cate family. His early life was largely devoted to the cause of education, and he engaged in school-teaching to quite an extent, his efforts being attended with good success. After the death of his father he engaged in agriculture, and sustains a high and influential position as such among the citizens of his native town.

He has been elected to, and discharged the duties of, several offices in town with care and fidelity. His advice and assistance are largely sought in matters of probate, and he is a man of strong influence in private and public business. His religious principles are strongly fixed, and his life thus far well marked by exemplary conduct and sincerity of purpose.

CARTER E. CATE was born August 26, 1852. He fitted for college at Tilton, N. H., and entered the Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn., in 1872. After two years he went to Dartmouth College, New Hampshire, where he graduated in 1876. He afterwards attended the Boston University, and in June, 1878, was ordained as a minister of the gospel by the Free-Will Baptist denomination, at Loudon, N. H., where he engaged as pastor and remained one year. During his stay with this, his own church and native town, an unusual and deep-felt interest was manifest throughout the whole town in attending divine worship upon the Sabbath, such as had not been experienced for a generation. His preaching was marked with great simplicity and sincerity, which held the mind and attention of his audience from the beginning to the end of his discourse. He engaged at Lake Village, N. H., afterwards, and remained three years; then went to Lowell, Mass., and remained one year; then married Electa Dunavan, and moved to Lewiston, Me.

Mr. Cate inherits from the Cate family the characteristics which are so noticeable in the biography of the family. He is pleasant and affable in appearance, firm in his principles, deeply imbued with respect for Christianity and all its ennobling and elevating principles.

His success in life has been most excellent, and a brilliant future seems to await him in the choice of the great calling that he has engaged in as a life-work.

The Stevens Family.—MOSES STEVENS, SR.'S, family of six children were named Joseph, Jonathan C., Elizabeth, Hannah, Eliza and Andrew.

ANDREW STEVENS married Lucinda Sargent, and had a family of three children, named Moses E., John and Hannah.

MOSES E. STEVENS married Nettie P. Bachelder, daughter of William Bachelder, and has a family of two children, named Winnie M. and William G.

Mr. Stevens is the last representative of the large Stevens family in Loudon and possesses the strong characteristics which have made them so useful as citizens in the town. He is a man of ability and influence, and has held positions of trust conferred upon him by the citizens of the town.

The Ordway Family in Loudon descended from Abner and James Ordway, who came from Tower Hill, in England, to Newbury, Mass., about 1640. Abner settled in Watertown, Mass., and James in Dover, N. H. Abner married, August 15, 1656, Sarah, daughter of Stephen Brown, of Newbury, Mass., she being the widow of Edward Dennis, of Boston, Mass.

No descendants of Abner are found. James married, November 23, 1648, Ann Emery, whose father came from England some years before, and had a family of ten children, named Ephraim, James, Edward, Sarah, John, Isaac, Jane, Hannaniah, Annie and Mary, which were the second generation. The third generation descended from John, son of James. The fourth from James, son of John, whose children were Moses and James.

MOSES ORDWAY was one of the first settlers in the town, and married Anna Huntington. He was born in Amesbury, Mass., April 11, 1721. His wife was born March 16, 1716, and they settled near the Yellow School-house, where some of their descendants have resided from that time. One of the attractions to this locality were the meadows in the immediate vicinity, from which they cut hay for their cattle. Moses, Jr., married his cousin Persis, the sister of Moses, and had eight children, named Persis, born June 1, 1776; Moses (3d), born January 1, 1779; Betsey, born March 1, 1781; Stephen, born August 24, 1784; Betsey (2d), born March 12, 1787; Amos, born January 15, 1790; Aaron, born February 15, 1792; Hammond, born June 10, 1795.

DANIEL AND JESSES ORDWAY were descendants of James. Daniel Ordway married, first time, Deborah Lougee, and came from Andover, Mass., where he had two children born,—Daniel, born September 2, 1773; and Isaac, born February 6, 1775. There were born at Loudon,—Lemuel, October 12, 1776; Absc, born November 12, 1778; Isaac (2d), born December 25, 1780; Hazen, born April 15, 1783; Polly, born May 21, 1785. He married, the second time, Ruth Moulton, and had Hiram, Chlora, Statira, Eneas, Justus, Jairus and Ruth Ann, making a family of fourteen in all.

JOSSES ORDWAY, brother of Daniel, had a family of seven children,—Lucy, born January 1, 1795; Lois, born October 1, 1796; Sophia, born January 1, 1799; Abial, born May 3, 1800; John C., born November 3, 1801; Sukey, born February 21, 1803; Harriett, born April 10, 1808.

ABIAL ORDWAY married Clarissa French, and had four children,—Martha S., Abial C., John F. and Mary J.

JOHN F. ORDWAY married Georgianna, the only daughter of Samuel Huckins, of Loudon, and had a family of four children, named Della P., Ettie L., Lillian M. and Cora F.

HIRAM ORDWAY married Sally Blaisdell, and had one child, named Myra E., who married Joseph W. Blaisdell.

Captain Hiram Ordway was an important and respected citizen of his town. He was a carpenter by trade, which avocation he followed for several years. He held important offices in the town and was elected to the Legislature. He was of a most genial and quiet disposition, and his influence was large in his native town, in religious as well as in public matters.

JOSEPH C. ORDWAY married Martha S. Ordway and had a family of seven children,—Nellie, Grace, Walter, Henry, Georgianna, Lilla and one infant that died.

JOEL S. ORDWAY married M. Jane Wiggins. He resides upon the farm of his father, Lemuel Ordway, and has one child, named Horace F.

Daniel and Joses Ordway were soldiers of the Revolutionary War. Joses served in Captain John Abbott's company, in Major Gage's regiment, and Daniel in the foot company raised in Methuen and Andover, Mass. After the war they came to Loudon, and settled with their cousin, Moses Ordway.

STEPHEN ORDWAY married Rachel Clifford, and had three children, named Mary, Joseph C. and Benjamin (twins).

JOHN CASSEY ORDWAY was the son of Moses Ordway (5d), and married Ruth Sanborn. He had three children, named Eliza, Augusta A. and Benjamin F. Ordway.

The trials and suffering of the first of the Ordway settlers were the same as those of others. Upon one occasion Mr. Moses Ordway, Jr., went to Amesbury, Mass., and brought home one bushel of corn upon his back, it being a year when the crops were cut off by frost, and his family subsisted upon the ground-nut while he was gone. A glass bottle of curious device was brought from England by one of the two brothers that first came, and bequeathed to one Moses, upon the condition that it remain in the family of some descendant whose name was Moses throughout all succeeding years. Moses Ordway, the third, was the last Moses, and it is now in the possession of John C., whose father was the last.

The number of children in some of the families who have lived in Loudon is here given, with their names:

Moses Rollins had a family of eleven, named Samuel, Anna, Thomas, Moses, William, Eliza, Sarah, Abigail, Jonathan, John and Dorothy.

Deacon Samuel Sleeper had a family of fourteen, named Hannah, Susannah, Elizabeth, Molly, Molly (2d), Anna, Stephen, Samuel, Chase, Gilman, Sarah, Sarah (2d), Mahala and Abigail.

Timothy Gleason had a family of ten, named John, Edmund, Polly, Timothy, Sophia, Moses, Nancy, Charlotte, Jeremiah and Warren.

Timothy French had a family of seven, named Betty, Joshua, Betty (2d), Mary, Timothy, Rachel and Joanna.

Enoch Osgood had a family of eleven, named Sally, Molly, Nabby, Deborah, Elanor, Josiah, Dolly, Nancy, Samuel, Charissa and Betsey.

Zebulon Winslow had a family of eleven,—Moses, George, David, Sleeper, Elizabeth, Lucy, Mary, Zebulon, Charissa, Almira and Ann.

Thomas Proctor had a family of eleven, named Lydia, Fanny, Sally, Thomas, Rebecca, Peter, Joseph, William, James, Benjamin and Priscilla.

Nathaniel Maxfield had a family of twelve, named Betsey, Stephen, Eliphalet, Mehetable, Ruth, Nathaniel, James, Joseph, Nathan, Elie, Hannah and Samuel.

Isaac Dimond had a family of ten, named Isaac, Betsey, Isaac (2d), Sally, Polly, John, Abigail, Andrew, Gould and Ruth.

Samuel Drew had a family of nine, named Hitty, Joseph, Judith, John, Stephen, Samuel, Sally, Nathan and Altazera.

Caleb Pillsbury had a family of nine, named Nathan, Ruth, Sarah, Judith, Elizabeth, Mary, Caleb, Benjamin and Martha.

Thomas Sargent had a family of nine, named Dolly, Charles, Thomas, Josiah, Sarah, Susannah, Timothy, David and John.

Philip Brown had a family of nine, named Thomas, William, David, Joanna, Levi, Philip, Jr., Timothy, Asa and Eliphalet.

Samuel Piper had a family of nine, named Jonathan, Benjamin, Sally, Jane, Betsey, Samuel, David, Elisha and Enoch.

Jeremiah Bennett had a family of nine, named William, Betsey, Elsa, Sally, Rachel, Jeremiah, Leavitt, Mary and Amos.

Dimond Furnald had a family of fifteen, named Sarah, Polly, Nabby, Thomas, David, Robert, Josiah, Comfort, Rachel, Eunice, Susa, John, Dimond, Chase and Charlotte.

The change of the name and absence of many of the old residents is a very noticeable fact in the history of the town. The large families of the name of French, Wood, Rollins, Tucker, Martin, Clifford, Furnald, Moulton, Hutchins, Proctor, Lowell, Gleason, Holt, Fenney, Sweatt and Mathes, none are living in town; and instances might be mentioned among some of them where there is no heir to their honored and respected names. Others of equal importance, such as Buswell, Sleeper, Morrill, Dimond, Stevens and Young, have but one left in each family to perpetuate the name. The interest which these families manifested, and the labor performed by them, both in establishing and providing for their descendants a government political and religious, as well as educational, which might be perpetuated to all succeeding generations, was worth enduring the toil and hardship through which they lived and labored.

Stephen Weeks

Franklin Blair

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

DEACON STEPHEN WEEKS.

Deacon Stephen Weeks was the son of Stephen and Betsey (Weed) Weeks, of Gilmanton, N. H. and came to London near 1843. He married, first, Mary A. Stevens, who died in a short time after her marriage. Mr. Weeks married, the second time, Elizabeth W. Haines, of Canterbury, who was an intelligent and accomplished woman. The second marriage of Deacon Weeks resulted in a family of six children, named Adaline, William H., Martha, Abby, Mary J. and Dora V.

Deacon Weeks, during his early life, taught several terms of school during the winter, while in other seasons of the year he bought and sold cattle. Afterwards he bought a farm and gave his attention to farming as a pursuit. Having been successful in this calling, several years ago he purchased the farm upon which his family reside, refitted the buildings and prepared it for his permanent home. During his residence of about forty years in the town he succeeded in laying up property amounting to over twenty thousand dollars by diligence, labor and economy. He regarded the interest of the town as a citizen, and gave his influence always in that direction which he considered as right and just. He was liberal in his charity to others, whenever called upon for aid and assistance, often bestowing without invitation whenever and wherever his feelings prompted, and never was known to turn one away empty. His advice was safe and well matured whenever applied for. He was of a deep religious cast of mind, a member of the Free Baptist Church and for many years was one of its deacons. His interest in his church was large and sincere, for which he labored ardently and constantly, being one of the large and ready supporters of the gospel in all its wants. He was a constant attendant, with his family, upon public worship and the Sabbath-school. His last acts in life were of beneficence. He died in January, 1885, a worthy and esteemed citizen of the town, and will be cherished in the memory of many for the good which he has accomplished.

REV. JEREMIAH CLOUGH.

Rev. Jeremiah Clough was born in London, N. H., February 3, 1792, and was the eldest of the five children of Jonathan and Betsey Clough. His grandfather, Jonathan Clough, Sr., moved from Salisbury, Mass., to London about the year 1771, with five children, and located on that tract which has been known as "Clough's Hill,"—then a wilderness. He was born in 1724, and married Elizabeth Thompson in 1756. His children were named Joseph, Nathan, Sarah, Jonathan, Jr., and Love. Mr. Jonathan Clough, Sr., was a man of large business capacity, and was chosen clerk of the parish for seventeen years and selectman for four years. He was a blacksmith by trade, working both iron and steel. He married three times, but had no children that lived by either of the last two marriages. Jonathan Clough, Jr., married Betsy Clough, of Epping, N. H., and had five children, named Jeremiah, Joseph and Benjamin (twins), Jonathan and Sally.

Rev. Jeremiah Clough married Sabrina Clough, daughter of Leavitt Clough, of Canterbury, in 1813, by whom he had a family of eight children. Six of them died in infancy and before maturity. The two youngest were named Jeremiah L. and Charles C. Mr. Clough married, the second time, Deliverance Hodgdon, of Northfield, N. H., September 19, 1819. They had one daughter, named Christiana, who is the only living representative of the nine children born to the Rev. Mr. Clough. After his first marriage he moved to Canterbury, with his wife's father, and was, for several years, a large and successful farmer. He acquired a large property, and was an industrious and robust man. He was early taught to labor, and during his whole life was industrious and economical in all his purposes.

In 1819 he professed religion, and was licensed as a preacher of the gospel in 1835. He was ordained in 1838, and preached as an evangelist, for ten years, the doctrine of the Free-Will Baptist denomination. He was chosen pastor of his own church in Canterbury in 1848, and continued in this relation until the year 1872, when he suffered a partial shock of paralysis, and retired from the active labors of the ministry. During his labors with this church a large number were added to it, and it became one of the strongest in the Quarterly Meeting. In the mean time a new and commodious church edifice was erected, to which Mr. Clough was a large contributor. It was dedicated about the year 1853, Rev. Mr. Clough preaching the ordination sermon. He was a most devout man, and his life-work was full of success as a gospel minister. He was a man of great natural ability, and possessed fully the characteristics required in a man of so strong purposes. He was widely known as an humble and Christian man devoid of all ostentation and display. His Christian life was above reproach, while he had the most profound reverence for the house of God and all its ordinances, making his worship at all times spiritual and full of devotion. He was full of Christian charity, zeal and unending love for his church in Canterbury; for Christian ministers, making large donations to destitute churches, aiding in building houses of worship; the cause of education and missions; and was always a true friend of the destitute and needy. His word was never doubted or his veracity questioned.

He was a man of large social qualities, possessing true affability of manners, which made his home social, agreeable and always pleasant to his family, and full of hospitality to friends and strangers. The words of advice and counsel which fell from his venerable lips were wise, safe and full of consolation, especially in times of affliction and trouble. His services were largely sought in affliction by death of friends, to which his words were as "healing balm." He always refused remuneration for all religious service throughout his entire life.

His family trials were severe in the loss of his children, but were borne with Christian fortitude. One of the greatest questions of his life was to decide whether to devote his life-work to the ministry or not. This he decided upon his knees in the pasture, beneath a tree, which still lives, and spreads its few branches over the monument of stones which he erected, as a seal of the vow of consecration which he made to his God more than fifty years since. His last act of baptism was performed at the age of eighty-two years. The Rev. Jeremiah Clough received the honors of his town by being chosen to office and representing it in the Legislature. About twenty-five years since he moved from Canterbury to his native town of London, where he died at the advanced age of eighty-seven years.

His photograph, from which this portrait is made, was taken at the age of eighty-four years.

Jeremiah L. Clough married Clara Clough, daughter of the Hon. Joseph Clough, of London, and had two children, named Lucy S. and Jeremiah J.

Charles C. Clough married Mary E. Osgood, daughter of Ira Osgood, Esq., of London, and had one child, named Charla E., who lives at the old Clough homestead in Canterbury. Charles C. Clough died in July, 1861, a noble and highly-esteemed citizen and Christian man. His widow married, the second time, the Rev. A. D. Smith, of Laconia, who succeeds the Rev. J. Clough in the ministry at Canterbury.

JOSEPH BACHELDER.

Joseph Bachelder was the son of Captain Abraham Bachelder (3), and was born in London in 1800. He is the descendant of Jethro, and is in the direct line from the Rev. Stephen Bachelder, from England. He married Hannah H. Hill, by whom he had a family of six children,—John Q. A., born March 10, 1826; Otis H., born January, 1828, died November 17, 1859; Charissa, born January 6, 1830; Joseph P., born October 21, 1835; Elvira A., born June 4, 1839; Roseltha, born April 17, 1845, died September 20, 1860.

John Q. A. married Eliza J. Sanborn, daughter of Edmund Sanborn; has lived in Massachusetts since twenty-five years of age; has no children.

Otis H. married Maria Howard, of Lawrence, Mass., where he was in trade until his death, and left no children.

Charissa married Cyrus T. Bachelder, and resides in Peabody, Mass., and is engaged in trade.

Joseph P. married Elvira A. Whitney, of Canterbury, and had one child, named Alfred P.

Mr. Bachelder married, the second time, Abby J. Demeritt. Mr. Bachelder resides upon the homestead and occupies the pleasant mansion of his father. He is a most thorough and practical farmer and an honored and respected citizen of the town. His son, Alfred P., married Nellie M. Brown, of Canterbury, and has one child, named Ernest L., which constitutes the sixth generation of Bachelders that have been born in this Bachelder mansion and have lived in the same, beginning with Jethro.

Joseph Bachelder died in London March 29, 1877. He was an able, upright and a respected citizen of the town, and was always interested deeply in the cause of education, the progress of science and religion. He, with his wife, were members of the Congregational Church at the village in London for many years. He was an excellent and practical farmer, having one of the finest situations in the town, upon which he has made extensive improvements. He was firm and decided in his opinions, and unyielding in the principles which he believed to be right. He did not interest himself in political matters to any extent, and was never elected to any of the ordinary offices of the town. He was successful in the acquisition of property, and at his death possessed a large and valuable estate. A relic is retained in possession of the family, which is the wig worn by Jethro, Sr., who was a bald-headed man. An interesting incident is related at his birth, which is, that while going for the necessary assistance in the case, to a neighbor's, the person, in crossing a brook, caught by an elm tree for support, which uprooted and was transplanted afterward near the residence, and which measured, in July, 1885, seventeen feet in circumference. In the year 1800 a bear was killed, which had two young cubs. The oil was taken from the old one. Some of it was sealed up in a small bottle, some of which was shown the writer in 1885, it being eighty-five years old. One of the cubs was killed with its mother; the other was taken to the breast of a woman who had lost a new-born babe.

Mr. Bachelder, upon the fiftieth anniversary of his marriage, was presented, by his connection and friends, with a valuable gold-headed cane, which is kept in the family and highly prized.

SAMUEL B. LOVERING.

The first of the Lovering family of whom we have any authentic record was Moses Lovering, of Exeter, N. H. He married Nelly Taylor, of Exeter, by whom he had a family of thirteen children,—nine boys and four girls, viz.: Willerby, Nelly, Osgood, Taylor, Nancy, Moses, Jesse, Mary, Zebulon, John, Daniel, William and Sarah. Of these, the first eleven were born in Exeter, the latter two in Loudon. One remarkable fact in a family so large was that they all lived to be from forty to ninety years of age. They were all married and had families; two of them, Moses and William, were twice married; Mary was the first who died (about 1815), and William died in Springfield (1865).

In the year 1787, Moses Lovering, with his family, left Exeter to make his home in the then sparsely-settled region now the populous and thrifty town of Loudon. Their household goods were brought in an ox-team, while the ladies rode on horseback about fifty miles along a forest pathway over the hills to their future home, a hundred-acre lot on the site of Mr. S. B. Lovering's present abode. There was a primitive affair dignified by the title of a mill on the place, in which, by diligence and patience, they could grind a bushel or so of corn. There were none of the comforts, or what would be considered at the present day the necessities, of civilized life, surrounding them in their frontier home; but with the resolute will which characterized the grand old pioneers of our American civilization, they went earnestly and happily to work and soon converted the forest-clad hills into smiling fields teeming with cereal productions, and gradually gathered around them property and conveniences. They from time to time added to the original hundred acres till they possessed a landed estate of over five hundred acres. The boys were ingenious as well as industrious; all of them could skillfully handle carpenter's tools, and possessed the various requisite qualities and accomplishments for successful pioneers.

In course of time all the brothers married and settled in Loudon, and as each one took to himself a companion, the other brothers would all join together and build for the newly-wedded couple a house to live in. In that early day there was no public-school system in vogue, there were no school-houses, and the only tutorship the children of the neighborhood could obtain was when occasionally an itinerant teacher would come into a community and teach for a few months at a private house, when those children who lived near enough and whose parents were able to pay for their tuition were privileged to attend. Moses Lovering, with a family of thirteen children to rear and support, and poor in purse, could not afford to send his children away to school and so they were comparatively uneducated. Some of the boys so far educated themselves as to be able to attend to their business affairs without outside aid in such matters as required record or correspondence, but they all felt severely the need of better education. They were very steadfast in their affection for each other, and each frequently visited the other at their respective homes; and thus the long winter evenings were spent in social converse around the hearth-stones of those huge old fire-places, where roared and crackled the blazing wood-fires of our grandfathers' days.

About 1816, William and Osgood moved to Stewartstown, N. H., Taylor to Canada, Daniel and William to Springfield, N. H. From there Daniel went to the West and died. The others died in Loudon and vicinity. The boys were all Democrats in politics.

Zebulon Lovering, the father of Samuel B., was born in Exeter, N. H., July 15, 1777. He married, January 21, 1807, Abigail Buswell, who was born in Kingston, N. H. (1787). Upon the death of his father, Moses, Zebulon inherited the homestead in Loudon and resided there till the close of his life. They had ten children,—Samuel B. (portrait in this volume); Almira, born September 19, 1811, married Kinsley Mason; Anis J., born February 12, 1814, married George W. Neal; Sarah B., born August 14, 1816, married James McAustria; Louisa, born February 17, 1819, married Aaron B. Young; Laura L., born February 27, 1822, married Rev. Stephen Eastman; Abigail, born August 11, 1824, married Ossi P. Hamblet; and Alonzo B., born April 13, 1827, married Sarah Davis. Zebulon died December 21, 1839; Mrs. Lovering, August 21, 1861.

Samuel B. Lovering, the eldest child of Zebulon, was born April 13, 1808. In his boyhood days the district schools were usually kept about three months in the year. He began attendance at these when about eight years of age, and continued till he was eighteen. After this he took lessons of Master Timothy Glason in writing and arithmetic. He was brought up to work on the farm and at the mill. The year he attained his majority his father died, and the care of his widowed mother and the smaller children devolved upon him. His father left the farm to him upon the decease of his mother. Soon after his father's death he rebuilt the old mill, converting it into a saw-mill, and it has been run as such ever since, sawing lumber, boards, shingles and laths, averaging about one hundred and fifty thousand per year. He has, from time to time, made additions to the real estate he inherited from his father, and now owns about four hundred acres of land. He has been a successful and prosperous farmer. He united with the Methodist Episcopal Church when he was about thirty years of age, and from that time to the present he has been a consistent member. He is fond of music and accomplished as a singer and instrumental performer. He led the choir in his church for twenty years, and in old militia days he played the clarinet at the muster-grounds for fifteen years. He has served his town as selectman and representative to the Legislature. He has been justice of the peace for nearly forty years, and has been in Probate Court business since his first appointment, and has settled many estates and held other positions of trust.

He married, December 18, 1834, Mary S. Rogers, of Northfield; she was born April 22, 1811, and was a lineal descendant of John Rogers, the martyr. Their children were,— Nancy A., born January 31, 1836; married Josiah Young, and lives at Clarksville, N. H.

James B., born March 7, 1838; married Jennie Hamilton, a school-teacher, of Brookline, N. Y. He was for several years manager of the Joseph Dixon Crucible Company, at Jersey City; now lives at Webster, Fla.

Harlen P., born June 12, 1843; married Eliza Wentworth, of Boston; resides at Tampa, Fla.

Abigail M., born May 14, 1845; married Augustus A. Arling, a farmer in Canterbury. He died, and she married George Simmons, of Boston, Mass.

Clara A., born November 18, 1848; died November 5, 1855.

Frank O., born June 1, 1856; died July 7, 1862.

Mrs. Lovering died November 11, 1858.

Mr. Lovering's second wife was Lucy Grace, of Hillsborough, N. H. They were married September 4, 1859. She was born February 10, 1826. Their children were,— Clara A., born July 19, 1860; married Herman W. Mudgett, M.D.; now resides at Moore's Forks, N. Y.

Frank O., born April 2, 1863.

Edwin E., born April 7, 1865. Both the latter are at the old homestead, assisting their father in the conduct of the mill and farm.

Mrs. Lovering died March 17, 1878.

Mr. Lovering married in Concord, N. H., November 11, 1880, his present wife, Lavina Hoyt, of Fisherville (now Pennacook). She was born February 26, 1832. She is the daughter of Deacon Benjamin Hoyt, deacon of the First Baptist Church of Pennacook from its organization till his death, September 6, 1864. Mrs. Lovering has been a member of the same church since her nineteenth year. She for many years taught a class of girls in the Sabbath-school there, and all of them have subsequently united with the church.

Deacon Benjamin Hoyt was noted for his moral integrity and strict piety. He was a successful farmer and a highly-respected citizen of his town. He was descended from John Hoyt, one of the original settlers of Salisbury, Mass. (For a more extended ancestral history of the Hoyt—or Hoitt—family see biography of Thomas L. Hoitt, in this volume.)

Mrs. Lovering's mother was Hannah Eastman, a descendant of Captain Ebenezer Eastman, who in early life followed the seas, and was one of the pioneer settlers of ancient Pennacook (now Concord), N. H. Another of her ancestors was Captain Joseph Eastman, who figured in the French and Indian War. Mrs. Hoyt was a very pious woman, and when her husband, the deacon, was absent from home, attending evening meetings, she would talk and pray with her children, and teach them the importance of God's word; all of them have since become members of the church.

DAVID J. FRENCH.

David J. French was born in Loudon September 2, 1895. He was the great-grandson of Timothy French, who came from Salisbury, Mass., about the year 1773, and settled in the northeast part of Loudon, and was among the first who settled in that locality. At that time there was no road leading from the old Dr. Tenney corner northwesterly to Loudon Ridge, save a sled-path used in the winter season. He cleared the land for his farm, which was a wilderness; built a house and drew the boards from Cram's mill, in Pittsfield, to board it, upon wheels as far as the Tenney corner, and then upon a sled in the month of July to his future residence. His father was Joshua French, who lived upon the farm which has always been occupied in the French name. David J. French lived with his father until about twenty-six years of age, when he married and soon after purchased the farm where he now resides, and commenced for himself and family a farmer's life, about the year 1832, which avocation he has followed to the present time, and at the age of eighty years was found in his field with a scythe in his hand, able to cut and put into his barn one acre of grass a day. He is a man of robust form, and possesses a strong and iron constitution, for which the French family have ever been noted. He has been very successful in acquiring property; commencing with an indebtedness of five hundred dollars, he is now the owner of several tracts of land, besides several thousand dollars in banks and upon loan, which he has earned by hard labor, and not by speculation or intrigue. Mr. French received only a common-school education, but possesses large, native abilities, which, being well cultivated, have enabled him by persistent effort to hew his way successfully through life. As a politician he is a most thorough Republican, always attending the annual meetings of the town and manifesting a great interest in every matter that pertains to the highest and best interest of his native town, and acting at all times in his political life as though conscious of his accountability to a power which is infinite and supreme.

He is a man of strong religious feeling, and has for many years led a life of daily and family prayer. Being retiring in his manner in public religious duties and profession, he has never connected himself with any church, but is a constant attendant upon worship at the house of God whenever practicable. Mrs. French died January 22, 1872. Since her death and that of his son Isaac, Mr. French has lived at the old home alone, patiently waiting the summons that shall call him to meet the loved ones who have gone before.

Dr. Isaac S. French was the only child of David J. French, and died in the year 1878. He married Augusta French and had no family. Dr. French inherited from his father characteristics that were strongly marked in boyhood, and being well cultivated, enabled him to become an eminent and useful man, although young. He was well educated by his father at Gilmanton Academy, and studied medicine with the venerable Dr. Nahum Wight; he attended college at Pittsfield, Mass., and at the medical college at Hanover, N. H., from which he graduated as a physician. He commenced practice in Salisbury, Mass., and remained one year, and then returned to his native town and engaged actively in his profession with success. His business relations were extensive, and he occupied positions of trust. He held the situation of assessor of the internal revenue for the Congressional district in which he resided, under the administration of President Lincoln, besides doing a large local business as a justice of the peace in his own town and surroundings. He acquired, by economy, frugality and labor, in a few years a handsome property, and had well established himself among his townsmen in his calling and profession. He died in the prime of his life and in the midst of his usefulness, having large "honor in his own country."

STEPHEN MOORE.

Stephen Moore is the son of Thomas and Comfort (Perkins) Moore, and grandson of Captain Samuel Moore, who was twice married and had a family of ten children. He was a native of, and resided in Canterbury, where his father was town clerk. He held a commission as captain under King George III, but when the Revolutionary struggle began he resigned his commission, and, casting his fortunes with the colonies, fought during the war on the American side. He died just before independence was established, and his son Thomas, then a lad of fifteen, was bound out to a farmer at old Hampton, but, becoming dissatisfied with his new home, and fired with the martial spirit of the times, he ran away and enlisted in the army, serving about six months.

Captain Samuel was by occupation a farmer and inn-keeper. He kept the hostelry known for many years as the McCrillis tavern, about a mile south of Canterbury Centre.

Thomas Moore was brought up on the farm, to the time of his father's death. In 1785 he first began improving the tract of land, in what is now the town of London, where he subsequently made his home. January 11, 1787, he married Comfort Perkins, and, having previously built a small house on his London land, the young couple at once went there and began house-keeping, and there the remainder of their lives were passed. The part of London in which he located was then an unbroken forest; he was the first settler in that part of the town.

He was, by natural gifts, a bright, intelligent man, but had no educational advantages in his youth. When, in after-years, he had gathered a little property around him, and had a child large enough to receive instruction, he and a neighbor named Wheeler hired a private tutor to come to their homes, who, spending his time alternately between the two houses, taught both parents and children. Thomas Moore was always a friend of education, and when the town began to appropriate money for school purposes, but had as yet no school building, he tendered the use of his dwelling, and the school was kept in summer-time in his barn, and in the winter months in his residence. He was one of the committee who first districted the town for school purposes, and he held various minor offices in the town. Their family consisted of nine children, seven of whom reached maturity, viz.:

Polly, died unmarried.

Samuel, married Charlotte Foster, of Canterbury, and had one child, now Mrs. Kate Rowe, of Rochester, N. Y.

Joanna, died unmarried.

Alexander, married Mary Page, of New Hampton; had a family of several children, who grew up to maturity.

Stephen, subject of sketch.

Sophronia, married Jacob A. Potter, of Concord, and had a family of four children.

Comfort, married William A. W. Neal, of Concord, and had one son.

Thomas, died young.

Myra, married Joseph N. Wadleigh, of London, and had four children.

Of these nine children of Thomas and Comfort Moore, Stephen is the only one now (1885) surviving.

Thomas Moore was an industrious and enterprising farmer, and did much toward improving the tract of land on which he had made his home. In religious belief he was a Congregationalist, and his wife was a Free-Will Baptist.

Stephen Moore, like others of his time and locality, had very limited advantages in the way of schooling. Brought up on the farm, he worked hard in his boyhood, but improved what little time he had for study as best he could, studying nights and at leisure times, and thus obtained a fair English education. Upon his father's decease the property was divided among seven children, but Stephen purchased the interest, from time to time, of the other heirs, until he finally became the possessor of the home farm and adjacent wild lands, and here, for more than half a century, he toiled and labored and reared a family of children. Like his father, he was hardy, industrious and frugal, and he gradually improved the farm and buildings thereon, and gathered property around him, until he became in very comfortable circumstances, and was the proprietor of one of the best kept farms in his town.

In April, 1809, the barn on the home farm of Thomas Moore was burned, together with four oxen, four cows, ten tons of hay and farming implements. Supposed to be the work of an incendiary. There was no insurance.

The esteem in which Mr. Moore was held by his neighbors was evidenced by numerous small presents, such as lumber, labor, etc.; also a cow given by the Shakers. Within six weeks after his barn was burned, he, with the help of his neighbors, had taken from the woods the lumber, and built the barn which at present stands there. He also built a shed and carriage-house connected with the barn, and dug a well. In 1822-23, Samuel, Alexander and Stephen Moore erected a saw-mill on a small stream running through the home farm, for the purpose of sawing their own lumber. A few years later the mill came into the possession of Stephen. Samuel and Stephen also bought and used the first shingle-mill which was brought into the town. It cost, with right to use the same, one hundred and forty dollars. They used it twenty years.

In 1849, Stephen Moore dug a well fifty rods from the buildings, laid pipes and brought the water to his house and barn. He also built a small barn, thirty by thirty-six feet, for sheep, on the northeast side of the large barn. In 1848 he built an ell to the dwelling-house, forty by twenty feet, consisting of kitchen, pantry and wood-shed. In 1850 he divided the large barn in the middle, moved one part back, put in an addition of twenty feet, making it seventy-six by forty-four feet. He also built a shed, thirty by sixteen feet, connected with the small barn. In 1850-51 he raised six hundred and fifty bushels of rye on outlands, where he had cut wood and timber, and cleared for pasture. In 1860 he sowed four bushels of wheat on two and a half acres of land, and harvested therefrom a crop of one hundred bushels.

In September, 1866, Mr. Moore removed from the home farm to the village of London Mills, and the homestead came into the possession of his son, A. G. Moore, who, in 1868, raised the barn and put in a cellar, seventy-six by twenty-four feet, with walls of split granite. In 1869 he built a carriage-house and stable, thirty-six by twenty-six feet. In 1874 he put new wheels and gearing in the saw-mill, and in 1884 he took up the lead pipes laid by his father, Stephen, and in their place laid cement-lined iron pipes to the house and barn. He has also continued in various ways to improve the farm, and has been very successful in conducting it.

Stephen Moore married, January 31, 1827, Mary L., daughter of Joseph and Nancy (Wells) Greeley, of Gilmanton, N. H. They had eight children,—

Joseph G., born December 12, 1827.

Albert, born February 21, 1831; died in infancy.

Anne Maria, born July 17, 1833; died September 29, 1881.

Andrew G., born January 12, 1836; married Laura A., daughter of Zephaniah and Mary Batchelder; has one child living.

George L., born March 8, 1838; enlisted in Union army and died in hospital, July 12, 1864.

Infant son, unnamed, died in infancy.

Mary R., born September 14, 1842; died October 10, 1876.

Caroline A., born November 23, 1848; died January 1, 1852.

Joseph G., married first Mary A. Arlin, and second Anne Nichols. He has five children, all sons, and resides in Dubuque, Iowa, where he is at present engaged in the wood and coal business. He has been, however, for about thirty years, a railroad engineer.

Anne M., married John O. Hobbs, of Deerfield. He removed to Newport, N. H., and was a merchant tailor there to the time of his death. His only child, Miss Kate Hobbs, graduates from the academy there in the class of 1886.

Mrs. Moore died March 31, 1854. Mr. Moore married, as his second wife, Mrs. Mary Berry, widow of Alanson Berry, of London, a daughter of Levi Bean, of Brentwood, N. H. Mr. Moore has given all of his children an academical education, at the various academies of Gilmanton, Pittsfield, Sanbornton and London.

Since Mr. Moore's residence at the village he has accomplished a work at once unique and interesting. He owned a tract of woodland lying adjacent to the church and bordering on the village, which he made overtures to the village to assist in converting into a cemetery; not meeting with a satisfactory response, he conceived the idea of himself beautifying and adorning the grounds and preparing it for future use as a resting-place for the dead. With characteristic energy, he at once set about carrying his plans into execution, and here, toiling day after day, to accomplish his cherished purpose, the last twenty years of his life have been spent. Beginning this enterprise at an age when most men are ready to retire from active life, it is astonishing to see what he has, unaided and alone, accomplished.

The tract of land selected was, by nature, well adapted to the use to which he has applied it. It is peculiar in its topographical conformation, there being a deep basin in the centre, with level-topped ridges surrounding it on three sides, with a slight depression or hollow leading off on the third. It is a beautifully wooded tract, not dense, but nicely distributed over almost the entire surface. This tract, consisting of about six acres, Mr. Moore has fenced in with split granite posts, set about eighteen inches apart, around three sides of the inclosure and a part of the fourth. The posts stand about three feet and half above ground and about eighteen inches under the surface. This fence is to be completed by an iron rod traversing the top of the posts and fastened to each, the holes being already drilled for the purpose.

In the valley, in the centre of the cemetery, Mr. Moore has leveled off the land and walled the edges of the basin with split granite. In the centre of this beautiful little plot is a miniature lake, with water clear as crystal, to which there is no visible inlet or outlet; and in the centre of this lake Mr. Moore has constructed a little island and planted it with flowers. He has also constructed a beautiful drive around the park or basin, and built a receiving vault in the hillside, near the entrance to the valley. He has cleared the underbrush from most of the tract, and contemplates laying out drives around and through it. In doing this work, Mr. Moore has built to himself a monument that will not only serve to keep imperishable his own memory, but he has prepared a resting-place for the generations that will succeed him, creditable to himself, ornamental to the town and of service to the community at large.

Mr. Moore took an active part in building the Congregational Church in Loudon village and in supplying the same with a bell. He is a member of the Congregational Society.

He has never been an office-seeker, but has preferred the quiet walk of the private citizen. In militia days, before the war, however, he took an interest in military matters and held the rank of captain.

Through a long life he has been an earnest, honest, industrious, hard-working and successful man. Possessed of a strong physique, he still bids fair to survive many years. He began life prior to the present century, being born June 29, 1799. He has outlived all of his immediate family, and most, if not all, of his schoolmates and boyhood companions. His hearing is defective, but with that exception, his senses are remarkably well preserved, and his general health exceptionally good.

HISTORY OF NORTHFIELD.

BY LUCIAN HUNT, A.M.

CHAPTER I.

Geography.—Northfield, in Merrimack County, was so named, it is said, because lying north of Canterbury, from which it was set off by the act of incorporation in 1780.

It contains about twenty-seven square miles, or seventeen thousand acres, and is bounded on the north by the Winnipisaukee River, east by Gilman-ton and Canterbury, south by Canterbury and west by Franklin and the Merrimack River. Once Northfield was bounded by the Merrimack along its whole western border, but its northwest corner, embracing what is now Franklin Falls, sloped so lovingly towards Franklin, and Franklin looked so longingly towards the corner, that they became united in the year 1858 by act of Legislature.

Northfield, like many other New Hampshire towns, has a diversified aspect. It has hill and vale, upland and low plain, waving woods, smooth, rolling fields, rich intervals, and beyond question belongs to the Granite State, as that mineral abounds in all its varied forms—sands, pebbles, bowlders, ledges and the bare mountain peak.

The general appearance of the town, however, is that of a trough-like valley running north and south, with a parallel ridge of hills on each side,—the western called Oak Hill, and the northeastern Bay, which, extending southward, culminates in the mountain peak of Bean Hill.

Of the three, Oak Hill is more smooth and regular, and presents a longer succession of excellent farms, and Bay Hill, with equally good farms, though less in number, has more charming scenery—indeed, few places in New England can surpass it in that respect—and is nearer the privileges of the flourishing village of Tilton, while Bean Hill is by far the most conspicuous, being, in fact, the highest elevation between this part of the Merrimack Valley and the Atlantic; but the many goodly farms on its broad shoulders, though well rewarding the true farmer, are not, on the whole, considered so attractive as those of her sister hills, being too much lifted up and too near the primitive rock of the summit.

Bay Hill derived its name from the fine view it affords of Sanbornton Bay, so called, which is, in reality, the lower part of the lake, with a slight intervening fall. We challenge New Hampshire, south of Red Hill, to produce a scene of quiet, rural beauty, with a touch of the grand, equal to the prospect from Bay Hill, looking north.

Before you is spread the valley of the Winnipisaukee, with its lake of that name; and flowing from it, with its succession of bays and rapids, comes the river, dancing onward to bathe Northfield's northern boundary, and to blend with her sister, Pemigewasset, on its western border. The valley is oval, and looking over its largest diameter, you see it encircled by Gunstock, Belknap, Blue Mountain, Ossipee, Red Hill and others, keeping watch and ward, as it were, over the beautiful valley they inclose; while over their heads, in the far distance, we espy Chocorua, Cardigan, Mount Washington and his brothers, while directly west, on our left, like a pyramid, rises Kearsarge, and nestled below, amid green foliage and sparkling waters, within a mile's distance, lies the bustling, romantic, growing village of Tilton, with its river, its fairy isle, its busy factories, pleasant residences, Roman arch, college buildings and Tilton mansion, and surrounding these on all sides stretch away, mile upon mile, substantial upland farms. Oak Hill also has a fine view of Tilton on the one side and Franklinward down into the valley of the Merrimack on the other.

Bean Hill owes its name, presumably, not to that excellent prized so highly as a dish indispensable to a

² Slightly and skilfully—not slightly or skilfully. Winnipisaukee, so spelled, looks more like an Indian name, so much more like an Indian name; it is an Indian name. Also, let there be a double e at the end, otherwise a stranger would be sure to pronounce the last two syllables, sook.

New England Sunday dinner, but to a man of that name; but how, when or where, we have been able to find no record. It throws forward a broad spur to the north and another to the east into Canterbury, and on these are its most valuable farms. Its summit is divided into three peaks, and corresponding to these are two narrow parallel valleys on the southern slope, shedding their waters into a pond just beyond the line in Canterbury. The view from the summit is far more widely extended than elsewhere in town, but loses much of the scenic beauty of the Bay Hill prospect, which latter is literally picturesque,—a picture set in a mountain frame.

Besides these, two smaller elevations claim a moment's attention.

One is the bold bluff opposite the Tilton bridge, on which the granite arch is erected, sometimes called Mount Griswold, from a legend I dimly remember to have heard many years since, to the effect that Fort Griswold once stood on its summit, as a defense against the Indians. How much truth there is in the tradition we cannot say, but we think now would be a good time to christen it with some permanent appellation. What say, Northfielders, shall it be Mount Griswold, or Monument Mount, or Arch Hill, or River Ridge, or Bridge Bluff, or Tiltonberg?

Mount Tugg, as the other elevation is called, stands not far from the highway, as you approach Bean Hill. There is some doubt about the origin of the name, but it might have come from the following incident, to which the writer was a witness, at just about the year when he was entering his teens:

One glorious Fourth in that long-ago time, several boys from the Bridge took it into their heads to celebrate the day by taking a quiet stroll through the woods and pastures. About the noontide hour they halted on the summit of the hill in question for rest and to enjoy the prospect. At the foot of the hill was a fence, and beyond the fence a beautiful field of grain, with the owner's house close by. Now it happened, as mischief would have it, that a large bowlder was standing at that time near the edge of the summit, only waiting apparently for a little friendly help to make a gymnastic journey below. This was the glorious Fourth—a day gotten up to honor the Revolution! Why not have a revolution of their own? Agreed; they would revolutionize that bowlder! So with sticks and stakes and hands they pushed and pried and tugged,—especially the latter. They tugged above, and they tugged below, and they tugged till the sweat streamed from their faces, and finally giving a huge tug, and a tug altogether, it toppled, and was soon making as satisfactory revolutions as they could desire. These young revolutionists had calculated that on reaching the fence it would stop, as a well-behaved bowlder ought,—but, alas, for youthful calculations! for they were now to learn that revolutions of mosses, whether of men or stones, when once set well in motion, are to be guided or checked by no fence, whether fence of field, or the defence of society; for, crashing through the obstacle, as though it were made of straw, it rushed revolving along till it had ploughed a road through the grain nearly to the farther side. At this juncture, as was proper, from the house appeared the owner. And then and there, we will venture to say, was delivered the most impassioned Fourth of July oration ever heard within the bounds of Northfield. It was impromptu—without notes, without circumlocution, direct, to the point, in choicest Saxon, and the man evidently meant business, for the word gun occurred in it several times, and the name of a place hotter than where they were,—by the way, it was a very hot day,—and closed by expressing the wish that they were obliged to roll that stone up the hill again with the stimulus of the lash on their bare backs. On being kindly reminded by the boys that revolutions never went backwards, he responded emphatically that they would speedily be transferred to another locality by a shot-gun conveyance if they ever started another revolution on his grounds. The audience then dispersed. And whether the patriotism of those boys was the more firmly fixed in after-years by the eloquence then poured forth I know not; but this I know,—that ever since that day the hill has been called Mount Tugg. The revolution is ended, the grain cut, the reaper gone; but the bowlder lies there still,—a stubborn witness to the truth of my words.

Rivers.—The principal rivers, I believe, wholly within the limits of the town are two, of which one is the Skenduggardy,—remember, that is the correct name, for it was always so called by the older inhabitants and by the younger generation till an ill-informed Gazetteer gave it another title. Soudogardy belongs by right to the brook that flows from Soudogardy Pond, a mile or two away, which now goes by the name of Cross Brook. Call things by their right names, Gentlemen Gazetteer-men, and let us, fellow-Northfielders, lead back with due honor the beautiful and original Indian titles to our two little rivers.

The first-named is formed by the union of a branch flowing from Chestnut Pond with another from the heights of Bean Hill, and empties into the Winnipisaukee. It was once something of a manufacturing stream, as it carried two saw-mills, and more anciently by flowage, and with the assistance of those primitive dam-builders, the beavers, manufactured the valuable Smith and Thurston meadows; but of late it has given up the sawing and flowage business, and seems to have enough to do to work its way to the Winnipisaukee, to afford drink to a thirsty beast or bird now and then, and to give sustenance at long intervals to a lilliputian trout.

Its sister-river flows into the Merrimack and was once noted for manufactures. Indeed, the first manufacturing in town was done on the Cross, or, as we ought to call it, the Soudogardy Brook. Here, and near the Intervale and Oak Hill, were made earthen and woollen-ware, lumber, jewelry, and especially the old-fashioned gold beads. They had there a grist-mill, a fulling-mill and carding-machine,—the first in use,—a grocery, jeweler's shop and tailor's shop. The father of Mr. William G. Hammaford had a shoe-shop, and some one had a blacksmith, or, as it was then called, a shoing-shop. In fact, almost every branch of industry was carried on there in the very first decade of the town's history.

The Winnipisaukee River, which bathes Northfield's northern border, is said to fall two hundred and thirty-two feet before meeting the Pemigewasset. At the confluence of the two, in Franklin, the united streams take the name of Merrimack, a river believed to give employment to a greater number of operatives than any other on the face of the globe. Authorities say the name of the latter river—an Indian word—signifies a sturgeon.

Marvelous tales were told by the fathers concerning the fish in the Merrimack and its two head-branches. Not the degenerate specimens of dace, chubs, perch, minnows, with now and then a solitary pickerel, which we now get a peep at long intervals, but shad and salmon—fat, luscious and huge—and moving up-stream in such vast numbers in spring or spawning-time, as to blacken the river with their backs. And what was singular in their habits was, that though they migrated from the ocean, through the whole length of the Merrimack, in company, yet, on reaching the fork of the two rivers, in Franklin, they invariably separated—the shad passing up the Winnipisaukee to deposit their spawn in the lake, and the salmon up the Pemigewasset. Thus the inhabitants of one valley feasted on salmon, those of the other on shad. Now the story runs, or did run, that each kind of fish gave its own peculiarly characteristic expression to its eaters, so that you could tell, as far as you could see a man, whether he were a shad eater or a salmon consumer, and that this line of demarkation between the Pemigewasseters and the Winnipisaukeites has flowed in the blood of their descendants down to the present day, so that seldom or never does an intermarriage take place between Tilton and Franklin. I care not to hold myself responsible for the truth of this legend—it may be false; but folks will talk. It is certain, however, that the two villages have been somewhat exclusive as regards each other in past years, each having its own river, its own fish, its own railroad, its own politics. We trust all barriers will be removed when the new railroad crosses from Franklin to Tilton.

The favorites of the theory that fish is a brain-food and an intellectual stimulant may find comfort in the fact that the immortal Webster was born and passed his boyhood near the confluence of the two rivers, and the two varieties of fish, and shad and salmon combined, must have formed his sustenance mainly during the period of his growth; and in mature life, we know what an unequalled piscator and mighty ichthyophagist he became, and a big brain was the physiological result—perhaps.

Ponds.—There are but two ponds worthy of mention, Sondogardy and Chestnut, each containing fifty or sixty acres; so say their nearest neighbors, Mr. Winslow and Mr. Knowles. The former is situated on the level plain, within sight of the railroad, and contains the fish usually found in such ponds—pickerel, suckers, pouts, eels, perch, shiners, etc., and of late years a great quantity of chubs, coming, it is thought, from the river. The outlet at the southern part is the Cross or Sondogardy Brook, running in a southwesterly direction into the Merrimack. Of the several mills once working on the banks of this stream, one solitary shingle-mill alone remains.

Chestnut Pond—we regret it didn't retain its Indian name—lies down deep in the bottom of a cavity, like the crater of a volcano. In some places it is sixty feet deep, water cold, no inlet visible, supposed to be fed by springs at the bottom. Its outlet—an unfauling one—is the north branch of the Skendogardy Brook, which it meets about two miles from the pond. A pond like this would seem to be exactly fitted for land-locked salmon, and so the commissioners seemed to think; for Mr. Wesley Knowles writes that they placed several thousand there in 1879. Again he writes "that not one of those fish has been heard of from that time to this (1885), to his knowledge." Why is this? All the conditions seemed favorable, cold, pure, spring water, great depth, a continual outlet; let some naturalist study the problem. Our own private opinion is that the pickerel devoured them.

Remarks.—The whole Winnipisaukee Valley probably was once filled by the waters of the lake, Bay Hill reaching over to and connecting with a similar elevation on the Sanbornton side, till worn down by the river which drained the valley. Dividing, one branch passed on to Franklin and the other through the middle of Northfield, making Oak Hill an island. Possibly a branch passed still farther east, converting Bean Hill into another island much larger. Thus Northfield at one time probably consisted merely of two island hill-tops; and later, by the addition of Mount Griswold, of three.

Plains are scarce in Northfield, as the whole town almost appears to be tilted in one direction or another. There is some level land in the southwestern part, and near Tilton is a tract of about a half-mile in extent, anciently called the Colony, where for a long series of years seemed to be gathered the dregs of the town, noted for drunkenness and other bad deeds, and many a wild tale might be told of their lawlessness in days of old. But this gypsy-like race has passed away, and the most level portion of the tract is being prepared for the purposes of a beautiful trotting course by the Hon. Charles E. Tilton, to whom both the towns of Northfield and Tilton are already indebted for many improvements of usefulness and beauty.

History.—Benjamin Blanchard is generally credited as being the founder of Northfield, though two years earlier Jonathan Heath is said to have built a log hut on the Gerrish intervalle, which was once included within the limits of old Northfield, but now belongs to Franklin. However that may be, by common consent, Blanchard was the first settler within the present limits of the town.

“He was a lineal descendant of the English family which very early emigrated to New England. Colonel Joseph Blanchard, so distinguished as an officer in the early French and Indian Wars of New England, and who, in 1754, marched at the head of his regiment of six hundred men up the Merrimack to the Salisbury fort, at what is now the orphan asylum, in Franklin, and thence through the unbroken wilderness to Crown Point and Canada, belonged to the same lineage. The annals of Charlestown and Boston show the Blanchard name in their earliest emigration. The name of Joseph Blanchard appears in the death records of Boston for 1637.”

Benjamin Blanchard, in company with his father and mother, emigrated to Canterbury perhaps about the year 1736 or 1737, from Hamstead, N.H., it is supposed, where he found his wife, Tuba Keizer, represented as a most excellent wife and mother. Benjamin's father was killed by the Indians soon after their settlement in Canterbury, or twenty-two years before the son took up his march for Northfield, and in 1752 his mother, who was a lady of Scotch-Irish descent, by the name of Bridget, was captured by the Indians while out from the Canterbury fort at night driving up the cows, according to one account; another tradition has it that she escaped from the Indians by fleetness of foot, and, rousing the garrison, saved the fort from capture. Both accounts, however, agree that “she was a very corpulent woman, and in her attempt to escape capture by running she amused the Indians, who shook their sides with laughter, and cried out, ‘poochuck, poochuck!’ which is the Indian name for hog.”

She possessed great courage, tradition says, and in other respects was a very superior woman. For most of the above facts in regard to the Blanchard family we are indebted to Mr. M. B. Goodwin, of Franklin, and to the Merrimack Journal of date July 14, 1882.

From what little I can gather, I should judge that his mother died before he left Canterbury; and then Benjamin, feeling, perhaps, that the only ties that bound him to the old fort were broken, his father having been killed twenty-two years before, and whether his worldly prospects looked too discouraging for him to remain where he was, the first comers having selected the best lands and places, or whether a certain restlessness incident to the times, or ambition, or desire of change impelled him, whatever the motive, Benjamin now determined to strike out a new path, and found a new settlement for himself. He was forty-two years of age, in the prime of his manhood. His oldest boys must have grown to man's estate, especially Edward, who was destined in after-years to surpass his father in enterprise, capacity for business and worldly success; and it is not unlikely, when he bade adieu to the old fort one fine summer's morn, to seek his fortune further north, leaving Tuba in charge of the home department, including the younger children, that he went forth accompanied by one at least, Edward, and probably by several, of his older boys. In 1760, says the account, he cut his way through an unbroken wilderness from an old fort in Canterbury, and settled on what is now known as Bay Hill. How interesting to read now, could we have a diary of that exploring tour. Of course, there were good luck and mishap, complaining and glee, tumbles, thirst, hot and wet days and much else intermingled. Perhaps to-day a bear is killed or a wolf shot; to-morrow, a catamount or a rattlesnake, with fearful suspicions of Indians lurking around. Very likely one of the boys carried the guns while the others “cut.” And he wouldn't be a boy, at least of the modern style, if, towards evening, he didn't complain of his unwieldy burden, such as two or three guns would be sure to become in the after-part of the day.

We wish it were in our power to follow step by step the course taken by our pioneers. We cannot. The track has been obliterated forever by nature and forgetfulness. We can only surmise that Blanchard would be likely to take a direct course north or nearly so, and in that case he probably came over the western spur of Bean Hill, perhaps by Mount Tugg—mountain then unnamed—over the Rogers farm; but more likely over what is now the Gardner S. Abbott farm, and the farm once owned by Mills Glidden, and later by Anthony C. Hunt; then skirting by the great Smith meadow, which meadow was then a pond—thanks to the heavers—then over the Smith farm itself, till they finally reached what proved to be their destined point, which point was on the modern farm of Ephraim S. Wadleigh, just back of his orchard.

Nor are we to suppose that this spot was instantly selected the moment they arrived. No doubt, many long and anxious deliberations were held over the subject; and there might have been much difference of opinions. It would not be strange if the boys preferred to settle near the river, where they could fish and swim and paddle the canoe. It would be natural for them to explore Bay Hill in all directions before the final selection of that location. What influenced the decision it were hard to guess. Perhaps the slope riverward in those days was too wet or marshy; farther up on the summit of the hill they might think too bleak, while lower down in the valley the trees would show a poorer soil—in part marshy. But their choice was a happy medium—neither too high, nor too low; and, doubtless owing to a favorable soil, the trees there were higher, larger and consequently farther apart, with less underbrush.

The choice once made, it only remains to provide a shelter for those left behind. In this the father and boys engage with zeal, till after a few days a small clearing is made and a substantial structure of logs, the first house in Northfield, has arisen among the tall trees on the after-styled Wadleigh farm. A log house! a dwelling not to be sneered at or ridiculed by the present fortunate possessors of Northfield's smiling farms and beautiful homes. A log house was a convenient, substantial, roomy structure, firm, proof against Indian bullets, wolf's claws, the stormy wind or winter's cold. Its arrangement was the perfection of simplicity; its architecture was neither composite or complicated; while, if the bark remained unremoved, as was undoubtedly the case with this pioneer hut, with moss inserted between the logs on sides and roof, a touch of the picturesque would be added, quite in harmony with the surrounding forest.

Benjamin Blanchard's log hut is finished, destined to be famous through the ages, as long as Northfield's sons and daughters retain a spark of love for their hills and homesteads. And now, to crown the work, the boys must have a holiday—a bath and a day's fishing in the Winnipisaukee,—then ho! for a return to the old Canterbury fort, to see mother and the little ones, and to bring them the glad tidings of a home found and founded in the wilderness and waiting for them.

Well, the holiday is over and the next day sees them returned in good season to their old home, laden literally with the fat of the land, and waters, too,—with fish and venison, of which, you may be sure, a grand feast was made that night, to which friends were invited, where their adventures were described, the shad was dissected, the whiskey tested, the laugh burst forth and good cheer prevailed till the old fort rang.

After a few days spent in settling his affairs and making what preparations his scanty means afforded, Blanchard took his permanent departure from the friendly fortress which had sheltered and protected him and his so long. Let us picture to ourselves the procession. The time is early sunrise, for they must finish the journey that day, since it will not do to risk his all to wild beasts and perhaps Indians by exposure in the open forest through the night. Their friends, up to see them off, cheer as they pass through the gate; a parting dram circulates around, good wishes are shouted, guns give their parting reverberations, and the little company of eleven—parents and nine children—march quickly over the narrow, open space around the fort into the path they had cut a few weeks before leading to Bay Hill. It was a narrow highway they had, admitting the passage of a single file only; for the little boys and girls of the present day must understand that they didn't take the cars at Canterbury depot and land at Tilton and thence to Bay Hill by team, or on foot, as people are wont to do nowadays. No; they probably all walked—young and old—the whole distance, and that, too, barefooted, the most,—if not all.

At the head, with pack on back, axe in hand and musket on shoulder, would naturally march the father and next him one of the older boys, also with gun and otherwise freighted, then the mother and smaller children; after them the horse—if they had a horse—loaded down to his utmost capacity; then the family cow with calf following; while at some distance in the background, led by a raw hide cord, trotted and darted and scampered and retreated the clown of the company, the most amusing and at the same time the most vexations of the whole,—the well-to-do pig, which seemed to have an invincible repugnance to leaving its comfortable Canterbury quarters, and kept up an incessant soliloquy, doubtless about the restlessness of mortals, who couldn't be satisfied to let well enough alone. Whether there was a cat or dog in the cavalcade, I can't say, but should think a cat a superfluity, except for company; for neither rat nor mouse had as yet tasted the good cheer of the Wadleigh farm, and so grimalkin's occupation would be gone till the happy coming days, when rats and mice could be had for the catching. Finally, Edward brought up the rear.

At first they moved along in the highest spirits, though their way was in a sort of twilight, for this was the primeval forest through which they were journeying amid trees tall and gloomy, which only at rare intervals permitted a peep of the sun. Still, at the start they journeyed with laugh and joke and chiding of the animals, or perchance each other, and then bursting into singing and shouting till "the dim woods rang." This, however, gradually died away, but revived slightly at their noon-day rest. Their afternoon march was performed mostly in silence. They toiled slowly along, the day and the way seeming to be endless, till, crossing the Abbott and the Glidden and Smith farms, halting a few minutes at the Smith Meadow Pond to relieve the thirst of all—animal and human—the long train defiled at last into Blanchard's little clearing just as the sun was sinking behind Kearsarge. The animals were speedily tied to trees and fed on such scanty forage as leaves could supply; boughs were cut and spread over the ground in the hut, and these, again, partially overspread with bear, deer and wolf-skins; a fire was built in the open air by means of a flint, powder and tinder; a supper prepared and thankfully partaken of; all retired to their skin or leafy couches; the stars looked brightly down, and all were soon wrapped in slumber and silence, even the pig forgetting its sorrows and ceasing its complaints.

Thus passed the first night of the first settlers in Northfield. The settlement was begun.

For several years, so far as we can learn, Benjamin Blanchard and family were the only people in Northfield. There was no settlement in New Hampshire north of him, for Tilton or Sanbornton was as yet without inhabitants. What were their feelings, adventures, sufferings, pleasures, no record tells. Cut off by many miles of intervening forest from all neighborly society and sympathy, they must have felt lonely at times, especially in the gray, dripping days of the first autumn which followed, with its succeeding winter; but if so, the effect would be brief, for the hut was full; there was always work enough to do; their mode of life gave to one and all perfect health in all probability; they had appetites wonderful to see, so that there was an exquisite delight in the mere act of eating, far beyond what their descendants know, and, what was better, they had the means of gratifying their healthy cravings with luxuries of which those of this day are sadly deficient,—wild meat in all its varieties, bear, deer, rabbit, wild fowl, such as ducks, geese, partridges in the greatest profusion, shad, river-trout and eels from the river, and the Skendoggyard was swarming with the delicious brook-trout.

Besides, the farm began ere long to show the capabilities of newly-improved land and a virgin soil, under the energetic hands of Benjamin and his stalwart boys, aided, within doors, by the co-operation of the tireless Tuba. It had chanced, through accident or shrewdness, that Blanchard had pitched upon one of the best spots in town for the manufacture of a good farm, and every year saw his clearing grow wider, the forest recede, the fields grow greener, crops of potatoes, such as only new soil can produce, corn and grass increased; his herd received fresh additions on each returning spring; his buildings improved, until, no doubt, he began to consider himself a well-to-do farmer.

Hardships were unavoidable, of course. All pioneer settlers had to undergo them. Many luxuries of modern days they must forego—some, perhaps, to which they had been accustomed at the old fort. Woodchucks, porcupines, squirrels and pole-cats ravaged his garden, foxes and hawks stole his chickens, and bears and wolves sometimes destroyed a pig or a calf; an unpleasant accident might now and then occur from a falling tree or an erring axe; a drought, or wind, or hail, or lightning might be troublesome; and then it was such a long, weary way to mill; and what was very hard, there was no housewife neighbor for mistress Tuba to gossip with in regard to all these trials and afflictions. No tea to drink, no cider barrel to tap; the cows would get lost in the woods, and the boys, perchance, take a holiday in the busiest time, and go a-fishing.

Such, and many more trials of a like nature, very probably hovered over, and, at times, settled down upon the farm and family of Benjamin Blanchard as the seasons went by; but stout hearts did Benjamin and Tuba bear, and bravely did they face every trial as it arose, till in time they reaped their reward.

A musical vein has existed in the Blanchard family, evidently from the first pioneer to the present time, as will be readily credited by those who heard old Northfield's woods echo the notes of the cornet and song poured forth on her Centennial Day by Miss Fannie C. Rice, one of the latest representatives of the original settler's descendants. And what companionship this talent of his must have afforded Benjamin at times in his isolated condition! and oft, when assailing the giants of the forest, would he be likely to burst forth into singing, the rhythm of his voice keeping time with the whick-whack of his axe, and ever and anon, an answering note would ring out from the matron of the cabin, and be echoed by the boys and girls in other directions, till, with the singing of the birds, the whole woods seemed bursting into melody. Ah! think not there were no jovial times there!

And so the years came and went, until, encouraged by his success, the solitude of Blanchard began to be broken by the arrival of neighbors. The first to follow him was William Williams, whose daughter, Widow George Hancock, died at the residence of her son, William Hancock, in Canterbury, January 14, 1860, aged one hundred years, eleven months and four days. Let her be remembered as the oldest person that Northfield has as yet produced. Afterwards came Nathaniel and Reuben Whiteher, Captain Samuel and Jonathan Gilman and Linsey Perkins, and settled on the farm where Warren H. Smith, Esq., now resides. On the Perkins place, opposite Mr. Wadleigh's, was a log hut used for school purposes, the cellar of which is still to be seen.

A little further south, down by the Smith meadow, was a log hut in which lived a Mr. Colby. His wife was a weaver, and, for want of bars, was accustomed to warp her webs on the apple-trees. Compare the result of her manufactory with those now on the river turning out their thousands of yards at short intervals.

Mr. William Gilman, a gentleman now of about eighty-five, the most of his life a resident of Bay Hill, and his brother Charles, now in Illinois, are sons of Jonathan Gilman, who himself, or his father, was, I suppose, one of the original settlers. His great-grandfather on the mother's side came from Lee, bought five hundred acres of wild land on and around Bay Hill, on which he settled his sons—Reuben, Nathaniel, William and Jonathan Whiteher,—many of whose descendants are now in town. The grandfather of Mr. Wesley Knowles bought his farm of Nathaniel Whiteher, paying for it, so the story goes, with a two-year-old heifer.

Captain Samuel Gilman, Joseph Knowles and Dr. Keyser were also among the first settlers on Bay Hill.

Another of the pioneers of Northfield was Jonathan Wadleigh, who was a native of Kingston, N. H., served in the Revolutionary army, lived for a while at Bean Hill, settled on the south side of Bay Hill on what was afterward called the Ambrose Woodbury farm, and finally died in Gilmanton. He was the father of Judge Wadleigh, whose son, Ephraim S., still lives on the first opened farm in town, and of

Mrs. Captain S. Glines, who, after having lived half a century or more at the Centre, returned to her father's homestead on Bay Hill, now in possession of her son, Smith W. Glines, and died at the age of eighty-two in the same room in which she was born.

Some twenty years after the settlement of Bay Hill, perhaps, Lieutenant Charles Glidden moved to Bean Hill from Nottingham, built a log hut, left his wife and two children and went into the Revolutionary army. In his absence she tilled the soil, felled the trees and hauled her wood with the help of oxen. After his return he bought Nehemiah McDonald's farm near the old meeting-house. Mr. Glidden, his wife and some of the children were buried on said farm. His wife was a Mills, and her mother, Alice Cilley. John Cilley, Robert Evans, John Cofran (father of Colonel James Cofran), Gideon Sawyer and brother, Solomon French and brother, were early settlers of this region, and William Smith, the grandfather of Warren Smith, who was moved from Old Hampton by Mr. Glidden. Perhaps his son Jeremiah came with him, as he left Old Hampton, where he was born, when a boy, and went to live in Canterbury.

In those early times there was no house between Glidden's and what is now called the Rand school-house—several miles. Ensign Sanborn, whose wife was a Harvey, lived not far from there. He probably served in the army for a while.

Mrs. William Gilman, to whom I am indebted for many of the above facts, relates that woods, wolves and bears were plenty in those times, and carriages very scarce; so that when Esquire Samuel Forrest's mother died, her corpse was carried on a bier, laid on poles between two horses, to the graveyard, by the brick meeting-house, some three or four miles distant.

She further says that "old General Dearborn drove the first double sleigh into Northfield on a visit to her grandfather."

A short account of the Forrest family has been furnished me by Mr. John Sanborn, which I give in nearly his own words: "John Forrest came from Ireland when eighteen years of age, and settled finally in Canterbury. Of his four sons, Robert settled in the same town, and the others in Northfield—John on the Leighton place, William in the Centre District and James on the farm now owned by James N. Forrest, his grandson. Two of his daughters married Gibsons, and the other one Mr. Clough, and all settled in Northfield. William Forrest settled in the Centre District, or rather commenced clearing the timber, in 1774, just before the War of the Revolution broke out. He enlisted in the war, and served his country with credit. He was the father of fourteen children, of whom thirteen lived to grow up, and all except one attended school near the old meeting-house." To this sketch Mr. James N. Forrest adds: "My grandfather, James, came here on the farm where I now live in 1784, and subdued the forest, erected buildings, built roads and left a worthy son to inherit his property and do honor to his name. My father, who was an only son, named me for his father, and I have named one of my sons (Samuel) for him. How long the names will rotate, only the destiny of the family will reveal."

I understand that this family has furnished more teachers and held more official positions than any other in town. The late Samuel Forrest, Esq., was long a prominent citizen there, having been superintending school committee many years, as well as treasurer, representative (two years), town clerk (two years) and selectman (twelve years). He was a man of decided convictions, with the courage to maintain his convictions; an unflinching anti-slavery man at a time when it required a stout heart to confess it; and a man who possessed the confidence of his fellow-citizens in all the public and private relations of life. He married Agnes Randall, of North Conway, who was born August 22, 1800, and still survives, Esquire Forrest having died in 1867, lacking sixteen days of being eighty-one years of age. His son, James N., has also served his native town as selectman for several years.

John E. Forrest, the third of the three Northfield brothers, lived till the close of life on his well-cultivated farm, raised a family of several children,—all or nearly all now deceased,—and died in extreme old age, the last of the three, leaving a respectable property and a worthy name.

Charles G. Forrest, the son of William, was a farmer in Northfield, living on the farm in the west part, now in the possession of Major Otis C. Wyatt, for many years, where all his children were born; removed to New London for a time, and finally settled in Tilton, where he resided till his death, in 1882, aged seventy-five years. He was an industrious farmer and conscientious in the discharge of all the duties of a citizen. He married Mrs. Sally T. Mead. His children are Almecia M.; Honoria A., an artist; Martha J., a painter and teacher; and George F. D.

Oak Hill proper, I am informed, was for the most part originally in the possession of Obed Clough, who was succeeded by the French and Batchelor families, the latter being still represented there.

I quote from Mr. Goodwin, who says: "Ensign Sanborn, Gideon Sawyer, the brothers Archelaus, Samuel and Abner Miles, John and Jeremiah McDaniel, Nathaniel and William Whitecer, Captain Thomas Clough, George and Joseph Hancock and the four brothers by the name of Cross were in town very early." These, I suppose, mostly settled in the western part. "The Crosses had a sort of village down at their place on the intervalle, opposite the Webster farm. They had a coopering establishment, a store and a tavern there, and it was, in fact, a business emporium for all that region."

Steven Cross, the great-grandfather of O. L. Cross

Esq., married Peggy Bowen, and settled near Indian Bridge, and raised a family of thirteen children, who were all living when the youngest was forty years old. The oldest, Abraham, married Ruth Sawyer, daughter of old Deacon Sawyer, of Canterbury, who was a soldier in both the French and Revolutionary Wars, and who had two sons killed at the surrender of Burgoyne, where the father was also a soldier. Deacon Sawyer owned the ferry two miles below the Cross ferry, and always attended to it himself to the last year of his life, he being within two months and three days of one hundred years at his death. He was the father of twenty-two children, twenty of whom grew up. Abraham Cross settled near his father, Sawyer, and there Jeremiah was born in 1805; but the year before, the family had settled on the Winnipisaukee and built a saw-mill, ever after known as the Cross mill. Jeremiah married Sarah Lyford, of Pittsfield, settled near the Cross mill, and about thirty-five years ago built, on a beautiful elevation, overlooking the mill, a fine mansion, in which a few years since he died, leaving behind an enviable character for honor, integrity and business enterprise. He was buried with Masonic honors.

Among the early settlers were also the names of William Kenniston and a Mr. Danforth. The latter was a soldier of the Revolution, and having been wounded, always persisted in the statement that he carried the ball still imbedded in his shoulder. The statement was not credited, however, till years after his death, upon the removal of his remains, it was found that the old soldier was right, for there, firmly fixed, so that a hammer was required for its extrication, was found the bullet embedded in the solid bone.

The three Miles brothers came into town in 1769 or 1770, and settled on one farm; lived on it six or seven years, then sold it to Reuben Kimball, of Concord, in 1776. This farm has been kept in the Kimball name to the present time, Reuben giving it to his son Benjamin, who sold it to his brother David, whose descendants are still there. Reuben Kimball was a soldier of the Revolution, and in the battle of Bunker Hill was hit by musket-balls three times—once in the crown of his hat, once on the powder-horn which hung at his side (which horn is now in the possession of the present occupant of the farm), and once in the leg, which wound never healed to the day of his death, June 12, 1815.

It has happened, a little queerly, perhaps, that the last possessor of that farm, that is, the present possessor, Mr. J. A. Kimball, has married a direct descendant of Abner Miles, the first possessor of said farm; and it must be a pleasant thought to all concerned that the descendants of the seller and the descendants of the purchaser both now share equally in its blessings.

Another excellent farm in western Northfield, which is as well cultivated as any upland farm in town, or perhaps in the county, is the one owned and occupied by Mr. John S. Dearborn, which was deeded to his grandfather, Shuball Dearborn, in 1779, by his great-grandfather, who then lived on the Edmund Dearborn place, where he had settled in 1770, being then fifty-one years of age. The deed is still preserved in the old family chest. Shuball was married in homespun, at twenty-six years of age, and commenced housekeeping without bed or crockery, and in a house containing only one pane of glass. He was obliged to haul his building material from Portsmouth with an ox-team. But frugality and industry overcame all obstacles in time, and Mr. Dearborn lived to see himself in comfortable circumstances, with a good house to shelter him and well furnished for the times. He died at the age of fifty-eight. The farm has been in the family name ever since, passing from Shuball to his son of the same name, and thence to his son, the present possessor, John S. Dearborn.

Another branch of the same family was represented by Edmund Dearborn, born in 1789, who remained on the ancestral homestead of his grandfather, the original Shuball, raised a large and promising family, and died at his birth place in 1845. His three sons, Samuel G., Henry G. and Thomas H. B., were all physicians eminent in their profession. The latter died in Milford in 1879. The two elder reside at Nashua, blessed with a competency, the respect of their fellow-citizens and a lucrative professional practice.

Among the various names which, at this stage of its settlement, were rapidly increasing the population of the new town, the Simonds family seems to stand forth as prominent and influential as any; and luckily there exists a more complete and extended record of this family than of any other of the early settlers, not even excepting that of the first pioneer, perhaps, searched out and arranged by the late Hon. John W. Simonds, of Franklin, and, by the politeness of Mrs. Simonds, loaned to the writer; but instead of publishing them complete he finds himself compelled, by the brief space allotted him, to make selections, omit and condense.

Joseph Simons was born in England in 1688, an only son and in comfortable circumstances. At the age of twenty-two, contrary to the wishes of his parents, he emigrated to America and located in Connecticut. Here he married a Miss Knox, and in 1735 removed to Canterbury, settling on the "Intervale," about a mile and a half above Boscawen bridge. We have an account of only two children, William and John, though probably there were more. William moved to Thornton, and died there.

The other son, John, of whom mention is often made in the earlier town records, was born in February, 1739. He was chosen surveyor in 1768, 1770 and 1773. In 1774 he was taxed for town, colony, school and minister tax, one pound. Previous to the incorporation, in 1780, he had located himself in Northfield, about fifty rods south of where the old meeting-house afterwards stood. He was well-proportioned, stalwart, six feet in height and weighed two hundred pounds. He made hunting his business, attaching himself to the party under the leadership of the famous hunter, Captain Miles, for trapping beaver in Lower Cohos. These expeditions lasted three months in the spring and three in the fall. He purchased his one hundred acre lot with the proceeds of a three months' tour on the Kennebec River, Maine. He married Miss Dorothy Bachelier, of Canterbury, who died in 1824, aged eighty. The first town-meeting after the incorporation was held at his house November 21, 1780, when he was chosen moderator; and for several years after the town-meetings were held there, he being repeatedly chosen "sarvaiv," pound-keeper, auditor of accounts and assessor until 1800.

Once, on returning from a hunting expedition, he broke through the ice into the Winnipisaukee, and only escaped by being buoyed up by the pack of furs on his back.

His death occurred September 11, 1825, Elder Crockett, of Sanbornton, preaching his funeral discourse. His and his wife's remains lie in the graveyard by the brick church, slate-stones marking the graves.

John Simons was a quiet and peaceable man, of good habits, sound judgment, and left a fair property, for the times.

His children were James, Nathaniel, John, Sarah (Mrs. Forrest), Dorothy (Mrs. Foss), Abram, Thomas, Comfort (Mrs. Abbott).

James Simons, born in 1763, the oldest of eight children, was tall, strong, six feet high, as were the most of the family. When fourteen he enlisted in the Revolutionary army, served a short time and was discharged. In 1782 he married Lydia Morrison, of Northfield, and instead of becoming a hunter, like his father, settled down into a hard-working farmer. In 1790 he removed to Andover, whence, after a few years, he transferred his home to the head of Webster Pond, where he worked hard, lived plain, carrying his corn to mill on his shoulders, getting in his hay on poles, and in time prospered. Moved thence to an intervalle farm of one hundred and fifty acres, in 1800, and was honored with town offices, more or less, for nearly twenty years thereafter. For fifty years he and his wife were members of Elder Crockett's Baptist Church, both walking six miles to church, fording the river, and Mrs. Simons, on one occasion, carrying her babe in her arms; had a family of eight children, of whom John Simons was one, the father of the Hon. John Wesley Simonds, of Franklin, lately deceased, president of the State University at Vermillion, Dakota, and formerly superintendent of schools for the State of New Hampshire for several years.

He died August 15, 1842, she surviving him thirteen years longer, till August 30, 1855.

Sarah Simons, born August 13, 1770, married John Forrest, of Northfield, and became the mother of a large family of children. She lived and died in her native town.

Abram Simons was born in Northfield in 1774; lived and died there, 1836, aged sixty-one. This was the first death in his father's family of eight children. He lived upon the place his father bought when he left Canterbury. At the present day there is no Simons of that family in Northfield. Married Nancy Forrest, who died in 1815. He left one son, Joseph Simons, who died in Northfield in 1868, leaving one son, Joseph M. Simonds, now in Boston. Second wife, Mrs. Lucy Rundlett, who died in 1845.

He was quiet, sensible, industrious, temperate, honest and provident, so that at his death he left his son and widow one of the best properties in town at the time. Was selectman eight and town clerk fifteen years. Tradition says that Abram Simons was one of the most learned men in town.

Thomas Simons was born in 1783; lived in Northfield; died in 1872, and was buried in the Brick Church graveyard. His first wife was a Miss Hancock, of Northfield. Was married twice. Had one daughter, Eliza. He was kind-hearted, jolly, famous in early years as a wrestler and runner, and at one time was captain of a military company.

Old Uncle Thomas Simons, as he was familiarly called in later days, was a famous story-teller; but, when old and forgetful, not wholly reliable. One of his favorite stories was about a notable snow-storm, which came the last of April, so that the 1st of May found an inch of snow on the ground, with an inch of hail on the top of that. As he grew older, the inch changed to a foot of snow and hail; and, at last, he would occasionally blunder into saying there was a rod's depth of snow, with a rod of hail on top of it. He was a great student of the almanac, and would predict a storm whenever he found the moon was "apodging,"—that is, in apogee. Was also a stentorian sneezer, and his stertutations could be easily heard a mile or more, as the story is told.

Comfort Simons was born in 1786; married Eben Abbot; became a widow and died in Northfield in 1860, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Joseph M. Simons.

Daniel Hill and his four sons and two daughters lived in Salisbury, Mass., where they worked at shoe-making and shod the soldiers of the Revolution to such good purpose that they gained a comfortable support and a goodly pile of Continental money, or script, which, however,—like the money in the Arabian tale that changed to leaves when wanted for use,—by depreciation, turned to almost worthless paper, so that at one time their bill for a cow was no less than fifteen hundred dollars.

Two of the boys afterward became coopers, and started north to mend their fortunes. Reaching

Concord, Captain Blanchard (probably Captain Edward) told them of a delectable hill a few miles farther on, with scenery unequalled, and where land could be bought for a song, as there were no meeting-houses in town to give it value.

And so they came to Bay Hill, whither, in after-time, they brought their parents, brothers and sisters. This took place about the close of the Revolution.

Of the four brothers, John was a giant, strong as a horse; indeed, it was said that he preferred to carry his corn a mile away to mill, on his back, to taking the trouble to harness his horse. Timothy was another strong man. After bargaining for his farm, he walked to Salisbury, got his purchase-money in hard silver dollars, saw a certain lady and walked back the following day, and all without having stopped to sleep a wink; and, as if in reward for his endurance, that certain lady (Miss Betsy Lapham), a year or two after, came to live in his Bay Hill dwelling,—a dwelling that still stands, alone of the original four, and that still remains in the family. After marriage he learned penmanship and book-keeping, and, in process of time, became a justice of the peace.

Daniel's wife was Abi Amblet. He was a feeble, quiet man, but his wife had a tongue like an electric telegraph, and, on a certain occasion, utterly confounded judge and lawyers in open court by her volubility.

Of the present, or fourth, generation of Hills, only four or five of the name still reside in town,—Daniel E., the postmaster at Tilton from 1877 to the present time; Charles E., a printer; and Smith M. and Willie, who still cultivate the original farms on Bay Hill.

The first settler, Daniel Hill, married an Emery,—hence Daniel Emery, the name of the present postmaster, the fourth or fifth in descent from the original Daniel. His father and grandfather were named John; his mother was Mahala Rollins. His sister, Mary C., married Liba C. Morrison, who owns and cultivates one of the original Hill farms.

Mrs. O. L. Cross' father's name was David Hill; her mother, a Forrest. Has a brother, Solon, formerly a teacher and efficient superintendent of the Northfield schools for several years; at present a farmer.

Daniel Hill, nephew of the original Daniel, had two sons, William and Daniel A., who displayed considerable mechanical skill, constructing, when mere lads, a small steam-engine, which worked admirably in connection with the tea-kettle, with a whistle that could be heard at the Bridge. William promised fair as a portrait-painter; Daniel Adams invented a popular adhesive fly-paper.

Warren Hill is now the oldest person living in Northfield.

The Rogers family of Northfield claim to be direct descendants of the martyr, John Rogers, burnt at the stake in the reign of Queen Mary.

Deacon Samuel Rogers, born about the year 1745, moved from Bow to Northfield while yet a young man, and died there about 1835, aged ninety. From him have sprung all of the name who ever resided in town. He was a Revolutionary soldier, of marked ability, energetic, and, by good management as a farmer, was enabled, during the last half of his life, to enjoy a dignified leisure on his farm, situated about a mile from Northfield Centre, between Bean Hill and Mount Tugg. His children were Enoch, Samuel, John, Benjamin, Jesse, Rebecca and Mchitable.

Enoch became a blacksmith; settled in Northfield and afterwards removed to Columbia; had seven children. C. C. Rogers, Esq., attorney at Tilton, is his grandson.

Samuel (2d), brother of Enoch, was a tailor, noted for wit. One of his children was Deborah, who married Thomas Haynes and died in Northfield. One of her children married John S. Dearborn, of Northfield, and another, Cutting Follansby, a merchant.

John, third son of Samuel (1st), married Sally Coffran; settled upon one of his father's farms; lived and died in Northfield; was a man of ability and filled various town offices; had four children, of whom Joanna married Walter Bailey, and Jeremiah inherited his father's farm and died in Northfield.

Benjamin, fourth son of Samuel (1st), was born in 1780 and died in 1825; was a farmer, and spent his life upon the farm given him by his father, three-fourths of a mile from Northfield Centre; married Lucy Hoegg, of Bow, and through life they were prominent members of the Methodist Church. Their children were Fannie, afterwards Mrs. Simeon Kimball, of Sanbornton Bridge; Betsy R., who married John T. Gilman, of Columbia, and who, at eighty, still survives her husband; Lucy H., wife of Gilbert L. Frizzell, who died in Wisconsin; Rebecca L., who married Thomas J. Emerton, and now survives him in Wisconsin; Sally K., the wife of Ebenezer Thurston, who died upon the old homestead in Northfield; Abigail, who died in infancy; Samuel B., who married Susan K. Forrest, and was for many years a merchant at Sanbornton Bridge,—a man of integrity and ability, and who died in Northfield from the effects of lead-poison; and Benjamin A., who was born September 10, 1823.

Benjamin, after being admitted to the bar in 1845, practiced law two years in Gilmanton, thirteen at Sanbornton Bridge,—nearly five years of which he was solicitor of Belknap County,—establishing a reputation as a skillful attorney, a ready speaker and for sharp wit. Owing to a lung trouble, he went South and settled in Texas in 1860; came North during the war, and in 1863 entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Since then he has been rector of churches in Pennsylvania, Austin, Chicago, Waco, and is now rector of Grace Church, Georgetown, Texas, near which place he resides, on a valuable stock farm, which he owns and manages. During these years he has held many offices of trust and honor in church and State; has been married four times, and six children have been born to him, of whom only one, a daughter, survives.

Jesse Rogers, fifth son of Samuel (1st), was a blacksmith and lived and died in Northfield.

Rebecca and Mehitab, daughters of Samuel (1st), married and left town.

Of the great number of the Rogers name once living in Northfield, it is believed not one now remains there.

The ancestors of Wesley Knowles were among the original settlers of Northfield, coming in 1791 from Chester, N. H., settled on the David Brown place, on Bean Hill, and moved from there to Bay Hill in 1799.

The Ambrose family came from Concord.

John Cofran was a native of Pembroke, and was settled for a time in Canterbury, near the Shakers, whom his wife had a great desire to join on account of a twin-sister living there, to the great disgust of her husband, who vowed he would wean her from that notion, and accordingly sold out, removed to Nottingham, whence, after a year or two, he came to Northfield, in 1787, and bought his Bean Hill farm, where he remained till his death. His grandson, Benjamin F., still has the original deed of the place in his possession, the consideration in it being given in pounds. His son James, born in 1782, commonly called Colonel Cofran, married Ruth Hersey, inherited the farm, living there the life of a prosperous farmer and drover till the latter part of his life, when he moved to the Northfield side of Sanbornton Bridge, assisted largely in building the seminary and died in 1861, in his seventy-ninth year; had a brother, Israel Cofran, who lived in West Northfield. His son, James H., remained on the homestead, married Eliza B. Hall, and died in 1868, aged fifty. His widow now resides near Tilton.

Another son, Benjamin Franklin, lives on the Northfield side of the river near Tilton, a well-to-do farmer and respected citizen. He married Priscilla C. Chase, daughter of Benjamin A. Chase, who, with his father, carried on the filling and carding business just by the corner of the old bridge. Mr. Chase built the house now occupied by Mrs. Asa P. Cate, and his farm included all of Mount Griswold and the Joseph Hill stand. His father, whose name was Stephen, kept tavern where Benjamin Hill used to live,—in the corner where the Bay Hill road branches from the main road.

Mr. Cofran's house was burned in 1875, but rebuilt the next year.

We have thus brought these brief sketchy memoirs of the earlier families who emigrated to the hills of Northfield down to the close of the century, or to the year 1800. We think we have noted the greater number of those who came during that time from abroad.

If any have been overlooked, our excuse must be the difficulty of acquiring accurate information at this late day, the old people—the connecting links between that period and this—having all passed away, and the shortness of the time allowed us in the preparation of this article. We have done the best our limits and circumstances permitted, and it only remains for us in this connection to record the arrival of two individuals under essentially different auspices. Aaron Collins and Ebenezer Blanchard were the first two children born in the new settlement. That's all we know of the entrance of Aaron into a participation of Northfield's joys and woes; but of Ebenezer we can say that he was born in 1768, and that the attendant, Mrs. Joseph Simons, who in those years was the doctress, or midwife, for Canterbury and her colony, made them her last professional visit, her own exit following closely upon Ebenezer's advent, as she died within the year,—a sore loss in those days, when the growth of families kept pace with the growth of other productions of a new land.

What with native and foreign arrivals, the population increased to such an extent that they came to the conclusion that the colony no longer needed Canterbury's protecting hand, and that it was old and able enough to set up for itself.

Accordingly, in 1780, twenty years after the first clearing was made, the inhabitants secured an act of incorporation, and the offshoot of Canterbury became the independent and stalwart town of Northfield. We have no account of the preliminary measures taken, public meetings, speeches for or against, delays, expenses, etc.,—nothing, except that we may judge, from a vote in their first town-meeting, that Nathaniel Whiteher was the agent appointed to attend to that business.

Hereafter we must speak of Northfield in her corporate capacity, and we will commence by giving a specimen of her early town-meetings.

"RECORD OF MEETINGS, ETC.

"9. voted to Raise Six thousand Dollars to Repair high ways in Inbour at forty dollars per day.

"Said Meeting adjourned to the first of Apr. at two of the Clock in the After Noon at the Same place."

In 1780 the town tax was sixty bushels of corn. But it will be noticed that at the November meeting they voted nineteen hundred dollars to pay parish charges, and the ensuing March voted the enormous sum of six thousand dollars to repair highways, and to pay labor forty dollars a day.

The wonder ceases when we remember that the "money" spoken of was Continental currency, which had then depreciated to perhaps one-fortieth or one-fiftieth of its first value, so that the discrepancy between the first tax and the others will not appear to be so great.

It was also voted, as regards the corn, that those not bringing in their tax, that is, their corn, briskly, must pay "Collector for Collecting."

In 1782, P. Morrison was chosen "Tithing Man," and it was voted to "rais" two days' work on roads.

In 1783, John Simons was appointed "Sairvaioi," as he was for four succeeding years; also for 1789 and 1790.

D. Morrison chosen "hog-reef."

Jeremiah Blanchard was born January 10th. Mr. Dial's name is mentioned.

1784, John Simons' taxes on a valuation of £40 were £117s. 6d.

1785, town-meeting at John Simons', who next year was appointed pound-keeper and assessor.

1789, the Forrest name mentioned in records.

1791, "Voted to build a meeting-house, to be framed and raised by September, 1792."

This vote of the town-meeting, it seems, was not carried into execution; but in 1793 the town set to work in earnest. They voted again to build a meeting-house, and voted a committee of three men, namely Colonel Greeley, Squire Harper and Captain McCrillis, to pitch upon a place for the meeting-house, and a committee of five to see about size, etc., of house.

Old Meeting-House.—We come now to chronicle an important event in Northfield's history,—one of her two great public days,—the raising of what at present is called the "Old Meeting-House," only to be paralleled eighty-six years after, in 1880, by the centennial observance of her incorporation. It is singular that she should have remained without a house for public worship so long. Sabornton Square, though settled considerably later, nevertheless, for nineteen years or thereabouts, had possessed a meeting-house. Gilmanton, Canterbury, Boscawen and Salisbury were likewise thus favored, and there was no place for public worship anywhere nearer than those towns.

Since the incorporation Northfield had been steadily and rapidly gaining in population. Roads had been laid out to the Bridge, to Canterbury and to Bay, Bean and Oak Hills from the Centre, with increasing settlements on all; and as families in those days were proverbially large, it is not improbable that a greater crowd of old and young, especially of the latter, on any given occasion, could be called together in that day from the three hills mentioned and the central valley than it would be possible to assemble from the same places now.

What kept the energetic Northfielders so far behindhand in getting for themselves a capacious house for public business and public worship we are not prepared to say, but Rev. Mr. Curtice says that there was but little of the Puritan element in town at first, as compared with its neighbors; then it is possible there was some rivalry as to location. Besides, there seems to have been an increased influx of new settlers during these years, and time was needed to assimilate them with the old, and the attention of many was directed to the opening of new farms, and with the older settlers, to the exchanging of their log huts for framed dwellings, and it is possible that these settlers were a trifle poorer, as a whole, than those of the neighboring towns. No doubt the matter was discussed every year since the incorporation, but without action. But during the winter of 1792-93 the subject seems to have been taken up in earnest. Their increased population forced them to action. No private house was equal to the demands of the public business. At private parties, at husking frolics, hunting-parties, house-raising, logging bees, at all gatherings, very likely it was the chief topic; so that when they met at their next annual March meeting in 1793 all the elements were favorable for action. They voted to build said house, and, to prevent any occasion for disagreement, they chose their committee of location from out of town. That committee reported March 28, 1793, at an adjourned meeting held for that especial purpose presumably, as follows:

"We, the Subscribers, being appointed by the Parish of Northfield as a Committee to agree upon a certain spot of ground for them to build a Meeting-House, we have carefully examined the situation of S^r Parish and find the most convenient Spot to be Esq. Charles Gidden's land near his gate, a little north of Capt. Stephen Haines' dwelling-House, on said ground; we have set two Stakes for the front of said house, or as near as is most convenient.

"SAMUEL GREELEY.

"DAVID MCCRILLIS.

"WILLIAM HARPER."

December, 1793, "Voted that the meeting-house should be completed by the 1st of October, 1794."

By this time considerable enthusiasm appears to have been aroused on the subject, and it is allowable to suppose that measures were soon taken to carry the vote of the town into effect. Much of the lumber for the frame, which was of the best quality, was contributed by individuals. The spot chosen, with the land adjoining, was in after-years famous for the stories told of its huge growth of pines. One that grew on the opposite side of the road afterwards, when felled, was left in its prostrate position along the road to serve for a fence, which it did completely, as the trunk was so thick that steps had to be cut in the side to allow one to climb over. It remained a source of wonder till within a few years. Another stood close to the meeting-house whose stump, when afterwards cut, was so large that a yoke of six-foot oxen was driven upon it and turned around without stepping off; so says a trustworthy citizen of the town, he having seen it done. At the time of the raising all the space on the north of the road, from the meeting-house up the hill east to Squire Glidden's, was covered with primeval forest, and it is but fair to presume that the meeting-house lot was so covered when the selection was made.

If so, the most of that summer must have been spent in preparing the ground. This was probably done at certain intervals by bees,—i. e., a gathering of the people to work in company according to the custom of the times; on one day a tree-felling and tree-chopping bee, on another a burning bee, on another a stump pulling bee, with the united force of all the oxen in town perhaps, and finally a levelling and smoothing bee. And then the spot was ready.

William Durgin, the third of that name, sometimes styled Lieutenant Durgin, and more familiarly "Master Bill Durgin," was chosen to superintend the work. He lived at Tin Corner, Sanbornton; was then in his best years—aged forty-four—and had acquired considerable reputation as a head carpenter, having already framed the meeting-house in Sanbornton, one in Portsmouth, and other buildings, and now undertook what was to be his master-work, we think; surpassing all buildings in the neighboring towns, so far as we know, proving that, though late to begin, the Northfielders when they did build were not to be outdone. At any rate, Master Durgin accepted the invitation, and soon commenced operations. Everything was to be as near perfection as the skill then available could make it.

Nail-makers from abroad brought a forge and manufactured the nails—all first-class—on the spot. None but first-class pine was used for the boards. The shingles and clapboards were split and shaved by hand, and in the latter the holes for the nails were made by gimlets, as a safeguard against splitting.

Busily the carpenters plied their tools through the long, hot days; busily the nailers wrought; busily the shingle and clapboard-makers rived and shaved, till, just as summer was drawing to a close, Master Durgin made proclamation that everything was prepared for the raising, and the time set was the second week in September. The day of the week we are unable to name. The news spread in all directions, and on the appointed morning there was a general turnout from all quarters of the town of every age, and of both sexes. Some came with ox-teams loaded to their utmost capacity; some women on horseback with babes in their arms, and iron kettles tied behind to assist in the cooking. Provisions in great profusion were conveyed to the ground, the Hill women, of Bay Hill, contributing a cart-load of wheaten bread, which a Mr. Hill, ox-goat in hand, hauled with oxen to the place of assemblage, and, having backed the cart to the edge of the wood, where the pound is now seen, stood there the live-long day, valiantly guarding with his trusty ox-goat the wheaten treasures entrusted to his care against marauding boys that swarmed on every side. Benjamin Blanchard, the original first settler, was still living, and, you may be sure, was there, and how it must have made his brave, old eyes sparkle—he was then seventy-five—to behold on this day the magnificent results of his log-hut raising thirty-four years before! "He builded better than he knew," or expected; and if a man on that ground had a right to be proud that day, it was Benjamin Blanchard. And the progenitors of most, and probably all, of the long-standing family names in town at the present day, and of some now extinct or removed, all were there. Nor must the historian forget to mention that the barrel of rum was there—genuine, true New England; Jersey lightning was as yet unknown—set up in great state in the basement of the old Gline's building opposite, so we are told. And not only from Northfield did visitors and assistance come, but great numbers from Sanbornton, Gilmanton, Canterbury, Boscawen, Salisbury,—in some cases whole families, and remained on the ground till the third day. Elder John Crocket, for forty years pastor of the First Baptist Church at Sanbornton—his pastorate having commenced only the year before, in 1793—had responded to an invitation to be present and introduce the ceremonies with prayer. He took his station on the sill at the southeast corner of the building, with Master-Builder Durgin on his right, and the master of ceremonies, with a glass and bottle in his hand, on the left. Order is proclaimed. The prayer is made. Then the master of ceremonies, turning and pouring out a glassful of New England, presented it with due respect to the minister, who, taking it slowly, poured a portion of the contents on the ground, as a libation or drink offering; then with somewhat less deliberation poured the remainder in another direction. The glass was then refilled and passed to the master-builder, who drained the contents, and was followed by the master of ceremonies. Then the crowd was treated, and it was remarked that this part of the ceremony was conducted with much greater rapidity than the preliminary exercises had been.

After having been thus fortified, the signal was given. At once a hundred hands spring to the work. The huge, oaken timbers are seized and raised on high. Long do they tug and push and lift and pant and shout, and finally grow thirsty, and a halt is called, and again the friendly glass goes its rounds, whispering courage to one and all; and again, with strength renewed, they hoist the timbers. And so the work moves on until the dinner-hour proclaims another halt, when, seated by hundreds, on timbers, boxes, fences and ground, they wait impatiently while the cart, laden to its utmost capacity with the wheaten loaves fashioned so well by the hands of the domestic Hills of Bay Hill, is driven forward by ox-driver Hill, goat in hand. Others bring on huge piles of brown bread. Another company advances, with Mrs.

Knowles, from Bay Hill Pinnacle, at the head, who had been superintending the hissing masses of fish-hatch and fish-chowder which had been stewing throughout the forenoon in huge iron kettles suspended from horizontal poles laid on upright crooked posts, set in the ground near the edge of the wood, and between which the flames had been roaring since morning. The steaming results were now brought forward by the tugging assistants. Beans and bean-porridge were there, we know not whence; but if there's anything in a name, Bean Hill must have furnished the supply.

After dinner, a good afternoon's work succeeded, so that the body of the church was raised the first day. The next forenoon they put on the roof, and finished up the second day with games of various kinds,—as foot-races, trials of strength, such as running up the hill to the east with two bushels of wheat or rye on their backs. Then succeeded a wrestling-match for the "Honors," the Northfield men being pitted against the champion wrestlers from Boscawen, Salisbury, Gilmanton and the other towns represented. Two captains chose their men and the contest began, and was kept up with varying success till, narrowing down to a few wrestlers, it began to look as though Northfield must be driven from the ground by a powerful man from Boscawen by the name of Elliott, when the Northfield captain, as his last man, said he would bring forward a boy, and accordingly led in young Abram Simons, eighteen years old. Elliott scorned the encounter at first with one so youthful, but saw his mistake after having been thrown twice by Simons,—once at "arms' length," the other at "side hugs,"—and the "Honors" remained with Northfield. And there may the honor and "Honors" ever remain.

Other matches were tried for fun or for the rum. Thomas Simons, with a bushel of rye on his shoulders, outran a man without any load. Again, he won a race on "all fours," so many rods out and back, over a man on horseback.

In Rev. Mr. Runnels' "History of Sanbornton" I find this account of a reading-match at the same time and place, written by Mr. Jacob N. Knapp when eighty-six years of age. Mr. Knapp, then in his seventeenth year, was teaching in Sanbornton at six dollars a month and board. Says he,—

"Soon after I began my school I went to Northfield an adjoining town, to see a meeting-house raised. There I met three other school-masters. One of them, an Englishman, had in his hand a copy of Addison's 'Cato.' He proposed a trial of reading among us four instructors. The multitude heard the challenge, and formed a ring round us. The Englishman selected as the trial passage the last part of the first scene between Marcus and Portius, and read it with theatrical tone and emphasis. Next came Master Fuller, then Master Clark; then came my turn. The ring, probably in sympathy for my youth, declared loudly in my favor."

To conclude the whole in a befitting manner, Aaron Collins, the first born in town, who, as he had already immortalized himself once by becoming its first native, determined now to do it again by performing what has never been attempted before or since,—namely, as they had neglected to place a steeple on the house he enacted the part of one by climbing to the ridgepole and standing on his head, being positively the first and only example of a man's immortalizing twice in the town of Northfield.

And so the "Old Meeting-House" was raised. It was not completely finished and painted till 1800, as a date in the roof, by a painter's brush, still testifies. At first there were no means of warming the building, yet in early times this large house used to be completely filled with hearers from back gallery to pulpit.

Master Durgin did his work well, and the carpenters and nailers and rivets and shinglers needed not to fear in after-years the memory of slighted work; and old Father Knowles, who turned the banisters, turned them well. But its work is done. Its mission is accomplished. No more within its walls will be heard the mild tones of its first pastor, Rev. Liba Conant, nor the sounding-board echo the thunders of Father Corser. It stands to-day a battered hulk, still spacious indeed, with galleries and pulpit sounding-board intact, and with timbers as sound as they were ninety-one years ago, yet a shell,—windowless, doorless, floorless,—soon to be torn down and removed.

After the completion of the great church and town-house, as above described, we meet with nothing of especial importance to describe for many years. The town still continued to grow and prosper, owing to the good management of its public officials, the industry of its inhabitants and the arrival of new settlers, among whom we briefly note the following:

Elias Abbott moved from Concord, N. H., in May, 1801, and settled and died on the farm at Bean Hill, occupied so long in after-years by his grandson, Gardner S. Abbott.

Deacon G. S. Abbott now resides on the Northfield side of the river, near Tilton, in a pleasant grove overlooking the village. He has held office in the church and town.

G. A. Gorrell came to town not far from 1810 and settled on the farm next west of that of James N. Forrest, where his son Albert now lives.

Deacon Jeremiah Hall, the son of Obadiah, came to Northfield from Canterbury in 1801; had several children, among them Dr. Adino B. and Eliza B. (Cofran), and two at the West; died at Bean Hill, not far from ninety years of age. He had a younger brother Obadiah, who lived in West Northfield; had several children, one of whom—Obadiah, Jr.—was a physician, and died in Southern Ohio a few years ago, aged about forty.

The excellent and very pleasant farms at present owned and occupied by Messrs. Munroe and William Clough were purchased from Captain Samuel Gilman about the year 1802 by their grandfather, Jonathan Clough, who emigrated thither from Salisbury, Mass., and died in 1836, aged eighty-six, leaving the farms to his two sons, Jonathan and Samuel—the former the father of William, the latter of Munroe. There was quite a rivalry in barn-building in that neighborhood at one time. Captain Gilman built a barn—the first in town—a wonderful barn, so considered at the time, which barn still stands on the old place. The owner of W. H. Smith's farm determined to surpass it, and the next year built a barn twenty-five feet longer; where-upon Esquire Glidden built another with a still further addition of twenty-five feet, which gave him the superiority. It may be of interest to state that the first Methodist sermon in town was preached in William Clough's dining-room, and that his ancient Gilman-built barn was used as a Methodist Church for quite a while, later meetings being held at the house of Mr. Knowles and the school-house, and baptism was administered in Chestnut Pond. Martin Rutter was the first pastor.

Thomas S. Clough, a younger brother of Munroe, is now a resident of Paw Paw Grove, Lee County, Ill.; has a son and daughter, and is a successful farmer; but his fertile Western farm has not had the power to banish from his memory Bay Hill, the beautiful home of his earlier years. He was the first Republican representative Northfield ever sent to the Legislature.

Captain Isaac Glines came to town in 1813 from Salem, Mass., and bought a farm at the Centre, where he lived till his death, at the age of eighty-four.

In the fall of 1813 Benjamin Winslow, born in Candia, N. H., emigrated hither from London; married Miss Betsy French, also from London, the next year; bought and cleared the land and, after four or five years, erected the buildings of the farm now occupied by Mr. John S. Winslow; died in 1840. Mr. Winslow, the present occupant, has been a teacher here for several years and has held many and varied offices in town.

The intervals upon which the Crosses and Joseph Hancock settled (once a part of old Northfield, but now included within the limits of Franklin) is one of the largest and richest on the Merrimack. Here Joseph Gerrish, Esq., settled in the year 1804. He was a native of Boscawen, born in 1784, and was the son of Colonel Henry and grandson of Captain Steven Gerrish, one of the first settlers of Boscawen and a native of Newbury, Mass.

Joseph Gerrish was a man of great shrewdness, business tact and enterprise, hospitable and genial. After the War of 1812 he bought the George Hancock farm on an adjoining ridge, and thus enlarged his domains to ample size, with due proportions of upland for grazing and intervals for tillage. He had thirteen children, and was respected as one of Northfield's most substantial farmers. His wife was Susan Hancock, of Northfield. At his death, in 1851, his broad acres were divided among his three sons, Milton, Leonard and Steven, the two former taking the intervals, the latter the upland farm. Milton and Leonard still cultivate their ancestral fields, but Steven, a few years ago, sold his patrimony to John Kelley, Esq., the present possessor and well-to-do farmer.

The Foss family, in two divisions, appeared in town in its early days, and settled one on the main road and one on Oak Hill, owning a very large tract there, which for a long time was called Foss Hill. Jason is the only surviving male descendant; has been selectman for several years, and has sisters living in Sanbornton.

Dr. Keyser was one of the early settlers, but very little about him have I been able to learn; but he had a son, Joseph Smith Keyser, of general intelligence, a close observer, a good citizen, industrious, frugal and acquired a good property, but the embodiment of eccentricity, a determined old bachelor, shunned womankind, and finally turned hermit, raised but little from his land, would sell nothing, and, as far as the writer knows, was induced to break through this custom in only one instance on any considerable scale. He had kept his barn full of hay for over thirty years, refusing all applications to buy, till, at a time of great scarcity, an offer of thirty dollars, or more, a ton broke down his obstinacy; and the swallows that haunted the ancient building saw with astonishment something never seen by them before—the old barn empty. He died alone, and the fact was not discovered for several days. The filth of his dwelling showed the want of woman's hand, and his gun was found filled to the top with silver dimes.

A Miss Sally Thornton used to teach and preach in town, but when, nobody knows, so far as I have been able to learn.

Ebenezer Morrison settled in Northfield in 1814. Had the following children: Thomas L. Morrison, now living in Northfield; Robert G., organ manufacturer in Concord; Amos H., a blacksmith in Concord; Obadiah H., book merchant, Washington, D. C., died 1875, aged fifty-two; Liba C., a farmer on one of the original Hill farms in Northfield; Ebenezer, paper merchant in Washington, D. C.

Probably no individual has exercised so strong and decided an influence on the policy and politics of Northfield as the late Judge Asa Piper Cate.

Judge Cate was the son of Simeon and Lydia Durgin Cate, born June 1, 1813, in Sanbornton (now Tilton), whence, in his early childhood, his parents removed to Northfield, where he passed the remainder of his life. He was educated at the academies at Sanbornton Square, Sanbornton Bridge and Boscawen; read law with Judge Nesmith, of Franklin; was admitted to the bar August, 1838, and opened an office at Sanbornton Bridge. He was colonel of a regiment of militia for several years; was elected moderator at the annual elections from 1838 to 1874, with the exception of two years; represented the town of Northfield in the Legislature five years,—1839, '40, '64, '65, '66; was State Senator two years, 1844-45, the second year president of the Senate; was solicitor for Merrimack County from 1845 to 1851; judge of probate, 1871, '72, '73 and '74, when he resigned a few weeks previous to his death. He was candidate for Governor, 1858, '59 and '60; railroad commissioner three years; member and secretary of the board of trustees of the New Hampshire Conference Seminary ten years, and an active member and senior warden of the Trinity Protestant Episcopal Church at Tilton. He was president of the Citizens' National Bank at Tilton; a director of the B., C. and Montreal Railroad, and a liberal investor in its property. His fondness for agriculture was shown by his well-cultivated farm, his choice fruit, his well-filled and well-ordered garden. A fine specimen of the country gentleman, genial, social, highly respected by his fellow-citizens, of all degrees and politics. He died December 12, 1874, aged sixty-one years, leaving a wife (formerly Miss Clara Proctor) and two children, Clara Moulton and Abbie Josephine.

Morrill S. Moore was born in Canterbury in 1798; married Sally Hancock, of Northfield, and removed to his wife's native town, and settled on the main road, somewhere near the Alvah Hannaford place; afterwards lived on the Bean Hill road, where his five children were born. Both houses have since been burned. He died at his son's residence, in Sanbornton, in 1860.

His son Morrill married Lavina A. Huse, a native of Campton, and daughter of Daniel M. Huse, a native of Sanbornton, who, after several removals, finally settled on a pleasant farm in West Northfield, where he died in 1883.

Here Mr. Morrill Moore now resides, seemingly enjoying himself as a substantial farmer ought.

Dr. Enos Hoyt was a native of Sandwich, N. H., and came to town immediately after the death of Dr. Alexander T. Clark, which took place March 10, 1821. Dr. Hoyt resided in Northfield many years; had an extensive practice, and finally removed to Framingham, Mass., where he died.

Daniel Sanborn settled on the Hall place in 1836. His sons were Josiah Sullivan, Braley, James, Daniel, Samuel C. and John, of whom Daniel clings to the old homestead.

Joseph Clisby came to town in 1826; married, the next year, Sally Hill, of Bay Hill; built a very pleasant cottage home, surrounded by trees; set up a blacksmith's shop; hammered iron and shod horses for many years, till, compelled by rheumatism, he left the shop for the open-air work of farming. He had four daughters,—Mandana F., Maria D., Sarah C. and Clara A.,—all, with their mother, deceased, except Mandana. Mr. Clisby states that there is not a person living in District No. 1 (that is the Centre) that was there when he came, the last one dying in 1881.

John Copp arrived at Bay Hill, perhaps, about the year 1825, and settled next east of John Hill's farm. His own farm was not so extensive or valuable as his neighbor's, but it has one of the most charming outlooks in the State. He married Ruana Rollins and had two children, Evelina and John G.; all now deceased. Mr. Copp was a good farmer, fond of sport and a great mimic, so much so that had he followed an actor's calling, his mimetic ability must have given him a high reputation on the stage. Many probably still remember his "Raising of the Barn," and various comic imitations of other people. His farm, since his death, has passed into the possession of Daniel E. Hill.

Next beyond this is the farm where Henry Tebbett, Sr., lived to an advanced age, and whose son Henry studied medicine and died elsewhere after a few years' practice.

Among the later arrivals was that of John Mooney, who transferred his residence from Loudon to the Centre in 1834. Kind and social, and of a stirring nature, his person, perhaps, was the most familiarly known among his fellow-citizens; careful and economical, he accumulated a handsome property, becoming, according to my impression, the wealthiest man in the town; strictly temperate and regular in his habits, he enjoyed good health to nearly the close of an extreme old age, dying at Nashua, April 5, 1878, at the age of eighty-seven years and five months, leaving a large charitable and educational fund to the town, of which the schools and individuals are now reaping the benefits. Mrs. Mooney's maiden-name was Susan Chase. Her death occurred several years previous to that of her husband.

Celestia S. was his only child,—a woman highly esteemed for her many virtues; brilliant, scholarly, refined, of quick wit, a fine writer, with a mind stored with the rich results of extensive and varied reading. She married Hon. John H. Goodale, at present of Nashua, and died October 12, 1863, in the thirty-third year of her age.

Let us now return to Benjamin Blanchard, whom we have left so long—forty years or more—in his solitary cabin on the Wadleigh farm, but whom we have not forgotten, though our attention has been called away for a time by public transactions, and we have been kept so busy in introducing the new-comers to the notice of the reader. Mr. Blanchard has prospered, as his enterprise and perseverance deserved. His buildings are improved, his farm productive and he free from debt, all encumbrance having been removed from his land by his services in running out the boundaries of the town, and by the payment of seven hundred and fifty dollars in furs. He was a man of strong judgment, decided purpose and untiring industry, and, as was natural, had great influence in directing the destiny of the colony and town.

But a change now took place in his affairs. He was eighty, or thereabouts, and Old Age began to whisper that it was time to release himself from the burden of hard labor to which he had been subject during the most of his fourscore years. He transferred his farm to his eldest son, Edward, whom we recollect as probably bringing up the rear during the family march from the Canterbury fort to the wilds of Bay Hill. What was the nature of the transaction we are unable to say,—whether he sold the farm to his son outright, or gave it up to him on condition of receiving a support during the remainder of his life; probably the latter, as he lived with his son ever after. Besides this, he had settled his other children in good circumstances around him. Edward was destined to have a more commanding influence in town than his father ever had. He served and was captain through the Revolutionary War, was twenty-five years a selectman and was often chosen moderator of their town-meetings. "His wife was Isabella Wasson, a native of Scotland, and one of the early emigrants to Londonderry, N. H. They reared a large family of children, nine sons and one daughter, all of whom the parents contrived to settle well in life, the most of the sons on good farms in Northfield. One son, John, was an eminent school-teacher in Philadelphia, and over his remains in a cemetery in that city is a monument erected by his grateful pupils. Elizabeth, the only daughter of Captain Edward, became the wife of Thomas Chase, Sr., of Northfield," to whom his father-in-law gave a tract of land in a pleasant location, still well known as the Tom Chase place. Captain Edward sold the paternal farm on Bay Hill to "Squire" Charles Glidden, Sr., for two thousand dollars, about the year 1805, and bought a large tract of land in West Northfield; afterwards sub-divided into several homesteads, on one of which Edward built a substantial dwelling, planted apple-trees, many of which still bear bountifully, and accompanied by his father, whose wife had previously died on Bay Hill, he settled for life on what was to be known in after-years, down to the present time, as the Uncle Daniel Blanchard farm. Here Benjamin, the aged father, the patriarch, the pioneer, glided quietly along through the remainder of a peaceful and honored old age; freed from the necessity to labor, but still busy. His favorite occupation seemed to be the manufacture of white-oak ox-goads, which he used to whittle out deftly and neatly with his knife down to his last days, protecting his pantaloons by a casing of tanned wood-huck-skin, while at work. He was short and stout, wore his long, thick, white locks floating over his shoulders, imparting to him a truly venerable aspect. "Benjamin Blanchard died in the 'west-fore-room' of the 'Uncle Daniel' homestead, and it is interesting to add that Captain Edward and Uncle Daniel, great-grandfather, grandfather and father, all in successive generations, passed their last years and ended the final scene peacefully in the same home." Benjamin was buried with his wife on Bay

Hill, it is supposed, under a large sweet apple tree in the old orchard, known as the "Granny Tree." Years after, the old lady's gravestone was found among some stones hauled to repair the well, and it was said that at the building of the chimneys of the Wadleigh house, in 1812, the stone erected at the grave of Benjamin Blanchard, and marked B. B., was found among the bricks in the ruins of the old cellar.

Captain Edward, after reserving the "Uncle Daniel" farm as his homestead, gave to his son Richard what is now the Abram Brown place, to his daughter Elizabeth the Tom Chase farm, a tract to Daniel, and had, besides, the tract now known as the Gile farm, and another, the Jason Foss place.

The Uncle Daniel homestead, which at present comprises about two hundred acres, "located upon an eminence commanding picturesque beauty and grandeur, views of diversified mountain and water scenery, far and near, a spot of unrivaled attractions for a summer home," is now in possession of Mr. Edward C. Rice, a retired and successful man of business, whose wife—formerly Miss Ianthé Blanchard—is the daughter of Daniel, and the fourth in direct descent from the original pioneer, Benjamin. It must be a source of great satisfaction to be thus able to retire to one's ancestral home, so beautiful, and which has been an heirloom in the family so long. Her eldest daughter, Laura, is a fine artist in oils and crayon portraits, and has published several works, and among them a gracefully-written little book, called "Sunshine and Shade." Another daughter is Mrs. Fannie Purdy, the opera-singer and cornetist, whose songs and music at the Northfield Centennial are so well remembered still. The youngest, Miss Inez, was married within the past year, at the ancestral mansion, to Mr. Artemas Tirrell Burleigh. No one of the name of Blanchard is left in Northfield. One survivor, John, resides in California.

The "commission" of her grandfather, Captain Edward Blanchard, is still in the possession of Mrs. Rice, framed and well preserved. He was appointed "captain of the Fourteenth Company of the Fourteenth Regiment of Militia in the Colony of New Hampshire, by order of Congress, September 5, 1775. E. Thompson, Secretary; Matthew Thornton, President."

"Squire" Charles Glidden, Sr., who bought the Bay Hill Blanchard farm of Captain Edward some eighty years ago, was a leading man in his day, who died in 1811, at the age of sixty-seven. Mrs. Judge Wadleigh was a daughter of "Squire" Glidden, and inherited the Blanchard place from her father, which, at that time, was much improved, and the house rebuilt and enlarged. Mrs. Jeremiah Smith, known to the people of Northfield so long, was also his daughter. She died at the ripe age of ninety-one; and her husband, whose prosperous and useful life three additional years would have rounded out to a century, after a union with her of seventy-three years, all of which were passed on the old homestead, and having voted for every President from Washington to Lincoln, at last sunk to rest like a patriarch of old, crowned with length of days, and, like a shock of corn, fully ripe. He left three children, viz., Mrs. Mills Glidden, for many years a resident of Ohio; Mrs. William Gilman, now of Lexington, Mass., but for the most of her life an inhabitant of Northfield, a lady of culture, of vigorous intellect, a graduate of the Boston College of Medicine, whose influence has long been fearlessly exerted and felt for good on the moral questions of the time in her native town and elsewhere; and Warren H. Smith, Esq., now leading the life of a prosperous farmer, and who maintains the honor of the patrimonial estate with becoming dignity in the old family mansion, which has been renovated, modernized, improved and beautified.

Ephraim S. Wadleigh, the son of Judge Peter Wadleigh, is still the fortunate possessor of the first opened farm in town, which his father bought of Captain Edward three-fourths of a century ago, and resides thereon, a prosperous farmer and exemplary citizen. The old mansion was burned a few years since, but was promptly rebuilt and improved.

Captain Ebenezer Blanchard, the son of Captain Edward, did not appear to inherit that zest for agricultural pursuits that was a characteristic attribute of his father and grandfather, as he was engaged in other business during most of his days, beginning life with keeping tavern or a store on Bay Hill, or both, which he abandoned after the sale of the farm by his father, and removed to Sambornton Bridge, and opened a store on the Northfield side; and soon after buying the old brown two-story house which still stands opposite the southern end of the iron bridge, now more than a century old, he converted it into a family residence, and built a large store opposite, in which he traded till about the year 1808, when he removed to Franklin, or what was then Salisbury, where he resided and traded during the remainder of his life,—a period of forty years,—prospered and died. Mrs. West, his oldest daughter, died in Franklin some three or four years ago. Mrs. Kenrick, his youngest daughter, still survives in Franklin. A Mrs. Herrick is still living there, daughter of Richard, another son of Captain Edward.

Now, having tarried so long among the early fathers and gathered together the various items we could pick up here and there of their settlement, families, modes of life and manner of building and governing, with something of their official record, let us take a leisurely walk downwards, in company, through two or three scores of years, till we reach the middle of the century, and strive to catch a glimpse of the social life of our people during that intermediate period, and then, by easy transfers, work our way into the confines of the last thirty years, and note the progress of Canterbury's humble offshoot, religiously, educationally, industrially, and close by a review of the great family gathering of Northfield's sons and daughters in 1880. The present year is a very appropriate one in which to take a backward look over our little commonwealth's past history, as 1885 marks just a century and a quarter since Benjamin Blanchard lighted his first cabin-fire back of the old orchard on Ephraim S. Wadleigh's farm.

And first I would say, that from twenty-five to seventy-five years after the incorporation the rural portion of the town appears to me to have been in its most prosperous state. Village life had not grown to such proportions then; the majority of farmers were in middle life, with iron frames, strong arms and stronger hearts, with stout boys ready to assist and plenty of them, with buxom girls in equal numbers, to card, spin, weave, help mother generally, and even to rake hay, when occasion called, so that those freshly-opened farms stinted not their productions,—filling the barns with hay to bursting, and the garner with grain. The school-houses, too, though not boasting architectural beauty or modern conveniences, nevertheless held what constitutes the prime element of good schools,—an abundance of scholars, filled, crammed to overflowing, as they sometimes were.

In the second place, our fathers were less dependent upon the outside world for their sources of happiness and support than their descendants of the present day. No importations then of flour and corn from the great West, but bountiful supplies of wheat and maize were extracted from their own soil; no need to send to Manchester or Lowell for their clothing, for the whir of the wheel and the music of the shuttle were heard in every house, and the home-made blue frock of the farmer was the right royal badge of his profession. And then for social enjoyments they were not forced to tramp abroad to some other State or city to attend some formal convention or association; but instead, they had their own town or neighborhood gatherings, whether for work or good cheer; but in either case they calculated to have a "high old time," and they generally had it. Indeed, it was a general custom to make work or play a social affair—the more the merrier—when hilarity prevailed, and good cheer was in the ascendant. The men would "change works," the matrons would meet with their spinning wheels, and through the long summer afternoons would spin their thread and their gossip at an equally rapid rate. Then there were the house raisings, the shooting matches, wrestling matches, apple parings, quilting bees, sleigh ride parties and coasting parties. Spelling schools were an established institution then, when two rows of combatants stood unflinchingly and pelted one another with big or knotty words till the warriors upon the one side or the other were all slain. Then, merriest and most truly enjoyable of all, were the young people's parties of a winter's night, when "button," "Copenhagen," "bean porridge," "hot and cold" and other games made the long nights short, and the chat, and the march, and the song to grow fast and furious. The husking parties were not among the least of these festive occasions, when the farmer would have the whole of his corn harvest husked in one night, followed by a rich repast, in which the golden pumpkin pie held the place of honor.

The trainings, the militia musters and many other frolicsome times might be mentioned, but space is wanting. It is true, strong waters were sometimes too prevalent on these occasions, but it must be remembered, as some excuse, that the article then was genuine, not the modern adulterated liquors,—blu-ruin with its villainous compounds had not yet raised its accursed head to consume with henbane and other poisons man's vitals.

The aged Joseph Marden, of Lowell, writes,—

"I attended a town-meeting in Northfield in 1818. Funny time! Run on both sides of the deer, —three cents a glass! Men made some noise about 1 o'clock! I and Daniel Herrick put those old benches in the Rand school-house.

"One time we had a snow-storm. Our District went down to the Meeting House, and there met the Bean Hill team and the Mann road team. All made up their minds to go up to the Bridge. So went to Capt. Gline's fence, got a pole, tied a red flag on top, hitched on 20 yoke of oxen, and to the Bridge we went; took a little blackstrap, and the oxen hauled us for k. Going down we all stood on the sled, but coming back," he slyly adds, "some had to sit down."

Churches.—In this place it will be appropriate, perhaps, to introduce a brief account of the religious privileges of Northfield.

THE OLD MEETING-HOUSE was originally free to all sects, but in later years was occupied exclusively by the Congregationalists, who abandoned it in 1841, since which it was used for many years only for town-meetings, and is now past its usefulness altogether.

The following sketch of the Congregational Church of Northfield and Tilton was prepared by Rev. Corban Curtice, a long time pastor of the church:

"The town of Northfield was settled in 1769, and incorporated in 1789. The old meeting-house was built in 1794. The Methodist Church was organized in 1806. The Rev. John Turner was the first Congregational minister who preached in town. Rev. Jotham Sewell and the Rev. Samuel Sewell preached a number of Sabbaths each in town.

"The Congregational people for many years worshipped with other denominations and aided in supporting the preaching, but they sought church privileges at Sanderenton Square and at Canterbury. . . .

"On May 29, 1825, Mr. Liba Conant, a young minister, was ordained as the first pastor of the Northfield Congregational Church. He labored faithfully, and with a good measure of success, for about fourteen years, or till September, 1836.

"The Rev. Hazard Limes then supplied the church one year, or till September, 1837.

"Rev. Enosh Corser, for twenty years pastor of the Congregational Church at London, was then engaged to supply this church, who remained from September, 1839, through April, 1842. His labors were abundant and very successful. In 1837, and during his ministry, the present Congregational meeting-house was built and dedicated, the Society being free from debt. . . .

"Mr. C. Curtice commenced preaching here May 1, 1843, and remained through April, 1870, just twenty-seven years.

"Rev. T. C. Pratt commenced his labors here May 1, 1870, and closed them in June, 1875.

"Rev. L. T. Plunkett commenced his ministry here September, 1875.

"A Sabbath-school was organized in Northfield in 1821, which has continued to the present time, and has been the source of great good to the church and community."

The majority of the deacons of the church and of the superintendents of the Sabbath-schools were from Northfield, and of the original members, every one was from this town, and all are now dead, Dr. Enos Hoyt being the last.

Present Officers (August, 1885).—Pastor, C. C. Sampson; Deacons, J. W. Hunkins, Oscar P. Sanborn; Clerk, G. S. Abbott; Treasurer, J. W. Hunkins; Superintendent of Sabbath-School, E. G. Philbrick.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH was organized about 1804, says another authority. Joseph Knowles and wife, their son, Joseph, Josiah Ambrose and wife, Zilpha, were among the first members; also, Mr. Warren Smith's grandmother, Mrs. Glidden, who was baptized at the time that Lottie Ellis was, who then lived with Mrs. Glidden, and afterwards became the mother of Benjamin F. Butler; also Mrs. Fullerton. They were all baptized at Chestnut Pond. Mr. B. Rogers and wife, parents of B. A. and S. B. Rogers, were early members. In 1826 there was an extensive revival of religion. Among the converts were Jonathan Clough, Wesley Knowles and Betsey C. Knowles. The brick church was built about this time. Samuel Forrest was converted under the labors of Rev. George Storrs, and became an official member. The old brick church was given up, and a new house built on the Tilton side in 1856. Among the prominent ministers of that church were Revs. L. D. Barrows, D.D., O. H. Jasper, D. P. Leavett, Moses Chase, M. Newhall and George Storrs. Rev. Mr. Nutter is the present minister.

THE TRINITY EPISCOPAL CHURCH, was organized in 1860. Rev. Marcellus A. Herrick, D.D., was its first pastor, and continued such for nearly fifteen years, and to his unwaried efforts much of its prosperity is due. The society worshipped in the brick meeting-house, Northfield, till 1873, when services were held in their new and beautiful brick church, erected in Tilton, at a cost of about fifteen thousand dollars. To this church Mrs. Eames, of Concord, presented a beautiful chancel window, and Walter Ingalls a large painting. Dr. Herrick was a fine scholar, and possessed a library rich in early editions of classical works, and black-letter tomes, which the present writer has taken great interest in examining during the life of the Doctor. He was succeeded by Rev. Frank S. Harraden, Rev. Henry H. Haynes, Rev. Lucius Waterman, the present incumbent.

USTON CHURCH.—The Northfield Union Sunday-school, at present doing good service, was organized in 1875, through the efforts of Mrs. James Thompson, Willie Keniston and Moses Batchelder, who was its superintendent till his death. The library was enlarged and an organ purchased. Deacon Charles Ayers is its present superintendent.

A few years after the last organization mentioned, the inhabitants of Northfield Depot village and vicinity, finding they had outgrown their school-house capacity for religious and other public occasions, bestirred themselves to obtain more fitting accommodations.

They selected a site near the Picnic Grove. Messrs. O. L. Cross, Esq., W. A. Canfield, Esq., and Hon. C. E. Tilton donated the land; the citizens raised seven hundred dollars in money, one hundred dollars in labor, and Mr. Tilton assumed the responsibility of completing the enterprise. The work rapidly progressed. The corner-stone was laid the 24th of July, 1883, under which was placed a leaden casket furnished by Mrs. C. French, containing over fifty mementoes of the past and present, for the edification of future generations.

The enterprise was carried to a successful termination and met the approval of its most sanguine friends. "A convenient hitching-place of ample capacity, water-closets, a well of cool water and a pump, a weather-vane and lightning-rods and bell were the extras to a nicely-arranged and finished church of proper size for the place, and one that would be an ornament to any street in Laconia." This property, with a beautiful grove of several acres, with stands and seats, were all conveyed by Mr. Tilton to the town of Northfield, to be held in trust for all time. "That town, we venture to say, is the only one that owns a church, and one of the few that excludes rum from its limits." The exercises of dedication that followed were eminently satisfactory, occurring on a beautiful day, with no defect in carrying out the programme.

A beautiful Bible was presented to the church by Miss Jane Corser, of Boscawen; a handsome communion table, by Mrs. Eliza Hall Coffan; and a cloth and napkins, by Mrs. Deacon McQuestion.

Schools.—The first school-houses, of course, were made of logs, of which an example has been given on Bay Hill, and were generally private dwelling-houses. Female teachers began to be employed about 1806, and were considered competent if they had mastered the first four rules in arithmetic. In illustration of the great advance made in female education since that time, it is only necessary to point to the many young ladies graduating each year from our female colleges and other higher institutions, of which we have had a brilliant example in the Tilton Seminary near by.

The Bay Hill School, which formerly contained upwards of fifty pupils, has, during the past twenty years, often been reduced to less than half a dozen. During last year the number was eleven.

The Centre School in former days numbered sixty, sometimes reaching eighty. Here Master Gleason taught when Mr. John E. Forrest was a boy and attended school, and of which teacher many laughable anecdotes were told.

Other early teachers of the Centre were Master Morrill, of Concord; Master Bowles, Solomon Sutton, of Canterbury; Josiah Ambrose, of Northfield; Phineas Thorn and Edmund Dearborn. Miss Morrill and Nancy Glidden were among the female-teachers. It numbered last year seventeen.

In early times the school in the Hodgdon District numbered from seventy to one hundred, and John Cate, an old teacher, took oath in a certain suit that he had one hundred and ten scholars. Yet in that district, strange as it may appear, for several years past there have been no scholars large enough to attend and no school,—one of the greatest changes in a school district that I have known. Now, however, it is rising somewhat in the scale of youthful population, as last year it numbered nineteen.

Among the oldest teachers were Masters Knapp, Parkinson, Mesheeh Cate, John Blanchard and Edmund Dearborn. Among the female teachers were Nabby Abbott, Sally Hazelton and Esther Parkinson. Dudley Leavitt, the astronomer, also taught there.

In regard to our common schools, the one remarkable fact is the strange diminution in the number of children attending them since earlier times. Why is it? The population of the town is now larger. This may be accounted for in various ways. First, the young people leave at an earlier age to obtain a more advanced education in the higher schools; second, families are smaller; and third, the young grown-up people and young families leave town. Again, there is really a decrease in the population of the rural, that is, in the greater part of the town, the increase being only felt in the village of Tilton.

Still, we are glad to believe that those children who do remain, though fewer in number, have far better school privileges than their predecessors, owing to better school-houses, better books, modern methods of teaching, more school money, a more thorough supervision and a more convenient division of the town for school purposes.

There were formerly eleven school districts in Northfield, but in 1877 the town was re-districted, by which three districts were discontinued, one set off in part to Franklin and one merged in the Union District at Tilton.

All the school-houses are modern, in good repair, and well adapted to their object; furnished with good apparatus given by Messrs. Cass and Goodale from the John Mooney fund, and each school supplied with a copy of Webster's Unabridged, contributed by former pupils, some five hundred in number, as a centennial gift.

Whole number of pupils last year, one hundred and two, and about sixty in addition from this town in the Union District Schools at Tilton, making an aggregate of one hundred and sixty-two.

Northfield has patronized the seminary well, in proportion to her population, and furnished many teachers, who have done good service, the Centre District alone having sent into the field, between the years 1810 and 1855, between thirty and forty teachers.

Many of the improvements in the Northfield schools must be ascribed to the tireless industry, unflinching interest and literary influence of the present highly-efficient superintendent of schools, Mrs. Lucy R. H. Cross, to whose skillful management the present high standing of the schools in her native town is to a great extent due. A teacher herself, and well posted in her duties from an experience of eight years,—from 1878 to the present time,—she has been enabled to do a good work for Northfield, which, we trust, the citizens appreciate.

THE SEMINARY.—The New Hampshire Conference Seminary and Female College, once the pride of Northfield, as it is now of Tilton, was opened to students in the fall of 1815.

On the separation of the New Hampshire and Vermont Conferences, the former was left destitute of a school of its own, and measures were soon taken to supply the deficiency, resulting in the establishment of the seminary at Sanbornton Bridge, on the Northfield side of the river, a few rods west of Colonel Cate's dwelling, and opposite the present Methodist Church. It was a plain, unpretending brick building, forty feet wide, seventy in length, and two stories high. Hon. Samuel Tilton, Colonel Asa P. Cate, Colonel James Cofran, Rev. William Cass and others were influential promoters of the enterprise. Warren S. Hill made, and Colonel Cofran burned the brick in the old yard north of the Granite Mills. Darius Dockett superintended the wood-work and Isaac Bodwell the laying of the brick. Chartered in 1852.

The first principal was Rev. J. A. Adams, who was succeeded by Rev. Richard S. Rust, John C. Clark, Rev. James E. Latimer and Rev. C. S. Harrington; and, under their popular management, the school entered upon a prosperous career which continued until 1857, when their accommodations were found to be too small to meet the wants of their ever-increasing numbers.

East and west wings were then added, and the former building increased by the addition of a third story, thus furnishing a spacious hall for general or public exercises.

The charter of 1852 authorized a ladies' collegiate course and the title of Female College, supplementary to the former title of Seminary and its academic studies.

Five more years of successful progress had passed away, when, one cold November's night in 1862, the whole structure was destroyed by fire, and the school left without a home.

Its Northfield location was then abandoned, and another adopted on the opposite side of the river.

Since then, with new and enlarged buildings, a numerous corps of tried and popular teachers, it has been carrying on the good work of education with ever-continued success for over twenty years, each year sending forth its graduates, who have made their mark for good in every quarter of our land. It is under the control of the Methodist denomination, but has never exercised any restraint over the church preferences of its students.

The principals within these latter years have been Rev. R. M. Manley, Rev. Henry Lummis, Rev. L. D. Barrows, D.D., Rev. G. J. Judkins, Rev. J. B. Robinson and Rev. Silas E. Quimby. No one of its teachers can give the record of so long a term of service as Rev. Sylvester Dixon, professor of mathematics, who, for above twenty-five years, has been a member of the faculty.

The seed sown in 1815 has borne good fruit. What may we not expect when the fifty thousand dollar building fund, now nearly complete, shall have been transformed to a collegiate structure superior to any in the State, with its educational fund available, with its charming location and increased patronage,—in short, with all the omens favorable?

All things promise fair for extended usefulness under the new principal, Rev. D. C. Knowles.

Union Picnic Association.—A custom prevails in the neighborhood of Northfield Depot which might be imitated with advantage in other rural portions of the State. In the summer of 1875, W. C. French and Willie Keniston initiated the formation of a society, which has been the source of great pleasure and profit to all concerned in the southern portion of the town and places adjacent. This was the origin of the Union Picnic Association, which meets yearly at Hannaford's Grove for the enjoyment of social intercourse, literary exercises, singing and a collation. The experiment has met with abundant success, attracting crowds as often as the occasion comes round, and has become so interwoven in the pleasant diversions of their life that young and old look forward to these meetings as the great social event of the year.

Manufactures.—We will here introduce a brief account of the manufacturing interests on the Northfield side of the river.

Beginning at the upper dam, we come first to Warren Hill's brick-yard, bought of Deacon Andrew Gilman, where he often made two hundred thousand bricks a year, those for the first seminary building having been produced here. It was finally purchased by the railroad, and the business stopped.

The Tilton mill was owned and operated by Jeremiah Tilton, Esq., who for fifty years manufactured in it satinnet for the Boston market. He was a native of Sanbornton Bridge; learned his trade at Franklin; married Nancy Carter, of Sanbornton, in 1816. He bought the Chase carding and clothing-mill in 1820, paying for stand and four acres of land and water privilege four hundred dollars. He lived in the upper story, was burned out twice, and each time rebuilt and enlarged; was associated for many years with his son, Jeremiah C., the two conducting a business of ten thousand dollars a year.

He sold to James Bailey about 1860, two years before his sudden death in Boston. The property then passed into the hands of Messrs. Ballantyne and Fletcher, the former a son-in-law of Mr. Tilton, Sr., who has added a third story to main building, with various other extensions and out-buildings, and changed the name to Granite Mills, where a business amounting to one hundred thousand dollars annually is now being carried on, ladies' dress-goods being the chief articles manufactured.

Deacon Jeremiah Hall moved to a place near Tilton in 1829, and for many years carried on the tannery business near his house, which was burned, leaving the tannery, which for many years was used as an ice-house, just below the old Chase tavern; built a new steam-mill below the freight-depot, near where Buel's hosiery-mill now stands; was associated with his son, Ebenezer, who eventually sold out to Ebenezer Morrison & Sons. This tannery was afterwards burnt and never rebuilt.

A few rods west, towards the bridge, Joseph Wadleigh, son of Esquire Wadleigh, of Bay Hill, carried on the tin business till his death. Almost adjoining was the building long known as the "Seven Nations," in one section of which a store was often kept by William Follansbee and others.

A building was erected at the entrance of the bridge and occupied as a drug and book-store, with offices above. James H. Brown, of Andover, traded there. Burned about 1858.

A long, two-story building stood for many years opposite the entrance of the bridge, owned and occupied by Isaac Whittier, Esp., as a store. The upper story was used for a while by a Miss French, a famous instructor of those times, who taught a young ladies' school, at which attended the élite of Sunbornton Bridge and Northfield, and into which, by especial favor, a class of boys and young men was admitted. The town clerk's office for many years was kept here.

This store was burned and rebuilt by Thomas Chase and sold to Warren Hill, and occupied by Deacon Peabody until succeeded by J. F. Taylor & Hill. This was also burned.

At the west entrance to the bridge stood for many years the carding and fulling-mill established and owned by Benjamin Chase, who also owned the farm and built the buildings so long occupied by Hon. Asa P. Cate, and still held by his heirs. This was for many years the only establishment of the kind for fifteen or twenty miles. Farmers came from Loudon, Canterbury, etc., often on horseback, with their wool to be carded. This business declined after the factories were established, and after being carried on for several years by Moses Morrill, the manufacture of shoddy was begun there by James Earnshaw and continued till the building was burned. A new grist-mill took its place, which was also burned several years after. On this site—dam No. 2—Hazen Copp, in 1872, built a large mill, one hundred feet long, and leased it to Richard Firth, who is now running it with three sets of cards, producing ladies' dress-goods. Annual production, about seventy-five thousand dollars.

On dam No. 3 is the hosiery-mill erected by George S. Buel & Co., who in 1880 built a three-set mill, and are now running a hosiery mill. Annual production, about seventy-five thousand dollars.

The saw-mill in which Joseph Dearborn manufactured lumber for many years, standing by the lower dam and old bridge, has been torn away.

The Chase tavern, still standing at the entrance to the Bay Hill road, was kept for many years by Esquire Chase, who, with his son, owned the hill on which now stands the Tilton Memorial Arch, also the residence of Joseph Hill.

At Northfield Centre for many years there was a post-office. A store also was kept by Squire Glidden. This was a jolly place, indeed, where, during the long winter evenings, his many customers gathered; for the barrel of New England in those days was ever on tap. It was here that the corpse of old Mr. Danforth was taken, after having been exhumed from his grave by lawless medical students, set upright in a chair and an ox-goad put into his hand. Here practical jokes were perpetrated enough to fill volumes.

Northfield Depot has also boasted of a store and post and telegraph facilities nearly all the time since the opening of the Montreal Railroad; the former having been kept by A. & Charles Ayers, Amos Cogswell, Merrill Moore and at present by William Keniston. The post-office was for several years discontinued, but afterwards re-established through the efforts of S. A. Dow, who still holds the office.

The part of Northfield now constituting Franklin Falls village was also well supplied with shops, stores, a paper-mill and factory.

The manufacture of palm-leaf hats was for many years an almost universal occupation of the women and children of the town, many families supporting themselves by this branch of industry and increasing greatly the business of the merchants. The leaf for some time was brought in the rough and split and otherwise prepared at the old store-room of Captain Glines opposite the old meeting-house. This industry has been almost wholly superseded by the seaming sent out by the many hosiery-mills.

General Remarks.—In old times it seems to have been an article of implicit belief that roads must be laid out at right angles with each other, never avoiding a hill however steep. An innovation was made on this custom in after-time, when the new road to Bay Hill was opened and which recently was extended by private enterprise to Bean Hill. Another road was opened from the lower part of Tilton village past the freight depot towards the Centre, thus opening up a large tract for settlement which is fast being occupied by fine residences, near which, on the one side, is the trotting park, and on the other, a little farther away, is the Memorial Arch.

Witches were never abundant in Northfield, only two being mentioned as decidedly belonging to that profession, whose names we hardly dare mention, lest they avenge themselves by making the writer a visit in their old familiar guise of a large white cat, and pass an interdiction on the appearance of the butter at his weekly churning. Old Mr. Danforth, to be sure, did appear to his boon companions after death, at the Glidden store, but that was hardly in the nature of witchcraft, and I can say this in good old Northfield's favor, that, notwithstanding all my researches on the subject, I have never been able to discover that a witch has ever been hung within her borders.

There are now twelve persons in town over eighty years of age.

The original Oak Hill School-house was entirely without windows,—no glass to be had.

In old times the big boys had a custom, on the last day of school, of selling the school-ashes and investing the proceeds in rum, and having a high time, and many a story might be told of the result.

Many laughable things might also be said, had we space, about the catching of eels, the stealing of eels, and the catching of the stealers.

Edward Blanchard was the first selectman of Northfield and the first captain. Esquire Glidden was the first representative.

Northfield's Overflow.—During the first sixty years of Northfield's existence its population steadily and rapidly increased, owing to the income of new settlers and the advent of new children, and the increase was more largely due to the second cause than to the first during the latter part of that period. Families were families in those days. In proof, let us introduce a few.—

Joseph Gerrish had 13 children; Charles Keniston, 15; Isaac Glines, 13; William Davis, 16; William Forrest, 14; Steven Cross, 13; Benjamin Blanchard, 9; Deacon Sawyer, 22.

What family in town can now produce the smallest of these numbers? No wonder our schools dwindle, when a family of one is considered a curiosity, three a wonder, and half a dozen an unheard-of thing. And there has been a steady decrease in the population, except in the village, during the last half-century; so much so, that we are tempted to believe that the strictly rural districts of our little commonwealth contain not more than half the people they once did. On every old road buildings have been removed or torn down, but in most cases burned and never rebuilt, traces of which are scattered all over town. Not to speak of the cellars of the old settlers, on Bay

Hill, which are still to be seen, there are on the road leading from the Centre to Bean Hill—a mile and a half—nine cellar-holes, all the dwellings connected therewith having been burned and not rebuilt; twelve cellar-holes in Oak Hill District, and no less than eighteen on the main road from Canterbury to Tilton, including Windfall road and others elsewhere.

Every farm but three in No. 1 (that is, the Centre) has passed from its owner of twenty years ago, and the same is true, to some extent, in other portions of the town, notably so on the road from the Hodgdon School-house to Northfield Depot.

A greater loss than that of buildings, or of the territory which Franklin has taken, and one far more to be deplored, has been the constant drain for the last half-century of our young men, notably of our young farmers, to the cities, and especially to the far West.

Some of the town's best life-blood has been lost in this way. Had all remained, and divided and subdivided her large farms into smaller ones, and employed on them the same energy they have displayed elsewhere, what a garden Northfield might have been, and what full school-houses in this year of 1885! Her capabilities for sure and profitable farming are not yet exhausted. Her upland is among the best in New Hampshire, and we predict a time will come when a return tide will set in towards our beautiful hills, and their productive resources developed in a tenfold degree.

Yet to the professional man, or those following other vocations than farming, this place might not offer so desirable a field of action. Accordingly, some of Northfield's talented sons have sought other fields of labor, and there achieved success and a name.

Dr. Richard Malone emigrated to Illinois years ago and became a member of Congress, with a full measure of success in other respects, we presume.

One of Northfield's worthy sons who sought a home in a neighboring State was Dr. Adino B. Hall, son of Deacon Jeremiah Hall, who, after having completed a medical course, and practiced for a time in Natick, Mass., studied a year in Paris, and finally settled in Boston, where he soon obtained a large and lucrative practice; was a member of the School Board for many years, delivered an address on music on the occasion of a children's festival in Faneuil Hall, acquired a respectable competency, and died April 21, 1880, aged sixty, respected and regretted by all who knew him, and leaving behind a reputation for geniality, kindness and professional skill that would place him among the foremost in the city.

His accomplished lady (now Mrs. Cummings) has decided to devote a portion of the property left by him to the literary benefit of the people of his native town and Tilton by the erection to his memory of an elegant library building, at a cost of some fifteen thousand dollars, to be located on the Northfield side and not far from the banks of the beautiful river he knew so well.

Another of Northfield's worthies is Charles G. Chase, son of Benjamin Chase, who, after reaching maturity, removed to Boston, engaged in the wholesale mercantile business, acquired wealth, and then like a wise man placed himself beyond the reach of the fluctuations and risks of trade by withdrawing from the business, and is now leading the life of a retired gentleman of leisure on his estate near Boston. Accompanied by his wife, a lady of culture and literary tastes, he has made the tour of Europe, we think, twice and has donated to the Union Church at Northfield Depot a well-selected library of nearly two hundred volumes. Long may his banner wave!

Still another of our town's enterprising sons, who went abroad to seek his fortune, is William F. Knowles, born on the pinnacle of Bay Hill, the son of Father Knowles, who turned the old meeting-house banisters so well. He was in the employ of the wealthy firm of Beebe & Co., Boston, twelve years, and is now New England agent of the Western Trunk Line Association, and chairman of the New England Agents' Committee.

Centennial.—June 19, 1880, was a proud day for Northfield; perhaps her proudest. The only day that could possibly rival it was that of the old meeting-house raising, four-score and six years before. But the crowd on that distant day was composed largely of visitors from the neighboring towns; and of the inhabitants of Northfield at that time, not many were born there; so that of all the multitude that saw the huge timbers of the frame go up, probably not one-tenth were natives of the town; whereas, on her glad memorial day of five years ago, not only was the gathering greater, but to a large extent was composed of natives or the descendants of natives. It was Northfield's centennial birth-year, she having begun her corporate existence just one hundred years before by the act of incorporation, June 19, 1780.

The day was auspicious; all that could be desired, warm and cloudless.

The executive committee, which was composed of the following, viz., J. E. Smith (chairman), O. L. Cross (secretary), F. J. Eastman (treasurer), William C. French, James N. Forrest, Mrs. John S. Winslow, Mrs. William H. Clough, Mrs. William C. French, Mrs. Lowell M. French, and Mrs. John S. Dearborn, had perfected the arrangements of their program so thoroughly in all its details that the exercises were carried to a very successful termination.

"At an early hour the place of meeting, Hannaford's Grove, at Northfield Depot, assumed its festal attire under the direction of those skillful decorators, Hiram Stroeter and Mrs. D. C. Tibbets." The people began to assemble about eight o'clock, and kept increasing in numbers until the afternoon. Trains from above and below brought crowded cars, and over six hundred carriages, it was said, reached the grounds from the adjoining towns and portions of Northfield, and between three thousand and four thousand souls were supposed at one time to be present. The exercises were conducted in accordance with the following

Reading of Letters from Former Residents	O. L. Cross, Esq., Secretary Town Com.
Music	By the Band.

Then followed the presentation of a copy of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary to each school district in town, by Mrs. Cross, through whose efforts the funds for that purpose had been raised, by soliciting contributions from former pupils. Next followed short speeches by former residents, the most prominent of which were those by Hon. Jeremiah Hall, of Portsmouth, Marshall P. Hall, of Manchester, and Hon. Daniel Barnard, of Franklin; also, Mrs. Nancy Smith Gilman gave a characteristic and ringing speech about the olden times. President of the day, A. S. Ballantyne; J. E. Smith, marshal.

It is safe to say that representatives of most, and, perhaps, every family of early times were present,—the Blanchard, Glidden, Hancock, Smith, Forrest, Hall, Chase, Conant, Simonds, Gerrish, Rogers, Cate, Clough, Hill, Haines, Dearborn, Foss, Brown, Winslow, Eastman, Hannaford, Cross, Keniston, Gilman, Sawyer, Sanborn, Hodgdon, Coffran, Glines, Wadleigh, French, Gile, Moore and others which we do not now recollect.

On reviewing the proceedings of the day, it is interesting to note the difference in the modes of enjoyment adopted on the first great public occasion and the last—the raising and the Centennial. At the former the chief amusements were games, betting, trials of strength or skill, as running or wrestling, with frequent applications to the barrel of New England; while at the latter they were mostly literary or musical. And though no Collins was found, as on the former occasion, to stand on the ridgepole of the highest house in town on his head, yet, when night approached, it was certain that all could stand firmly on their feet. Indeed, a more orderly company of equal numbers was never gathered together on any public occasion. It is our firm belief that there was not a tipsy person on the grounds during the day. In Northfield, to her credit be it said, the ardent is not to be had.

In only one thing did the two gatherings agree,—

there was a dinner in both cases; for the wants of the body are the same at all times, and man must eat in whatever age he lives. On which of these particular occasions the prize of superior excellence in cookery should be awarded, it would now be hard to tell; but of their extra skill in the culinary art in modern times, the writer claims to be a reliable witness, he having had the honor, when young, of teaching no less than five winters in the good old town, and during a portion of the time enjoyed the delights of "boarding round."

Finally, the long, eventful day came to an end, as all days must; and as the sun approached his setting, the tired participants in a festival, the like of which they would never see again in their native town, began quietly to depart singly or in parties. Old acquaintances separated, many never to meet again, the sounds died away, the crowd grew less, and when night threw her dark mantle over the Hannaford Grove it was entirely deserted. The few inhabitants left at the Depot village were soon and gladly buried in slumber, and the stars shone brightly down, as once they shone one hundred and twenty years before on the slumbers of the family of the first settler during their first night's rest in the narrow clearing and lonely cabin of Benjamin Blanchard.

Friends of Northfield, my work is done; would it were better done. But the application to write came late, and the time was limited. Acknowledgments are due to Mrs. L. R. H. Cross for assistance in gathering historic material; to the Merrimack Journal for information respecting the Blanchard family; and to many friends who have furnished for me important facts.

That prosperity may attend good old centenarian Northfield, and her worthy sons and daughters, even to the dawn of her next centennial, is the fervent wish and confident expectation of their humble servant,

THE AUTHOR.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

LUCIAN HUNT, A.M.

Once on a time three brothers migrated from Amesbury, Mass., and settled in New Hampshire. Two of these, Humphrey and William Hunt, went to Guilford, while the third, Philip, Sr., removed to Sanbornton, into what was afterwards called the "Hunt Neighborhood," about midway between the Square and Union Bridge. He had twelve children. Of these, the oldest, Philip, Jr., remained on the homestead till his death. Eleven children were born to him, of whom Anthony Colby, the father of the subject of this sketch, was the seventh. When only eighteen years of age he married Mary Chase, of Deerfield, N. H., about two months younger than himself—a woman of strong character, industrious, careful and conscientious. This union lasted above half a century, he surviving to the seventy-fifth year of his age, and she to the eighty-seventh. After residing in Gilmanton, Sanbornton and the Wiers—a year or two in each,—the family, with others, took up its march in quest of a home in a neighboring State.

Between two ranges of the Green Mountains, in the northern part of Vermont, lies the romantic town of Woodbury, sparsely settled, full of ponds, hilly, yet with an excellent soil wherever the rocks allow it to be reached. Near the southern border, some four hundred feet in height, rises a perpendicular cliff called Nichols' Ledge. Between this and Cabot extends a plain about a mile in width, then covered with primeval forest, whither emigrated from Sanbornton and vicinity, about the year 1815, a colony of from twenty-five to thirty persons, and among them Anthony C. Hunt and wife, with several of his wife's relatives.

Mr. Hunt at first built a log house, in which Lucian was born, a few rods south of the big ledge, and a few years later, a framed house, still nearer the mountain, the birth-place of his daughter, Almira. His eldest daughter, Sarah, and his eldest son, Lucian, who died in his fifth year, before the birth of his second son, were both natives of Sanbornton.

Their life here was such as was generally experienced by first settlers in New England. Trees were felled and burned on the ground, and from their ashes a kind of potash—or salts, as it was called—was manufactured. This and maple sugar were the principal exports, and their backs the only means of transportation.

The settlement seemed to flourish for a time, but what with hard labor, few and distant markets, the want of the necessaries—to say nothing of the luxuries—of life, discouragement crept in, and one by one the settlers sought other homes, until Mr. Hunt and family were left alone. He struggled manfully a few years longer, but finally yielded, like the rest, and removed to Cabot, whence, after having passed seventeen years in Vermont, he returned to Sanbornton. Thus ended the Sanbornton exodus. Not a house, no memento, except the old cellars, scattered over what is now a broad pasture, remains to tell of the once bustling little New Hampshire colony of Woodbury, Vt.

On leaving Cabot, Mr. Hunt went first to Union Bridge (now East Tilton), whence, after a residence of four years, he removed to Sanbornton Bridge, where Lucian, the subject of this sketch, eagerly availed himself of the advantages there afforded for acquiring an education. He was an incessant reader, and long before he had fairly settled himself down to a regular course of school study had acquired a very respectable fund of information in regard to history and general literature. At school, or privately, he was fond of taking up one study or branch at a time, and pursuing it till his curiosity or ambition was satisfied in that particular direction. Thus he commenced Latin one Spring, and, confining himself to that, finished Virgil during the ensuing autumn. He also became somewhat noted in those days as a swimmer, in which noble art he used to consider himself a match for any in the State, and by which accomplishment he has had the good fortune to save several persons from drowning in the course of his life. His favorite mode of exercise has ever been walking, and this at times has carried him considerable distances. The walk which seems to have afforded him the most pleasure was one from the Bridge to the top of Mount Washington and back, which he took in company with a fellow-teacher, calling from time to time at farm-houses for rest and refreshment, at one of which the mistress would take nothing for payment, as she said, "She never lost anything by giving to the poor." At another they were each charged twelve cents for a good supper, lodging and breakfast. Verily that was the day of small prices. They stopped one night at Centre Harbor, another at the foot of Chocorua Mountain, and the good part of a day on the Sandwich Plains, among the blueberry pickers—who had come from far and wide with their families—and some were pretty large,—ox-teams, bushel baskets, and where they remained day after day, many of them, till the berry season was over. Proceeding they reached the Notch just at dusk, amid a fearful thunder-storm, which served as a grand introduction to this gate of the mountains, and which attended them with its lightnings and crashings till they reached the hotel, at ten o'clock.

Lucian once had the right side of his face filled with gunpowder from a horse-pistol at short range which powder employed a doctor one long summer afternoon to extract kernel by kernel. While still young, a boy, he received a commission in a somewhat notable military company of the time—"The Phalanx"—with Willis Russell, commander. To this, one fine day, the ladies of Sanbornton Bridge, in long procession, presented a beautiful flag through the hands and voice of Miss Betsy Kelley, then preceptress of the academy. Lucian was appointed to receive the same, and to respond in behalf of the company, all which was duly published in the local papers of the time, from the pen of the Hon. Asa P. Cate.

Lucian commenced teaching when sixteen years of age in the Bay Hill District, Northfield. After a second winter here, he taught in succession one winter at Webster, three in Centre Northfield, three in Natick Mass., and one at Kingston. During all this time he was ardently prosecuting his studies. He had read Latin, his favorite study, far beyond the college course, a suitable amount of Greek, many volumes of French and German, besides most of the English branches required by the college curriculum. He attained to this mostly by his own private efforts, without pecuniary assistance from any quarter, paying his way as he went along, and thus keeping entirely clear of debt. When the funds from his winter's teaching gave out, he went to Boston in the summer and earned enough to float him over the rest of the year; so that, when he started in his profession, he was even with the world, with no debts to harass, or interest to eat up his earnings. This road to an education is longer, indeed, as it proved to be in his case; but it was sure and safe. He received his degree from the Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., in 1863.

About this time Mr. Hunt was invited to take charge of the Marlow (N. H.) Academy. This school, which had become much reduced—the pupils at the start barely amounting to twenty—after passing into his hands, increased rapidly and steadily, till at the close of the second year, it numbered one hundred and forty members, mostly adults, as a large class of smaller scholars were necessarily refused admittance from the want of accommodations. The third year was also one of continued prosperity. Such and so rapid a revival of a run-down academy we believe to be unexampled in the record of New Hampshire schools.

This unexpected success and liberal addition to his exhausted finances determined Mr. Hunt's vocation, and in the following spring he accepted an invitation to the High School of Castine, one of the oldest and most romantic little seaports on the coast of Maine, where he remained two years, receiving a generous increase of salary the second.

Next succeeded a two years' principalship of the academy in Standish, Me., where Mr. Hunt's good fortune was crowned by securing as a partner of his joys and sorrows Miss Caroline Higgins, one of the noble women for which that region is famous—social, kind, cheerful and generous.

After a two-years' rest Mr. Hunt became seated in the principal's chair of Powers Institute, Bernardston, Mass., where his predecessor had sunk the school to less than a dozen pupils. At the close of his five years' engagement he could point to nearly one hundred and twenty members then belonging to the institute. Though strongly urged by the trustees to continue his engagement for another five years, he preferred to heed a louder call from Falmouth, Mass. Here, as principal of Lawrence Academy, he remained twelve years, where he introduced improved educational methods, and, in fact, effected a revolution in the old academy, and with beneficial effect on the public schools of the town.

Yielding to the urgent request of the trustees of McCollom Institute, Mount Vernon, N. H., Professor Hunt took charge of their institution, which, after pursuing his vocation two years longer, he recently resigned, in order to carry out a purpose of his, formed many years ago, to devote what might be left of his life to literary pursuits.

He is a trustee of McColton Institute, and of the New Hampshire Conference Seminary at Tilton. In 1880 he delivered an historical address at the Northfield Centennial, which was published in the Granite Monthly. Also, in June, 1885, he gave an address before the alumni of the Conference Seminary at Tilton.

Professor Hunt furnishes an example of the teacher, student and financier combined, and in all has achieved success. His favorite studies have been the ancient and modern languages—especially the Latin, French and German—ancient and modern history, English literature and education.

And now, having wielded the pedagogic's scepter for a third of a century, blessed with good health and a competency, and possessing one of the most valuable private libraries in New Hampshire, containing nearly three thousand volumes of well-selected works, and among them several hundred in the French and German languages, he proposes to realize his long-cherished design to retire and pass the remainder of his days in rural employments and the companionship of his books, where himself and lady would be most happy to receive the visits of their many friends in Maine, New Hampshire and Massachusetts. May the blessing of heaven rest upon them in their retirement!

DR. A. B. HALL.

Adino Brackett Hall was born in Northfield, N. H., October 17, 1819. He was the son of Jeremiah and Hannah (Haines) Hall, and the seventh in descent from Richard Hall, of Dorchester, whose son Richard settled in Bradford, Mass., in 1673, and was made freeman in 1676; he was chosen one of the first deacons of the church of Bradford, and held that office till his death, March 9, 1739. His son Joseph, born February 19, 1689, was a deacon of the church in West Bradford, and had nine children, of whom Ebenezer, born 1721, removed to Concord, N. H.; was a farmer and selectman, and married Dorcas Abbott, the first white girl born in Concord.

Of Ebenezer Hall's twelve children, Obadiah, born October 13, 1748, married Mary Perham, of New Ipswich, N. H., November 3, 1779, and had seven children. Jeremiah Hall, their fourth child, born October 18, 1777, married, September 15, 1801, Hannah Haines, of Northfield, N. H.; was forty years a deacon in the Congregational Church, and had six children. Adino Brackett Hall was the youngest of this family.

Dr. Hall was also seventh in descent from George Abbott, one of the first settlers of Andover in 1633. George Abbott lived and died on the farm owned now by John Abbott. "His son, Thomas Abbott, (born May 6, 1666, died April 28, 1728), lived on the west side of Shawshene River. The farm remained in the family a century. He taught his children to reverence the Sabbath and keep it holy, and make the Bible their only rule of faith and practice.

"Edward Abbott, son of Thomas, was one of the proprietors of Pennacook, now Concord, N. H., one of the first selectmen and useful in town business. His house was a garrison, and stood on the west side of Main Street, south of the brook that runs between the State-house and court-house. The first white female and the first white male born in town were his children." Of these children, Dorcas, born February 15, 1728, married, June 17, 1746, Ebenezer Hall, and became the mother of Obadiah Hall, grandmother of Jeremiah, and great-grandmother of Dr. Hall, the subject of this sketch.

Dr. Hall was educated at the academy of Dyer H. Sanborn and at Dartmouth College. After leaving the medical school he began directly to look for a place to begin practice, and used often in later years to tell, with infinite relish, the difficulties attending his first settlement. He had heard of an opening in Kingston, Mass., for a young physician, and, taking a sleigh, he proceeded, with a friend, to investigate the town. Half-way on their journey they came to bare ground; but, borrowing a buggy, they went on. Arriving at Kingston, they called on the various potentates, and met the encouraging response that if the new doctor could practice homeopathy, he might succeed. Nevertheless, he settled there, and, though he remained but three years, he won such confidence that critical cases in Kingston were submitted to his care until the close of his life. His desire to relieve suffering gave him courage to allow cold water, in teaspoonfuls, to his first case of typhoid fever. The older doctors were aghast at such frightful presumption, and said he had killed the patient; but the man recovered, and the comfort of the new treatment was so great that he was called to all the typhoid cases the next year. He was also one of the first to administer ether, and he was never afraid of anything because it was new. From Kingston he went to Natick, where he had previously taught, and in 1852 he began study in the hospitals of Paris. For two years he followed Nelaton, Roux, Rostan,—those great physicians and surgeons who have made this century illustrious by their services to mankind.

October 7, 1854, Dr. Hall settled in Boston, where, for twenty-six years, he lived the active and self-denying life of a physician in full practice. He was born for a doctor, his uncles were doctors, his older brother was of the same profession, and he himself, in his childish plays, was always beside a sick-bed. Joined to this love of medicine, he had courage, good sense, great kindness of heart, a genial presence and unflinching courtesy. He was destitute of that quality which bears the name, in America, of "brass," and one of his brother physicians said of him that "he didn't know what conceit was." He was satisfied to be quietly and continually doing good, and receiving the constant love and trust of many whose dearest friend he was. None but a physician can know the toil of such a life; and perhaps no one else can know such a reward.

Dr. Hall volunteered to go to McClellan's army before Richmond, when surgeons were needed in the spring of 1862. He contracted malarial fever in those swamps, from which he was never entirely free. He served the Massachusetts Medical Society as counselor for twenty-five years, and the same length of time he was an active member of the school committee. Dr. Hall married, in 1864, Mary, eldest daughter of Rev. J. P. Cowles, of Ipswich.

Friday, April 16, 1880, he attended three cases of labor, leaving the last one at 5.30 p.m. Heated and fasting since morning, the east wind gave him a fatal chill. He died of pneumonia the following Wednesday, April 21st. His fatal illness made apparent the sense of what he was, and what was lost by his death. Dr. Hall, like his mother, was proverbial for his kindness to the poor; it is still told of her that the saddest sight at her funeral was the group of poor women looking into her open grave. Each morning of Dr. Hall's illness a crowd gathered on the sidewalk, and refused to move on at the policeman's bidding till he had asked how the doctor was. Some waited patiently, like beggars, before the back windows, only to say, "My wife wants to know how the doctor is."

"And after he had served his generation, by the will of God, he fell on sleep."

JEREMIAH SMITH, ESQ.¹

Probably no name is more familiarly known among English-speaking people than that of Smith; and poor indeed is that town, especially in the United States, that cannot number one or more among its inhabitants. It also has the flavor of antiquity about it, since it must have sprung into being while the Teutonic race was as yet undivided, perhaps before it left the heights of Armenia, as it is found in a direct or modified form in all the various subdivisions of that most energetic of the national families of the world. If Darwin's theory of the survival of the fittest be correct, it follows that the originators of the name Smith must have been not only the fittest, but the strongest among all who have been honored as founders of family appellations, as, so far as we know, the name is more common than any other among the whole Caucasian race.

New Hampshire is no less favored than her sister States with a generous sprinkling of the time-honored name, more or less abundant in nearly every town within her borders.

But among them all, no one is more deserving of mention by the town historian, or more worthy of remembrance in an especial degree by the citizens of Northfield, as one of its model farmers, earlier settlers, its oldest inhabitant, an upright citizen and one whose official record in town was second to none, than the subject of this sketch.

Jeremiah Smith was the son of William and Dilly (Clough) Smith, and born in Old Hampton, N. H., March 10, 1770. His father originated in Canterbury, N. H., and mother in Kingston, N. H., so that the family is of true New Hampshire stock several degrees back.

He came to Canterbury when a boy, and lived with Colonel Jeremiah Clough till twenty-one years of age, when, having reached his majority, and consequently become his own master, he concluded to follow the example set by so many other Canterbury people, and seek his fortune further north, in what then seemed to be the land of promise to the Canterburyites,—the sunny and bonny hills of Northfield. This was in 1792, two years before the great raising of the old meeting-house, in 1794, of which a full account is given in the history of Northfield.

Northfield then was in the full flowing tide of growing prosperity, and no doubt held out great attractions to the young adventurer; but little did he imagine, I surmise, when his walk from Canterbury had brought him to Bay Hill, that he had so soon found his life-haven, where he was to be anchored safely and happily for seventy-seven long years additional to those with which his manhood began. And little did he guess, when he called at Squire Glidden's, and engaged to work for him at seven dollars a month, and saw the sprightly Betsy of thirteen, that he had found his life companion, who for nearly three-quarters of a century was to share with him whatever, weal or woe, Northfield had to bestow. But so it was to be. She was born February 17, 1778, and after five years of faithful service on his part, when she was eighteen and he twenty-six, the father, Squire Glidden, and his daughter, Betsy, were so well satisfied with him and his work that the latter and he were united in marriage in the year 1797.

They first established their home at Bean Hill, on the farm afterwards owned by Messrs. Mills Glidden, Anthony C. Hunt, Morrill Moore, and which at present is in the possession of Mr. Clark. It was a rugged farm of about sixty acres, with a hard wood and hard, compacted soil, with a plentiful sprinkling of rocks, a rather steep slope to the north, and in a region of powerful thunder-storms. Neighbors were few and far between, for this was in the earlier days, and the roads were rough and the passers-by few. But Mr. Smith and his young wife had two talismanic virtues, which, ever since man learned the art to accumulate, have been powerful agents to evoke wealth from the hardest soil, and amid the most forbidding circumstances,—industry and economy.

¹By Prof. Lucian Hunt.

They worked early and late, reduced expenses, saved the pennies, enjoyed perfect health, and, as a consequence, rose slowly, it may be, but surely, in the scale of social, financial and political importance as the years went by. Would that the young of the present day—alas! too many there are who need it—might profit by the very worthy example set before us by our hard-working and closely-saving ancestors! His was one of the big barns of the town,—an aristocratic barn for the times,—and yet the writer has been told, that this barn used to be filled, year after year, to the very eaves with hay and grain; and it is but fair to presume that a rich herd of stately oxen, cows, young cattle and sheep filled the spacious south-side yard, and were bountifully fed from its high-heaped contents. At Bean Hill all their children were born, except Warren H. and Mary Elizabeth.

Here they lived about sixteen years, till the death of Esquire Glidden, when, the homestead falling to Mrs. Smith by inheritance, they transferred their residence from Bean to Day Hill, built a new house, made additions to the already extended barn, and there, on the ancestral fields, passed their years of strength and decline, prolonged to a period vouchsafed to few, enjoying in full measure the blessings that flow from agricultural pursuits, the hopes and fruition of seed-time and harvest, pride in their growing family, and the increasing respect and town-honors bestowed by their fellow-citizens. The farm,—formerly called the Robert Perkins farm, as he was its first settler and the first clearing on it was made by him, still in possession of the family,—with its abundant timber and wood and extensive meadow, is, I suppose, considered the most valuable within the present limits of the town, and in those early days must have poured forth overflowing harvests.

Though Mr. Smith, through mistaken kindness or friendship, by becoming bondsman, lost all his property at two separate periods of his life, yet, by the force of a strong will and unflinching perseverance, assisted by conjugal energy, he rallied, regained the lost ground, and at the end of life left a handsome property to his children. The confidence of his fellow-townsmen in his integrity and business capacity is shown by his election as selectman, year after year, and representative, and to other offices.

Mr. Smith, as we remember him, was rather striking in his personal appearance, with a presence well calculated to arrest the attention of the most casual observer,—stalwart in form, with marked features, and an expression pleasant, yet showing a decided character. He was a man of excellent habits in every respect, and never knew the meaning of sickness, as he lived straight along, from childhood to old age, without the least interference from the thousand ails and ills that harass ninety-nine-hundredths of the human race. He never was obliged to call in the aid of an M.D., and, in short, enjoyed perfect health to the very last.

Over and above the treasure of health, moreover, he was blessed with a cheerful disposition, which rendered him a favorite with rich and poor, and made him delight in hearing and telling merry stories; and, with the rich fund of anecdote and story, gathered in a long and active life, and held fast in a retentive memory, he could not be otherwise than an entertaining talker. The writer remembers well, when Mr. Smith's age was among the nineties, that an old Revolutionary soldier—we think his name was Danforth—from a distant part of the town, used to make him an occasional visit, for the express purpose, it would seem, of reviving memories of the olden times, when both were in their prime. And they succeeded thoroughly. The past lived again. The Revolutionary War was a fruitful theme, and especially the battle of Bunker Hill, in which the old soldier had been a participant. At such times their warlike enthusiasm would be roused almost to a white heat. Once, when the question of the emancipation of the slaves was pending during our last war, Mr. Danforth,—if that was his name,—at one of these meetings, while the writer was at the house, asserted stoutly, that the negroes made as good soldiers as the whites; said there were several at Bunker Hill, and their bullets dropped the red coats as fast as anybody's. One stood near himself, and "his gun went bang! as loud as the best."

Mr. Smith's opportunities for acquiring an education were, of course, very limited; yet he seems to have had a natural turn for mathematics, arithmetic especially, of which a convincing proof exists in the form of an old blank-book with sheepskin covers, still treasured in the family, into which his examples were copied, some of which are "exceedingly difficult."

He had decided views in regard to his duty as a citizen, and voted for every President from Washington to Lincoln.

No kinder man in his family ever lived, and, as an unfailling consequence, the respect paid to him personally by his children during life, and to his memory since he passed away, has been of the tenderest and most devoted kind. The last day he lived, he said to his two daughters, who were present,—“My family I have governed by love; never struck but one blow, and that was an accident.”

The years moved on, and Mr. Smith became old and "well stricken in years," but for a long period Providence kindly withheld the stroke. Generations passed away, but still his gait was erect and his eye strong. The writer has his autograph attached to a legal instrument, firm and legible, written when he was approaching a hundred. Old acquaintances dropped, one by one, from sight, till, of all who began with him the journey of life, not one man or woman remained. And still his health was good. Much of this was due in his later years to the excellent care and unflinching attention of his daughter, Mrs.

Nancy C. Gilman, who, with her husband, ministered to every want of her parents, watching every phase of health,—all to such good effect that Time's fingers seemed to lose their power as the years went by. And thus her father's life was lengthened out to within three years of a century before he was laid to rest,—the oldest man that Northfield has as yet produced.

Mrs. Smith, whose birth took place February 17, 1778, survived her husband nearly a year, dying at the age of ninety-one, January 1, 1868. She was a woman of strong mind, great independence, determined will, one who ruled her household well, "moving therein as queen," and whose orders were obeyed; and to her energetic assistance and inherited property, no doubt, much of Mr. Smith's financial prosperity was due. Their remains lie in the new cemetery in Tilton.

Mr. Smith had nine children, of whom five are still living or recently deceased.

1st. His oldest daughter, Alice G., born March 19, 1804; married Mr. Charles M. Glidden, and resided many years in Southern Ohio, dying December 28, 1873. She had a daughter, Mary Y., and a son, Steven S., now living. The former married George Crawford, of Portsmouth, Ohio, and has two sons and one daughter,—namely, George W., who, after graduating at West Point, studied law and is now practicing in Minnesota; John G., who, after studying in Germany, settled in Portsmouth, Ohio, and is now a leading physician there; and Minnie Alice, who, after graduating at the Boston Conservatory of Music, spent three years in study at Ann Arbor, and received a diploma of M.D. Mrs. Glidden's son, Steven S., married Susan Gannet, of Ironton, Ohio, and has five children,—namely, Angina A., a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston; Jesse, a graduate of College Hill, Cincinnati, both married; and two sons now in a military school; and Susan G., an infant.

2d. Mr. Smith's second daughter, Nancy C., married Mr. William Gilman, of Northfield, whose only daughter, Joan D., married Mr. H. A. Morse, a leading shipper and commission merchant of Boston. They have three daughters,—two, Ruth and E. Gertrude, brilliant scholars and accomplished musicians; and Abba C., recently returned from Europe, an amateur artist of much promise.

Mrs. Gilman was born May 2, 1806. At an early age she engaged in teaching, for which she had a great liking and special aptitude,—teaching private schools in her own house, having charge of a select school in Ohio, with one season in the seminary, making in all some twenty years in the profession. She studied medicine at the Boston Female Medical College, and has been in its practice more or less for thirty years. But beyond her reputation as a teacher or physician, she is better known as a philanthropist, a pioneer in all the most prominent moral questions of the day. She has ever been a thorough-going temperance advocate, a whole-souled champion of the anti-slavery cause, has lectured on the social vices and virtues, and is a staunch supporter of woman's enfranchisement, and through a long life the powers of her mind have been exerted and her influence felt for good, both in her native town and abroad.

3d. Joseph M. G. Smith, a retired iron-master, born December 28, 1807; has four children,—two sons and two daughters. The oldest, Joseph W., is connected with steamboating on the Ohio River. Jacob H., second son, with his two cousins, raised and equipped a company of soldiers, and served during the Rebellion; was once dangerously wounded by a ball, which struck his watch, and, glancing, entered his hip; and is now major, and stationed at some frontier fort on the borders of Mexico. His oldest daughter, Mary E., married a prominent lawyer, who is now a judge in Portsmouth, Ohio. Josephine, the youngest, married Orin Murfin, a young man of much promise, and holding a responsible position, who, while conducting the funeral of a brother-Mason, dropped dead in front of the altar.

4th. Warren H. Smith, the youngest son, a shrewd and energetic man of business, born April 6, 1817, in his earlier days was actively engaged in railroad-building, having been a prominent contractor on the Boston, Concord and Montreal Railroad, when in process of construction, and afterwards on Southern railways—we think in Kentucky. These and other similar stirring enterprises ended, he considered himself entitled to a more quiet life, and accordingly has set an excellent example to other Northfielders in settling down permanently on the paternal acres. While too many natives of the good old town have deserted it for the West or the city, he has chosen to make his father's home his own home and that of his children, and has increased its attractions in many ways. He has remodeled the ancestral house, built a new and capacious barn, beautified and improved the grounds, so that this historic farm, originally a part of the Blanchard lot, we believe, in pleasantness and value combined, has not its equal on Bay Hill certainly, and perhaps not in town; and here Mr. Smith has wisely decided to pass the evening of his days, as a prosperous farmer and retired country gentleman; and here may his age be prolonged till it shall reach or excel "the days of the years of his father."

The maiden-name of his wife was Miss Elizabeth Glines, one of Northfield's noble women, an excellent scholar, successful teacher and a lady of rare executive ability, well known for her labors of love in her neighborhood and church. Mr. Smith has two sons,—Charles Glidden and Jeremiah Eastman. Charles manages the farm. Jeremiah has been in business at the White Mountains the past five years, employing some fifty horses; is very popular in town, having been representative two years without any opposition.

5th. Mary Elizabeth, born November 6, 1822; married Ephraim S. Wadleigh, the fortunate possessor of the original farm of Benjamin Blanchard, the earliest pioneer, and first settler of Northfield. She died two years since, leaving one son and four daughters, who are all interested and actively engaged in agricultural pursuits. Three of the daughters—Addie P., Annie E. and Charlotte B.—reside at home; Olive A. married Peter Gile, of Franklin Falls; and Smith G. is married and living at Tilton.

Such, in brief, is the imperfectly written sketch of Jeremiah Smith, Esq., and his descendants, whose lives, independent thought and energy have had a marked influence on the policy and fortunes of the pleasant and prosperous township of the children's nativity and their father's adoption. May Northfield in the future produce many such.

Among the prominently worthy and enterprising sons of Northfield is the subject of the following sketch.

His grandfather, Joseph Knowles, was born June 15, 1758, and his grandmother, Sarah (Lock) Knowles, December 13, 1761. His death occurred February 16, 1815, when he was fifty-six years of age, and that of his wife August 30, 1811, in her eightieth year.

They are deserving of remembrance by the citizens of Northfield, not only for being the first of the name within its precincts, but as two among the earliest settlers of the good old town, having emigrated thither from Wilmot, N. H., about the year 1775, and located themselves on the Bean Hill road, not far from the Colonel Cofran farm; at which time his son William, the father of William F., was about six years old. Joseph was a carpenter as well as farmer, and worked at his trade more or less through life, as the wants of the community might require, to the great advantage of his neighbors, as a workman of that class must always be in great request in a growing town. And that he was a good workman is proved by the banisters of the Old Meeting-House, still in existence, which he turned in after-years, and as the History of Northfield says, "he turned them well." Indeed, a conscientious thoroughness has ever been the characteristic of him and his descendants. They "do their work well." His wife, Sarah Lock, before her marriage, lived in Chester, N. H., of which town her father was one of the earliest settlers. At first, there was much trouble from the Indians; and in after years Mrs. Knowles used to relate with great glee to her grandchildren the story of her father's encounter with one of that race. Her father, it appears, was at work in his field, when he was suddenly confronted and assaulted by an Indian. Mr.

Lock, though unarmed except with a sickle, made a stout fight, wielding his reaping hook with such efficiency, that he soon reduced his opponent's face to a dead level, that is, cut off his nose, which so disconcerted poor Lo, that he retreated with great precipitation. When asked, in after-time, what became of his nose, he used to reply, "Old Lock cut it off."

Grandfather Knowles, after residing several years on his Bean Hill farm, according to the more probable account—though there is a little difference of opinion on this point—exchanged it for one on Bay Hill, where he remained till his death.

Those were the days, as everybody knows, of large families; and Joseph Knowles formed no exception to the ancestral rule. His family consisted of ten children, namely:

I. William, whose birth took place April 6, 1781. Married, in 1805, Zilpha Thorn, who was born January 1, 1782. His death occurred May 26, 1864, at the age of eighty-three; and his wife's December 26, 1876, aged ninety-four.

William was the father of five children, whose names are I, Wesley, born October 6, 1806; married Jane W. Gilman, October 3, 1832, who was born October 6, 1805, and died September 20, 1857.

For his second wife, he married, June 26, 1860, Sophronia Clement Johnson, born October 9, 1817. His four children were named,—

(a) Charles W., born May 29, 1835; (b) George C., born November 24, 1838; died May 16, 1858; (c) Lucian E., born March 22, 1842; died September 2, 1864; (d) Laura J. C., born October 4, 1843, married to Marcus A. Hardy May 29, 1866, and died March 20, 1885.

2. Betsey C., born March 11, 1808; died May 3, 1882.

3. Cyrene, born January 21, 1813; died August 11, 1815.

4. Joseph, born July 29, 1817; died September 17, 1852.

5. William F., born April 24, 1822; married Sarah Pratt Robinson January 1, 1850. Her birth-place was Boston, and date, November 4, 1827. They have three children, two daughters and one son, all born in Cambridge and all living. Their names are as follows,—

(a) Addie Viola, born January 14, 1854; (b) Carrie Way, born February 5, 1857; (c) William Fletcher Knowles, Jr., born February 19, 1861. Is a graduate of Harvard Medical College, and is soon to proceed to Germany to study.

II. Joseph Knowles, Jr., born April 1, 1783, who, after marriage, settled in Piermont, N. H., had a large family, removed about forty-five years ago to Illinois, and finally made his home in Iowa.

III. and IV. Christian and Sarah, twins, born October 7, 1786.

V. Sally, birth April 11, 1789; married Josiah Bachelder, of Andover, N. H., and lived and died there. Their son, William A. Bachelder, now lives on the old farm, and his son, Nahum, is writing a History of Andover, so report says.

VI. Hannah, born February 9, 1792; married Mr. Haines, and lived for many years in Vershire, Vt., but after her husband's death removed to Exeter, N. H.

VII. John, born October 10, 1794. Never married. Died May 29, 1853.

VIII. Polly, born August 6, 1797. Married Josiah A. Woodbury, of Northfield, in which town she passed her life and died. Had three children,—Mary, Cyrene and William.

IX. and X. A son and daughter,—January, 1800.

Having thus given a brief analysis of the Knowles family, and traced back its genealogy so far as our data permitted, we will devote our remaining space to a hasty glance at the principal events in the life of that member of it whose portrait is given with this sketch.

On the highest pinnacle of Bay Hill, looking almost perpendicularly down upon Chestnut Pond nestling at its eastern base, with the triple-peaked Gilmanton Mountains in the distance beyond, at a height perhaps of two or three hundred feet above the famous first settled farm of the pioneer, Benjamin Blanchard, on the west, with Kearsarge towering above it and far away; with Bean Hill's broad shoulders confronting the view on the south,—while northward stands the giant sentinels of the White, Franconia and Sandwich Ranges, with the Winnipisaukee Valley in the foreground,—is situated the pleasant, productive and romantic ancestral homestead of Wesley Knowles, Esq., where his brother, William F. Knowles, son of William and Zilpha Knowles, first saw the light on the 24th of April, 1822, as we have already stated, the same year which gave to our country Ulysses S. Grant, with but a few days' difference between their ages.

Like many other New Hampshire boys who have made their mark, William passed his boyhood at home, under the eye of a careful, industrious and much respected Christian father and mother, aiding in cultivating the well-tilled fields, laying the foundations by temperance, pure air and hard work, for that stock of good health and strength which were to serve him so well in after-life, and acquiring those habits of industry upon which his future success has so much depended.

The winter district-school was his only source of education till he was sixteen, when he attended two terms at the Franklin, N. H., Academy, and the following winter made his first essay in teaching in the Sanborn district, in Sanbornton, in the years 1839-40.

The next winter he was a pupil in the New London, N. H., Literary Institution, and the ensuing fall of the Academy at Newbury, Vt., and the winter after, taught in Haverhill, N. H., always working on the farm during the summer.

The Academical School of Professor Dyer H. Sanborn, a noted teacher of those times, was then in the flood-tide of its prosperity, at Sanbornton Bridge (now Tilton) and thither William wended his way in the fall of 1842.

The writer attended the school at the same time, and remembers him well as a hard worker, a close student and unexceptionable in his observance of the school regulations, while in scholarship he stood in the front rank,—his tastes and strength seeming to lie more particularly in mathematics. In the subsequent winter he taught with general acceptance in his home-district of Bay Hill.

He was now twenty-one, and knowing he must work his way through the world by his own unaided efforts, like many other young men of his native town, he determined to leave the paternal fields and seek his fortune elsewhere; and, accordingly, in May, proceeded to Boston. Here engaging in the grocery business till September, 1844, he then entered the wholesale dry-goods store of the wealthy firm of James M. Beebe & Co., where he remained fourteen years,—a length of time sufficient to prove most decidedly his faithfulness to his duties and consequent acceptability to his employers.

On the termination of this engagement, he concluded to make still another change in his business,—the fourth,—having already tried farming, teaching and storekeeping. He engaged in the transportation business, which has been his employment down to the present time; first, with the Commercial Steamboat Company, and the Boston and Providence R. R. Company, between Boston and New York and the South. Subsequently, he accepted an offer to go to New York in the interest of the N. Y. C. R. R. Company, and afterwards was engaged by the Pennsylvania R. R. Lines.

After continuing in New York three years, he was, on the completion of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific R. R. to Council Bluffs, engaged to represent their road in Boston and New England. Continuing in this agency several years, until the Chicago and Northwestern, the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroads, had completed an arrangement for pooling their through business, which, by the way, was the first pooling arrangement made by any railroad, he was appointed Pool Agent for their New England business.

At the present time he is the New England Agent of the California East Freight Line, which line is owned and operated by the Chicago, Northwestern, the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, and the Union Pacific Railways.

His office is at 211 Washington Street, Boston.

Mr. Knowles is a prominent member of the Masonic fraternity, having been made a Master Mason in 1857, received the Royal Arch Mason's Degree, in 1858, soon followed by the Cryptic Degrees of the order, and a little later was created a Knight Templar and Knight of Malta; is at present a permanent member of the Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters of Massachusetts, and, on the 21st day of November, 1862, received the Grade of Sov. Gr. Ins. Genl. of the Thirty-third and last Degree, and was admitted an honorary member of the Supreme Grand Council A. A. Scottish Rite for the northern Masonic jurisdiction of the United States, and is to-day among its oldest members residing in Massachusetts.

Owing to the nature and locality of his employment, Mr. Knowles has found it convenient to make his home in or near the New England metropolis during the most of his adult years. After marriage he lived in Boston till 1852, when he changed his residence to Cambridge, where he remained twenty-four years, till 1876. That his executive ability was appreciated in some degree by his fellow-citizens at this time is shown by the fact that he was called to serve in the city government of Cambridge two years, having been elected to the Council for 1861 and unanimously re-elected for the following year. After a few months' stay in Medford, he finally removed to Somerville, where he now resides, still in the full vigor of life, blessed with health and a competency, possessed of a spacious and pleasant home, a charming family, with the retrospect of a life of earnest and honest striving rewarded and rounded out by the successful accomplishment of the mission assigned him. As we said of his grandfather, so we say of him,—“he has done his work well.” May prosperity still further attend, and a ripe old age await this characteristic son of Northfield, William F. Knowles.

HISTORY OF HILL.

BY F. R. WOODWARD.

CHAPTER I.

THE township of New Chester, as originally granted, embraced a large amount of territory, containing that which is now occupied by Hill, Bristol, Bridgewater, a portion of Wilnot and Danbury. Hill, at this date (1885), contains only a small part of the original grant of New Chester, bearing this original title until January 14, 1837, when, in honor of Governor Isaac Hill, it received its present name. The old Masonian proprietors granted this territory to eighty-seven proprietors September 14, 1753; being mostly men from Chester, the new grant was called New Chester. The original proprietors were not all actual settlers, but many afterwards transferred or sold their claims to actual settlers.

As early as 1767 two settlements were made within the present limits of Hill, by Carr Huse, Esq. and Captain Cutting Favour. The former came from Newbury, Mass., and settled on a fine intervalle farm in the village, that has been held by the family name to this date (1885).

The latter selected a good location on the Pemigewasset River, about two miles north of the village, towards Bristol, at the present residence of Frank Foster. At first these men did not spend their winters among the snow-clad hills and frosty valleys of their new homes, surrounded by beasts of the forests and more deadly foes, their copper-colored enemy. In 1770 they made their residence here permanent. During the same year other settlements were made in that part of New Chester which is now embraced in other towns. Certain names must necessarily appear in this history of men who were then residents of these surrounding towns, as petitioners and officers. The town was incorporated November 20, 1778, in answer to a petition from the inhabitants, and named New Chester at their request. A manifest desire existed very early among the inhabitants of this large territory for a division of the town, and petitions were presented to the General Court for that purpose in 1774, as is shown by the records,—

"At a town-meeting held upon the 20th day of January, 1774, upon the third article, voted that the Township of New Chester shall be Incorporated into Two Townships or parishes.

"Upon the fourth article, Voted that what money was voted at the last meeting to be raised for preaching shall be applied towards getting the Town of New Chester Incorporated into Two Townships, or parishes as aforesaid, so much of it as is necessary for that Service.

"Voted, that Samuel Livermore, Stephen Holland and John Telford, Esq., they or either of them are hereby empowered to get the Township of New Chester incorporated in to two Townships or parishes aforesaid."

PETITIONS TO BE INCORPORATED INTO TWO TOWNS IN 1776.

"To the Honorable Council and House of Representatives of the Colony of New Hampshire.

"The Humble Petition of the Inhabitants of the Township of New Chester, Wee, the Inhabitants of 8th N. Chester, Do Labour under many Grievances and Disadvantages for want of an In Corporation, whereby wee might have others Endowed with Powers and Authority as other Towns in this Colony Do Enjoy. We therefore Humbly Pray Your Honours to Grant us a Charter of In Corporation—Investing us with the Powers, Priviledges and Authorities as other Towns within this Colony have. It is the Desire of your Humble Petitioners that the 8th Township may Be In Coporated into Two Distinct Towns, if your Honours Please, By Reason of the Township Being Very Long, which will abundantly Best Accomodate the Inhabitants of 8th Township, it is desired that 8th Township Be Divided at New Found River, So Called, Allowing the upper Town to Include the priviledges for mills upon 8th River within the Limits of 8th Town and your Humble Petitioners, as in Duty Bound, shall Ever Pray.

"N. Chester, Decemr 24th, 1776.

"Jonathan Crawford, Josiah Heath, Thomas Crawford, Junr, John Clark, Cutting Favour, Jonathan Ingalls, Joseph Sanborn, Jacob Wells, Robert Crawford, Nason Case, John Mitchell, Gibson Sleeper, Benjen Walk, John Smith, Nathaniel Sanborn, John Bussell, Jem M. Alister, Robt Forsth, Benjamin Emery, Carr Huse, David Emerson, Joshua Telford, Tilton Bennet."

This petition not being granted, nearly two years later the following was presented:

"To the General Court of the State of New Hampshire.

"The Humble Petition of the Inhabitants of the Township of New Chester, Wee, the Inhabitants of 8th Township, Do Labour under Many Grievances and Disadvantages for Want of an Incorporation whereby wee might have others endowed with Power, authority, and that wee might lay out our highways so that wee might make and Repair them so that travlers might Sately travel or pass through the Town Ship Sately, for want of which wee are Sensible. Some of your Honours are Sensible of and many more Dutities which wee Labour under; wee, therefore, Humbly Pray Your Honours to Grant us a Charter of Incorporation Investing us with the Powers, Priviledges and authorities as other Towns within the State Do Enjoy, and your Humble Petitioners, as in Duty Bound, Shall Ever Pray.

"New Chester, October 15th, 1778.

"It is Desir'd that the Town May Be Incorporated By the name of New Chester.

"Carr Huse, Cutting favour, Chase Fuller, Jonathan Crawford, Thomas Lock, moss Warrthen, Gibson Sleeper, John Russel, Jacob Wells, Tilton Bennet, John Emery, Benjamin Emery, Simon Cross, Samuel Washen, Abner Johnson, Theophilus Sanborn, John Cleveland, Nathaniel Sanborn, Eben Ingalls, Josiah Heath, Jonathan Ingalls, Peter Sleeper, John Kidder."

In answer to the above petition, the town was incorporated by the Legislature November 20, 1778.

At the time of its incorporation the shape of the town, as they claimed, was indeed inconvenient for the transaction of business, as was evidently true, being shown by the following petition, that was sent to the Legislature nine years after the town was incorporated:

"To the Honourable Senate and House of Representatives of said State, to be convened at Charlestown on the second Wednesday of September, A. D. 1787.

"The Petition of the inhabitants of New Chester, in said State, Humble Sheweth, Wee, your Petitioners, labouring under many Difficulties and Inconveniences in our present Circumstances by Reason of the Town Being Exceedingly Long and in one place but a very little more than one mile wide, which makes it very Difficult for the Major part of the people to attend Public Worship, when we have preaching in Town and like wise to Attend Town Meeting, as it is Commonly bad traveling when we have our Annual Meeting, the Town is more than Nineteen miles in Length. Wee, your Humble Petitioners, Earnedly Request that your Excellency and Honors would Divide the Town of New Chester into two Towns, and that it may be Divided at Newfound River, so Called (as it is) at the mouth of Newfound River, running up and River until it comes to Newfound pond; then running on the easterly Shore of said pond until it comes to the Town line between New Chester and Plymouth, and your petitioners, as in Duty Bound, will ever Pray.

"New Chester, August 23, 1787.
 "Carr Huse, Reuben Wells, John Russell, Nathan Colby, Peter Heath, Jonathan Ingalls, Junr, Elias Boardman, Jona Ingalls, Nathaniel Sanborn, Ephs Webster, Cutting Favour, Michael Mosher, Thomas Huse, John fellows, Jonathan Holt, Josiah Brown, David Emerson, Thomas Rowell, Joseph Johnson, Thomas Locke, Samuel Worthen, Benj Boardman, John Mitchell, Jacob Fellows, Joseph Marshall, Joseph Emerson, Moses Fellows, Simon Cross, Daniel Heath James Heath, Jonathan Heath, David Powell, Alexander Craig, Jonathan Carlton, Ephraim Clark, John Mitchell, Junr, Ziba Townsend, Chase Fuller, John Ladd, Samuel Drew, David Craig, Robert Craig, Seth Spencer, Isaac Senter, Jonathan Crawford, Benjamin Emmons, William Powell, Josiah Heath, John Heath, James Craige."

February 12, 1788, the north part of this town was incorporated into the town of Bridgewater, and Thomas Crawford was authorized to call the first town-meeting.

By an act of the Legislature, approved June 24, 1819, that part of the town "which lies northerly of Smith's river," with a part of Bridgewater, was made into a new town (now Bristol).

December 21, 1820, the town was enlarged by the annexation of a small portion of Alexandria.

By an act of the Legislature, approved December 21, 1832, a small tract of land was taken from New Chester and annexed to Wilnot.

On the 26th day of June, 1858, a certain tract of land was taken from Hill and joined to Danbury.

The town was in Grafton County until July 1, 1868, at which time it was annexed to Merrimack County.

Boundary Lines.—Considerable difficulty was experienced by the early settlers in fixing the boundary lines of the township, and at several different times committees were appointed by the Legislature to settle the troubles.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON RUNNING LINES, 1763.

"We, the subscribers, being chosen by the Proprietors of the Townships of New Britain and New Chester, so called, a committee to settle the Boundaries said Townships, we have as follows (viz): we have begun at the Northely line Stevens' Farm, and have measured across the lower end of New Britain by the River on a strait line four miles to a Crotched white Birch tree standing upon the bank of the River, Marked with T, S, W, T, R, S, I, L, T, and together with the Date of the year, which Tree we have made and Established as a Bound Between the Two aforesaid Townships, Together with an Elm standing Down the Bank, about half-way to the water, which is spotted and Marked with R, T; from thence we have Run part of the line Between said Townships one mile to a great Red Oak Tree Standing in the line, Marked with a great M, Cut out with an axe, and one notch out in it, from thence said line is to run the same course as we have Run this, one mile, which is South, Seventy three Degrees west, according to the Chartors, which Bounds is to be a final Settlement of the lower Bound Between said Township and line so far as it is run.

Committee Men

In answer to a petition from the selectmen, an act was passed by the Legislature, June 11, 1808, appointing William Webster, Bradstreet, Moody and Enoch Colby "to determine the jurisdictional lines between the Towns of New Chester, Alexandria and Danbury and report to the Legislature."

This committee, after considerable annoyance, settled the question of the boundary between said towns.

ALEXANDRIA, Oct. 28, 1808.

"Agreable to a Law of this state, we, the subscribers, have promulgated the line between the Towns of Alexandria and New Chester, beginning at a beach tree marked & stoned around it a little north of a beach tree which is marked W, P, S, W, S, who is the south westerly corner of Alexandria, then running north about Fifty degrees East, to a large beach, marked and spotted, on the southerly bank of Smith's River

"in the month of December following begun at a stake and stone known by the name of the Henlock Corner, then South, about 47½ Degrees West, to Smith's River, to a Red oak tree standing on the east bank of said River, marked M, W, S, and S, D

"DANIEL FAYOUR, Town Clerk.

Hill is bounded north by Danbury, Alexandria and Bristol; east by New Hampton and Sanbornton—Pemigewasset River flowing between; south by Franklin and Andover, and west by Andover, Wilnot and Danbury. Area, about fifteen thousand acres. Population, six hundred and sixty-seven.

Distance from Concord by rail, twenty-five miles north, reached by a branch of the Northern Railroad running from Franklin to Bristol. Rugged Mountain, situated partly in this town, is justly entitled to its name, as it is one of the most rugged elevations in Central New Hampshire. Many have supposed the town received its name from the very uneven nature of the country, but such is not the case. There are many fine, well cultivated farms in this town upon which have been reared large families of boys and girls, many of whom have gone forth to make their mark in the world.

W. W. Sargent was, during his day, one of the leading men in town, held the offices of representative, selectman and town clerk at one time during the years 1807, '08, '09, '10, besides being justice of the peace and on nearly all the committees appointed to advance the interest of the town. He was chairman of the Board of Selectmen for six years and town clerk for many years.

Carr Huse was another man of rare ability who was thought much of by his townsmen, and was continued in places of trust for a long time. He had a family of thirteen children.

Among the number of Hill's sons who have ranked high in their sphere may be mentioned Gilman Kimball, son of Ebenezer and Polly Kimball, born December 8, 1804.

Mr. Kimball, being possessed of ample means, spared no pains in the care and education of his children. Gilman received private instruction and afterward entered Dartmouth College, from which he graduated in 1827. He studied medicine, and to perfect himself in his profession he traveled extensively, and practiced abroad with some of the most noted physicians and surgeons. He has performed some very wonderful operations in surgery, among which are several successful cases of amputation at the hip-joint, which for centuries had been supposed to be an operation almost impossible to perform and save the life of the patient. At present he resides at Lowell, Mass., and is a shining light in his profession.

Joseph Huse, grandson of the original settler, Carr Huse, and son of John and Betsy Huse, born May 9, 1806, is another of Hill's sons of whom the townspeople should be proud. Reared a sturdy farmer, he went forth to battle with the world well prepared to win in that conflict which requires, chiefly, pluck and integrity for its weapons. Amid the vicissitudes of a great city—Boston—he has succeeded in building up a business, fortune and reputation, to which we refer with pride. We are indebted to him for much information in regard to early settlements of New Chester.

Charles M. Winchester, publishing agent of the Christian Publishing House, Dayton, Ohio, is a man who has risen to eminence, and in his prosperity he is not ashamed to own that he is a "Hill man."

Gilman Currier, who left his native place to make a business and home for himself, settled in Haverhill, Mass., and engaged in the shoe business with success; but death claimed him for its victim in 1847, and his business passed into the hands of his brother, Samuel M. Currier, who has succeeded in establishing an enviable reputation by his honest and fair dealing, and at the same time has succeeded in amassing a liberal amount of this world's goods. He is one of those genial, kind-hearted men that it gives us pleasure to meet. This is a peculiar trait of the entire family. These brothers were children of Moses and Nancy Currier.

Augustus B. Johnson, son of Samuel and Mary Johnson, is a man of energy and perseverance (inherited from his father), and, by exercising these qualities, has risen to be one of the leading business men of the West (although he does not make his permanent home in the West). He is engaged extensively in stock-raising in the State of Kansas, and is eastern manager of the Johnson Loan and Trust Company, of Arkansas City.

W. W. Currier, son of Jonathan and Nancy Currier, is a successful business man, engaged in the manufacture of shoe stock in Haverhill, Mass.

There are many others we would be glad to mention if space would allow. We will, however, give only a slight sketch of two of the old residents.

Carr Huse was born in Newbury, Mass., in 1740, and moved his family to New Chester in 1770. Previous to this time he would go up to New Chester in the spring and spend his summers, and return in the fall to his native place. He was the first settler, with one exception, and in his new home experienced many hardships and privations, and his nearest neighbor north was two and a half miles, and south, Franklin Lower village, where he was obliged to go to get his grain ground, and this he had to do in winter with a hand-sled and snow-shoes. The nearest meeting-house (and that made of logs) was twenty-two miles, at Plymouth, where he went on horseback, having only a bridle-road with trees spotted to direct him. He took a deep interest in the prosperity and welfare of the town. He occupied almost every position in town requiring ability, responsibility and faithfulness in the discharge of his various duties. He was town clerk thirty-three years in succession, one of the selectmen many years, and filled many other offices, and among them, representative to the State Legislature for many years, which met during that time at Portsmouth and Exeter. He held a justice's commission for forty years, and, as there was no lawyer in town, he made a speciality of writing deeds, etc., which the law required. As there was no minister in town, he solemnized marriages and performed not a few, but at a low price compared with the present time. In the organization of the Congregational Church he was the only male member, with one exception, and he was chosen deacon, and remained such for forty years. He had two wives. For the first he married Sarah Wells, in 1761, who was the mother of seven children; and for the other, Joanna Buswell, in 1775, who was the mother of six children. He died in 1833, aged ninety-two years and nine months, having twelve children and forty-four grandchildren.

Geo. W. Sumner was born at Deering, N. H., February 9, 1792; assisted his father in clearing and cultivating a large farm. At the age of nineteen (the time of his mother's death) he left home, studied grammar and geography six weeks with Rev. E. P. Bradford, served two years' apprenticeship in the clothier business at Weare and Hillsborough, and in March, 1816, moved to Hill and built a dam and shop, and commenced carding wool July 6, 1816. He carded eight thousand pounds that season.

He continued in the business of carding wool and dressing cloth during the summer months for about forty years. During this time he often taught school winters, and held every important office in and for the town of Hill, and for many years he was a justice of the peace; was an excellent writer of prose and verse, and a member of the Congregational Church.

December 19, 1822, he married Hannah Abrams, of Sanbornton, who died August 20, 1847. In September, 1848, he married A. S. Pratt; he died July 20, 1876. His children by first wife, were Mary H., Martha, Ellen S., Catharine M., Jane W., George A. and Sarah G. All but the two last mentioned died before reaching twenty-five years of age. George A. Sumner is still living at Hill; born June 27, 1839; married Angie Montague, of Springfield, Mass., April 28, 1868. Their children are, Anna G., born April 3, 1869, and George Willis, born January 5, 1875.

Sarah G. Sumner, born June 7, 1844; married Edmund S. Vail, of Blooming Grove, N. Y., October 25, 1879. Now living in Detroit, Kan. Their children are Alice M., Raymond S. and Florence H.

Manufactories.—The proprietors of New Chester seemed alive to the importance of having grist and saw-mill accommodations.

When the township was laid out, two lots were set off to be used "for the encouragement of building Mills." The proprietors also voted mill privileges, and appointed men to see that mills were erected.

"PROPRIETORS' MEETINGS

"May the 6th, 1766.—Edw. Mays, Emerson, Mays, Tolford & Cap. John Underhill a committee to Treat with any person or persons to Build a Saw-mill and Grist-mill upon New Found River. The above Committee is empowered to give away the said privilege to any person that will undertake to Build said Mills, and no more till they have given their Receipt to the Proprietors.

"Feb. 17th, 1767.—At a Proprietors' Meeting of New Chester, Tolford two Dollars upon each Right for Building Mills in said Township.

"May 19, 1767.—Meeting opened on order of adjournment. Whereas the purchasers of Land Contained in John Tifton Mason's Patent, Province of New Hampshire, by their agents, Joseph Blanchard, Esq., Impowered the Grantors of the new Township of New Chester, in said Patent, to Dispose of two Certain Lots of Land to Build Mills for the Benefit of said Township whereas, John Tolford, Esq., has this day agreed to Build two Saw-mills & two grist-mills in said New Chester (viz., one grist-mill and one Saw-mill on the river known by the name of Newfound River, and have the one fit for grinding and the other fit for sawing by the first Day of November next; and one grist-mill and one Saw-mill on the River known by the name of Smith's River, within six years from this Date, and to keep all the said Mills in good order forever thereafter, and to grind and saw for the inhabitants of said Town, as stipulated in a Bond signed, and by said Tolford delivered to Samuel Emerson & Matthew Thornton, Esquires, & Matthew Forsyth, yeoman, Agents for and in Behalf of the grantees of said New Chester. Therefore, Tolford, that the Lots of Land adjoining to Newfound Pond River, including the stream and falls, and the Lot, stream and falls on Smith's River, both in said New Chester, Land out by the Committee of the grantees aforesaid for the use aforesaid, be, and hereby is given & granted to the said John Tolford, his heirs & assigns forever, and two Dollars to be paid from each Grantee of said Township, one-half to be paid by the first Day of May next, the Remainder when the first two mills is finished, he performing as mentioned in said Bond.

"Also voted that the above named Samuel Emerson, Matthew Thornton, Esquires, & Matthew Forsyth, be, and thereby are authorized & Empowered to give Security, & Deliver in the Capacity aforesaid, a good warrantable Bond of the above premises to the above said John Tolford."

This mill was probably built in 1767, as per arrangement.

"CHESTER, March 27th, 1769.

"At a meeting of the Proprietors of New Chester by adjournment, Tolford that Mays John Tolford shall be obliged to Tend his grist-mill in New Chester for the Proprietors every first Monday in each Month for a year, and no more other days in said year."

It cannot be said that the town of Hill has ever been noted as a manufacturing town, except its reputation as having the largest establishment for the manufacture of glass-cutters in the world, and a fine latch-needle manufactory. The first manufacturing of importance was that of wool-rolls for spinning, and also cloth dressing, started in July, 1816, by Geo. W. Sumner, and continued for nearly forty years. Geo. A. Sumner afterwards occupied the same mill as grist-mill and carriage-shop for several years.

About the year 1825 a Mr. Mosley engaged quite extensively in the tannery business near the Sumner mill. Thomas Heath afterwards ran the business until about the year 1855. During this time B. C. Batchelder manufactured carriages in a building on the opposite side of the stream, and his brother, Asahel Batchelder, made axe-handles and spoke-shaves in the Sumner mill. Mr. Batchelder was the first person to make the improved turned handles which have been so popular.

James Glines carried on the hatters' business, and John W. Sargent manufactured shoes for several years previous to 1845. Afterwards the shoe business was carried on by John Tucker and Eleanor Everett, until large manufacturers obtained control of the shoe business and made their production on a small scale unprofitable. These establishments were all on a small scale compared with works of the same class in later times.

David Shaw, S. H. Long and Albert Blake commenced the manufacture of friction matches about the year 1855, and did quite an extensive business for several years. August 23, 1862, M. F. Little purchased the match-factory, stock and tools, and continued the business with good success until the tax on matches made it an undesirable business, when it was abandoned and the mill sold to be used as a saw-mill.

In the year 1874, A. A. Williams and F. W. Eaton formed a copartnership for the manufacture of cabinet organs, and employed several men in the Sumner mill. They made some very fine instruments; but, owing to the sharp competition in the business caused by other large manufacturers making very cheap and some nearly worthless instruments, which they put upon the market at a very low price, this company were unable to sell their instruments at a remunerative price, and after running the business three years, closed it out. We should not do justice to the business of the town if we failed to mention our sturdy blacksmith, Harrison Morrill, who, for more than a quarter of a century, did service at the anvil in our village, and was ever ready, with a smile and good word for all, to do the bidding of his patrons, until, from the infirmities of age, he felt compelled to give up the business to younger hands in 1882.

In the spring of 1872 several parties interested themselves in the matter of inducing some manufacturers to locate in town. A town-meeting was called, and the town voted to exempt from taxation, for a term of years, any manufacturing business of iron, wood, steel or the fabrics that might be located in town. This action was taken to encourage F. R. Woodward, who was then doing business in Manchester, to move his business, the manufacturing of latch-needles, to Hill, which he did in July of that year, leasing the mill and power on Mill Brook of Mr. George W. Dearborn, for a term of years. Mr. Woodward was at this time experimenting with the idea of making a glass-cutting tool that would combine the qualities of cheapness, simplicity and durability, and having attained quite satisfactory results, the following winter he disposed of the needle business to a firm consisting of his brother, S. Woodward, G. H. Adams, H. Adams and P. C. Shaw, and engaged in the manufacture of his improved glass-cutting tools. The business increased so rapidly that in 1876 he erected a shop near the railroad, in the rear of his residence, and put in a steam-engine for power. This shop was destroyed by fire in August, 1879. In six weeks another building was erected and ready to be occupied; this building, with steam for motive power, was used until 1882, when both the building and power were found too small, and Mr. Woodward purchased the farm and water-power of G. A. Sumner, and the water-power owned by Mrs. C. W. Huse, on Mill Brook, and proceeded to erect a dam and buildings. The building near the railroad which was three stories high, was then moved and joined to the one already built, making a fine building, sixty-six feet in length, exclusive of saw-mill and store-house, which are in a separate building. This is the largest manufactory of Rotary Steel Glass-Cutters in the world, employing about thirty operatives.

The latch-needle works owned and operated by G. H. Adams & Co. occupies the same building leased by Mr. Woodward for this business, and now owned by the firm. They employ about fifteen operatives, and manufacture a large quantity of latch-needles for knitting-machines, of superior quality, which are sent to all parts of the United States.

Churches, Ministers, etc.—CHURCHES.—From the first settlement of the town there seems to have been a desire, on the part of the settlers and also the proprietors, to establish a place of worship, as we find by the votes taken at different times in regard to hiring a minister and building a house of worship.

At a meeting of the proprietors of New Chester, held at the house of Samuel Emerson, Esq., in Chester, on Tuesday, the 2d day of April, 1771, it was,—

"Resolved, that one Dollar on each grantee's Right to hire preaching in New Chester the present year.

"Resolved, John Talford, Samuel Emerson, Jethro Sanford, Esq., & Capt. John Underhill and Henry Hall be a Committee to hire such Minister of the gospel as they shall think fit to preach to the inhabitants of New Chester, and some of said Committee is to accompany any such preacher to New Chester without any pay for their Time."

At a town-meeting, on Tuesday, the 10th day of March, 1807, it was,—

"Resolved, to raise a tax of twenty cts. upon a pole and other Estate in equal proportion to all those who gave their free Consent when the Inventory is taken for a minister of the Congregational or Presbyterian order."

At a town-meeting, held on April 1, 1773, it was,—

"Resolved, that one Dollar be paid upon each payable Right for the present year to hire preaching in said New Chester.

"Resolved, that there shall be a Meeting-house built in said New Chester Equal to thirty Five feet square, one story high, the present year."

At a meeting of the proprietors of New Chester, at the house of Samuel Emerson, Esq., on Tuesday, the 27th day of April, 1773, it was,—

"Resolved, that Carr Huse, Nason Cabot, Robert Forsyth, Joshua Talford & Peter Steeper shall be a Committee to Build a Meeting-House in New Chester, agreeable to a vote passed at the Last Meeting.

"Resolved, that those that labour at Building the aforesaid meeting House in New Chester shall have allowed to them two Shillings and sixpence pray for their Labour."

At a meeting of the proprietors of New Chester, held at Chester, at the house of Samuel Emerson, Esq., on Wednesday, the 20th day of January, 1774,—

"Whereas, at their last Meeting their was a Vote passed that there should be two Dollars raised on each payable Right to build one Meeting-House in said town, it is now Voted that of money shall be Equally Divided and applied toward Building two Meeting-Houses, one in the lower part of the town and the other in the upper part of the Town, and Build the same on the parsonage lots.

"Resolved, John Talford, Esq., Robert Forsyth, Carr Huse, Nason Cuss, Cutting Favour, these be a Committee to see that the aforesaid Ten acres of Land shall be Cleared upon the aforesaid parsonage lots in the lower parish in New Chester agreeable to the above votes, & see that it be done as soon as Conveniently may be; also Voted that the same persons be a Committee to see that the Meeting-House be Built in said parishes as soon as Conveniently may be.

"Resolved, that John Mitchell, Thomas Crawford, Jr., Andrew Craigie, Benjamin Emmons & Ebenezer Ingals shall be a Committee to see that the aforesaid Ten acres of Land shall be Cleared upon the parsonage Lot in the upper parish in New Chester agreeable to the above vote, and see that it be done as soon as Conveniently may be; also voted the aforesaid persons be a Committee to see that the Meeting-House be Built in said parish as soon as Conveniently may be.

"Resolved, that two Dollars shall be raised on each payable Right in New Chester toward Clearing the land on the parsonage Lots in New Chester, and Building the Meeting-Houses agreeable to the aforesaid Votes."

At a town-meeting, second Tuesday of March, 1824, it was,—

"Resolved, To give the Directors of the West Meeting-House in said Town one Hundred & fifty dollars, to be paid yearly, in case they secure the use of the house to the town for public Meetings of business so long as the continuance of said House."

No records can be found by which the exact dates of the building of the first house of worship can be established; but, according to the best authority, it was built or finished in the year 1800 or 1801. A town-meeting for Danbury and New Chester was called at this meeting-house in 1802. It is situated near the centre of the town, is a wooden structure heavily timbered, painted white, has been kept in good repair by the enterprising citizens at the "Centre," and presents a neat and attractive appearance.

There is a Christian Church organization here, over which Rev. E. H. Wright has been pastor for several years. This has always been known as the West Meeting-House.

Early in the nineteenth century a hall was finished in a barn owned by Major Ebenezer Kimball, at the village, and in this meetings were held summers and winters, without any means of heating, except the stones carried there hot from the fire-place, until the present church was built. This hall was in existence until 1839, when the partitions were taken out by its present owner, David Fowler, and it reverted back to its former use, storage for hay and grain.

The church at the village, or the East Meeting-House, was commenced in the year 1819, and finished in January, 1822. February 5th of this year the pews were sold, and soon after the house was dedicated as a Congregational Church. It was owned by individuals, each proprietor owning one or more pews, and entitled to as many votes in the management of its affairs as they owned pews. It has since been re-modeled, and at this writing is as fine a house of worship as is often found in a country village.

The Congregational Church was organized, February 19, 1815, by the assistance of the Rev. William Rolfe, of Groton. The church consisted of but two members, Carr Huse and Israel Adams. This church was supplied with the public ministration of the gospel, but did not have a settled minister until January 6, 1831, when Rev. Isaac Knight was ordained pastor, and remained such seven years.

In the year 1817, two years after its formation, this church numbered twenty-seven members, and for nearly half a century was a great power for good in the community. By death and removal the organization became so reduced that it became imperative and remained so for several years, until the spring of 1884, when it was revived by the assistance of Rev. S. F. Lougee, of New Hampton, who was engaged as pastor. Whole number admitted to the church from the time of its organization to 1884, one hundred and sixty-three; number of children baptized, one hundred and thirty-two.

In the year 1870, Rev. E. H. Wright, learning from members of the Congregational Church that it was not expected this church would be revived, and desiring a home for the converts who were gathered under his preaching, formed a Christian Church, over which he was the able and acceptable pastor most of the time (except when in Manchester, where he went to assist in building up a church) till 1884, when the Congregationalists claimed the right to the church for the purpose of having a minister of that denomination preach, and the right was accorded to them by the committee chosen to provide a preacher.

Schools.—The people of the town gave early attention to the establishment of schools, and for this purpose lots were set off to be used "only for school purposes." We copy a vote of the proprietors' meeting of May 9, 1775,—

"At a meeting of the Proprietors, held at the house of Jonathan Ingals, on May the ninth, at one o'clock, Resolved, that the Timber on the School Lot No. 37, in the third Division, be sold as soon as may be and the money of such sale to be for the Benefit of Schools, and that Robert Forsyth, Cutting Favour and Peter Sleeper be a committee to sell said Timber, and, till such Sale, see that no waste be made on Said Lots."

In 1777 forty dollars was raised to be used for schooling. At the present day this seems a meagre sum, but it must be remembered that the wages of teachers at this time was very small compared with that paid to-day.

In 1778 it was voted that Joshua Tolford should have the privilege of plowing the school lot by his giving an obligation not to "Damnify" the same.

In 1786 a school-tax of £13 5s. 7d. 1/2, and in 1788 a tax of £23 14s. 10d. were levied, showing that each year brought an increasing interest in the important subject of education.

Thomas Huse (son of Carr Huse) and James Karr kept school in 1793. Mr. Huse's school was styled a boarding-school. The schoolmaster boarded around, and his board was paid by the town at the rate of three shillings per week.

In 1800, Betsy Sleeper received twelve dollars for three months' teaching, and the sum of seven dollars and thirty-four cents was paid for boarding "Said mistress."

"Master Bowers," who was quite a noted teacher in those days, received sixteen dollars for teaching two months the same year.

In 1802 the school-house in District No. 1 was either built new, or the old one built over, and sixty-seven cents per day was paid for labor, four dollars per thousand for boards, and one dollar and eighty-three cents per thousand for nails.

Among those who have taught in town and since become noted may be mentioned Henry P. Rolfe and the late Anson S. Marshall, of Concord; L. P. Townsend, professor of theology in Boston University; Rev. William Sleeper, of Maine, and many others.

Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Adams have taught school and acted as superintending school committee many years, and doubtless have the best qualifications for the latter office of any person in town. Mrs. Adams was the author of the history of schools in this town in the reports of 1876.

For many years after the foundation of schools in town the people considered the qualifications for teaching to consist chiefly in the muscle and nerve of the teacher. A person with good common sense and able to read and write fairly, if endowed with courage and strength sufficient to cope with the powers of the "big boys," were considered good teachers; and it was not an uncommon occurrence for boys of sixteen to eighteen years of age to receive severe floggings. With the appointment of superintending school committees the qualifications of teachers became more exalted, and at this advanced age the rod is seldom resorted to, even in the rural districts, while our village school will compare favorably with some of the academies of our State in proficiency and deportment.

Cemeteries.—The cemetery at the village was laid out in 1773, on land cleared by Carr Huse, on his intervalle, about forty rods from his house.

This comprises about one acre of land, laid out in such manner as to give the most possible room for burial purposes, regardless of the rules that are observed in the plans of modern cemeteries. There is one soldier of the Indian War, Carr Huse, and one of the Revolution buried here.

THE FERRIS CEMETERY, so-called, is situated about one mile west of the West Meeting-House, was opened to the public in 1845, and is superior, as regards location, to the village ground, as it is on high land, and, if properly cared for, would be a very fine cemetery for the country. It has several very neat monuments.

THE BUNKER HILL CEMETERY, which was laid out in 1846, is the last and best of the public cemeteries. It is well laid out, is kept in good condition, is in a good location and has some very fine monuments and tablets erected. These are all public cemeteries.

PLEASANT HILL CEMETERY.—In the winter of 1884, the writer, seeing the need of a more respectable place at the village for interment of the dead, offered to present to any number of individuals, who would form a cemetery association and guarantee to properly fence and tit up and ever keep so fenced and properly cared for, a tract of land on the hill near his mill, which was considered by all interested to be the best location for a cemetery in town. The offer, however, was not accepted, as the expense of so fitting it up would be so great that it was thought sufficient could not be realized from the sale of lots to pay the same.

May 20th of this year May F., oldest daughter of the writer, died, and he at once had the ground laid out according to a plan which he had previously made, and she was laid away beneath the ground where she had so often walked and gathered wild flowers with her father and sister.

This is pronounced by those who have visited it to be the most lovely cemetery, for a new one, they have ever seen.

It is laid out with drive-ways between every row of lots lengthwise, and walks between each double lot crosswise; the two main drive-ways are twenty-four feet wide, the others twelve feet, and the walks six feet. The soil is taken from the drive-ways, which are level and well graded; the lots are nicely graded and sown to grass, and present a very neat and attractive appearance.

The writer has fitted up the ground at his own expense, and sells lots to any who are able to buy; those not able to buy are given the right of free burial.

A large lot is given in the best locality for the erection of a soldiers' monument and the burial of soldiers, and it is hoped in the near future a monument will be erected to the memory of the brave boys who so valiantly fought in defense of their country's honor.

Civil History.—New Chester and Danbury were classed for the election of representatives from 1800 to 1806, after which time New Chester was declared entitled to a representative of its own.

No record of any town officers can be found previous to 1802. In 1800, New Chester and Danbury elected Edward Blodgett representative for the two towns. No record of any election in 1801 can be obtained.

1802.—Carr Huse, town clerk; Ebenezer Kimball, Edward Blodgett, William W. Sargent, selectmen; Ebenezer Kimball, representative for New Chester and Danbury.

1803.—Carr Huse, town clerk; Jonathan Dickerson, James Karr, John Brown, selectmen; Ebenezer Kimball, representative for New Chester and Danbury.

Soldiers, etc. The people of this town have not been backward whenever danger threatened their country, but have shown their patriotism by contributing its full quota of men. Whenever a call was made, and it became necessary to resort to a draft to obtain men, the town voted liberal sums to pay for substitutes to take the place of her sons.

The following petition and votes will show the disposition of the people:

NEW CHESTER, June 5th 29th, 1776.

To the Honorable Colony Committee.

"We, the Subscribers, being A Majority of the Select Men and Committee of Safety for the Township of New Chester, being willing to Defend ourselves and fellow-Countrymen to the utmost of our Power, But finding ourselves Destitute, in A Great Measure, of Arms and Ammunition, Humbly beg you would give your Interest to procure About 50 lbs of Powder and 112 lbs. of Lead, and about 150 Flint and Fifteen Guns, which we Bind ourselves to the Honest payment of, as witness our hands.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

FRANK R. WOODWARD.¹

The first American ancestor of Mr. Woodward, his great-great-grandfather, came to this country from Ireland prior to 1750 and settled in Maine, and was a soldier in the Revolutionary War. He had a son, Stephen, who served his country in the War of 1812. These were brave and patriotic men, proud of the distinction of being descendants of Hannah Dustin, of Indian fame.

Stephen had a son, Jesse, who had a son, Daniel S., the father of the subject of this sketch. He married Dorcas, daughter of Enoch Adams, and lived in Salisbury, N. H., and was a stone-mason.

Frank R. was born in Salisbury February 9, 1845, and when three years of age his parents moved to Fisherville (now Penacook), where they lived four years and then moved to Franklin, N. H., where they kept the old "Hotel Boarding-House" for several years. The boyhood of Frank R. was passed with his parents, and his early educational advantages were limited to the district school, which he attended winters, and assisted his father in his work in the summer. His mother, a devoted Christian woman, much desired that he should be educated for the ministry, but circumstances directed him otherwise. After a course of study at the old Franklin Academy he commenced work in the mill, and with his wages assisted in the support of the family. This he continued to do until 1868, when he went to Manchester, N. H., where he was employed in H. Forsaith's needle-factory. Here he shortly became so efficient, and showed such an aptness to comprehend all the details of the work, that he was appointed superintendent, which position he filled with credit to himself and with profit to his employer. Under his management the business increased steadily, and in 1870 he bought out Mr. Forsaith and moved the enterprise to Hill, N. H., and there did a thriving business. Mr. Woodward, being of an inventive turn of mind, and desiring to develop plans that he had in mind, sold out his needle-works and commenced the manufacture of novelties in hardware, notably a rotary steel glass-cutter, which he had brought to perfection. In this branch of manufacture Mr. Woodward has been very successful, and the business in it has so increased that his works are the largest in the world, and there is not a civilized nation on the globe where his name is not familiar among the hardware trade and his goods are taken as the standard of excellence. From small beginnings this business has grown to a prominence that insures ample reward as a tribute to the peculiar skill and sagacity of its originator and proprietor.

In religion Mr. Woodward is a Free Baptist. He takes a lively interest in educational matters, and, while disinclined to hold office, has served on the Board of Education of his town as superintending school committee, and is active and earnest in the support of measures intended to benefit the young.

In politics Mr. Woodward is a Democrat, although prior to 1884 he was, in some respects, independent, voting for men and measures that he thought most worthy of support. That he has the confidence of his fellow-townsmen of different political views from his own is attested by the fact that he is the present representative of the town of Hill, N. H., in the General Court, although the town, on political matters, is Republican by a decided majority.

Mr. Woodward has been once married, and his children are Edwin Chase, born February 11, 1867, died in infancy; May F., born February 17, 1871, died May 20, 1884; Flora A., born June 5, 1874; Lillia Gordon, born November 5, 1875, died in infancy;

Eugene S., born September 20, 1878, died in infancy.

May F., who died at the age of thirteen, was a beautiful child, and greatly beloved by all who knew her. She was laid to rest in Pleasant Hill Cemetery, which was laid out by her father as a public cemetery after her death, and is dedicated to her memory. The other children, who were buried in the cemetery at Franklin, have been removed and rest beside her in this lovely spot.

Mr. Woodward is a member of the Masonic fraternity, also an Odd-Fellow, Knight of Pythias, Knight of Honor and a Good Templar. He is also postmaster at Hill, having been appointed in August, 1885.

Mr. Woodward is an enterprising citizen, a leader in town and village improvements, has the most beautiful residence in his town, and is respected and esteemed by all with whom he is in any way associated as a liberal citizen, a true friend.

HISTORY OF PEMBROKE.

BY JOHN N. MCCLINTOCK, A.M.

CHAPTER I.

PEMBROKE lies in the southeastern part of the county, and is bounded as follows:

The longitude of the spire of the Congregational meeting-house, which stands like a sentinel on the east side of the elevated main street, and commands a most extended prospect of hill and valley, has been computed as $71^{\circ} 27' 34.6''$ west of Greenwich; the latitude as $43^{\circ} 8' 54.8''$ north of the equator. The base of the spire, where it joins the roof, is four hundred and forty-six feet above the ocean at mean high-water at Portsmouth. The United States Coast Survey has given their authority for the above figures, and reasonable dependence may be placed upon them.

Pembroke joins Concord, the capital of the State, on the northwest, the centre of the Suncook River forming the line. It is bounded on the west by Merrimack River, which separates it from Bow, of ancient controversy, and which flows calmly, with unbroken surface, by the town, resting from its plunge at Garvin's Falls, and preparing for another fall at Hooksett. At this point the Merrimack has descended three hundred feet from its chief fountain, Lake Winnipiseogee, and has two hundred feet more to fall before its waters mingle with the ocean. On the south the town is bounded by the south bank of the Suncook River, and joins Allenstown. This stream takes its rise among the Belknap Mountains, affords many valuable water privileges in its course, flows through a charming valley, and, near its junction with the Merrimack, falls rapidly over one hundred feet, affording motive-power to one of the richest manufacturing corporations in New England, and fostering the village of Suncook, partly in Pembroke and partly in Allenstown. On the east or northeast side the town joins Epsom, Chichester and London, maintaining, with Chichester, the old provincial township line of Bow.

The town contains ten thousand two hundred and forty acres. From the intervals along the three rivers, which nearly surround the town, the land rises gradually toward the centre, attaining a height of some four hundred feet above the Merrimack at the greatest elevation near the centre, and several hundred feet higher on the Chichester line.

The surface is generally undulating. Near the mouth of the Suncook are some of those peculiar hills, called dunes, rising seventy feet above the river terrace, which mark the retreating line of some ancient glacier, or something of the kind. About one hundred feet above the Merrimack is exposed, for several miles on the side hill, a bed of clay, from twenty to thirty feet in thickness, the upper part hard, compact and gray, the lower part soft, plastic and blue, the whole covered by a few feet of sand. This whole bed is an unfailing source of wealth to its owners, and is largely worked for bricks, bringing more money into circulation for honest labor than a successful gold-mine.

But the chief attraction of Pembroke is its soil. This first attracted the hardy pioneers in the early part of the last century. For a hundred and fifty years it has been cultivated, and still yields a rich return to the husbandman. Like the hill-sides of France, Italy and Syria, it bids fair to last a thousand years to come. All the fruits and grains of our temperate zone can be cultivated within the town, and cattle, horses and sheep thrive upon the rich pasturage of the fields. The fathers of the town were thoughtful of coming generations, and noble old elms and oaks, with their grateful shade, delight the eye.

There are to be found to-day, within the town, many lineal descendants of the early proprietors, while every year there has been an exodus of sons and daughters, wandering from the home live to the commercial and manufacturing centres in search of fame and fortune—to the far-away prairies of the West, or the more distant mining-fields, for new homes, carrying with them an indelible memory of Pembroke and the loved scenes of youth.

The first settlers, both the children of the Massachusetts Pilgrims and the sons and daughters of the defenders of Londonderry, were pious, brave, industrious, law-abiding citizens, quick to respond to the call of duty, just to their neighbors and tenacious of their rights. Their successors have, in the several generations, inherited the virtues of their fathers. The good, brave, honest and industrious have always been welcome to their midst and have found congenial homes; the idle and vicious have never been counted as part of their community.

The incidents in the history of a people of this class are not of a thrilling nature; no fierce outbreaks, no family feuds and no crimes, except those committed by aliens, will mar the pages of its history. It is the record of a town started amidst difficulties, overcoming natural and artificial impediments, winning its way slowly to assured wealth, liberal means of education, broad fields, comfortable homes and a high rank among its neighbors for intelligence and public spirit.

Lovewell's township, or Suncook, was a frontier town for many years after its settlement. That it suffered no more during the contest was owing to the fact that its young men were constantly on the scout toward the enemy.

In 1729 the town began to be settled. And here let us glance at the different elements that combined to form the town of Pembroke,—there were the Puritans, from the old Bay Colony; the Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, from the settlement of Londonderry; and, lastly, the New Hampshire settlers from the neighborhood of Exeter, Dover and Kingston, who came in later under Bow titles. Truly the town was not homogeneous. A French family was the first to locate in town, and several Welsh families settled there later.

To fully understand the early history of Pembroke, it will be necessary to examine the records of the province of New Hampshire and of the province of Massachusetts Bay. Originally settled at about the same period, 1629-23, the progress of the Bay Colony had been more rapid than that of the settlements upon the Piscataqua. For a long period, 1649-80, Massachusetts assumed jurisdiction over the territory of New Hampshire. By her charter she claimed, as a northern boundary, a line three miles north of the Merrimack River, from its outlet to its source; New Hampshire claimed, as a southern bound, a line from a point three miles north of the mouth of the Merrimack, extending due west. The greater part of the present town of Pembroke was thus debatable ground, claimed by each party. The Indians, the rightful claimants, were ignored by both parties until their claims were set aside by the fate of war. Their last and most cruel punishment in this region was administered by Captain John Lovewell, and the company under his command, May 8, 1725, near Fryeburg, Me.,—a defeat from which the New Hampshire Indians never recovered, and which led directly to the granting and settlement of the town of Suncook (now Pembroke).

In September, 1724, two men disappeared from Dunstable. A scouting-party was immediately raised to search for them, but were surprised by the Indians. Nine of their number were killed and only two escaped—one badly wounded. Another party fell into their ambush. One was killed, four were wounded and the rest escaped. The number of the attacking Indians was estimated at thirty.

Aroused by these depredations, John Lovewell, Josiah Farwell and Jonathan Robbins petitioned the provincial government of Massachusetts for authority to raise and equip a company of scouts to "kill and destroy" their enemy, the Indians. Receiving proper encouragement, Captain Lovewell, with a company of men zealous to revenge their injuries, carried the war into the country of the enemy, ranged up the Merrimack Valley and to the northward of Lake Winnipiseogee, and succeeded in obtaining one captive and slaying one Indian. On their second expedition, the following January, they surprised and killed ten Indians in the neighborhood of Tamworth. The third expedition, of forty-six men, left Dunstable April 16, 1725. On the morning of the engagement at Pig-wacket only thirty-four men were in the command, the rest having been detached for various reasons, and the attacking party, under Paugus, was more than double that number. The fight commenced in the morning and lasted until after sunset, when the Indians withdrew, leaving the field to the scouts. The survivors of this daring band, after encountering great hardships, arrived at the settlements. Captain John Lovewell was among the first to fall on that unhappy day.

The General Court of Massachusetts received, May 31, 1727, a petition from the survivors and the heirs of those killed, who were with Captain John Lovewell on his several expeditions against the Indians, for the grant of a township adjoining and south of Penacook, to repay them for their services in behalf of the colony. The petition was taken into consideration June 27, 1727, and the township of Suncook, or Lovewell's township, was granted.

There is reason to believe that the first movement toward a settlement of Suncook was in the summer of 1728. It was the custom for the young men to start early in the spring for the newly-granted wild lands, build a rude log shanty for temporary shelter, and proceed at once to clear away the forest growth from their lots. The axe and firebrand were the means employed. Not unfrequently the crop of the first season nearly paid for the land. After the harvest the toilers would return to a more settled community in which to pass the winter.

Tradition asserts that Francis Doyne and wife were the first white inhabitants who ever wintered in the township (1728-29), and they may be said to have been the first permanent settlers. Their log hut is said to have been located about in the middle of the field west of Pembroke Street, just north of the road leading toward Garvin's Falls. After a severe snow-storm they were visited by a party from Penacook, who were anxious as to their safety, and were found in a roughly-built cabin, comfortable, contented and protected against the inclemency of the weather. Doyne was one of Captain Lovewell's soldiers. During the same summer, 1728, the property was probably visited both by many of the original grantees, their heirs and others wanting to purchase. The amount of work accomplished during this first year toward effecting a permanent settlement is unknown, but in the following spring (1729) the ingress of settlers was rapid.

Besides James Moor and Francis Doyne, there is reason to believe that the township was occupied in the summer of 1729 by James Mann, Samuel Gault, Thomas Cunningham and Noah Johnson. Contemporary or a very little later came Benjamin Holt, Richard Eastman, David Lovejoy, Abner Gordon, Benjamin Chandler, David Chandler, Stephen Holt and Dudley Broadstreet.

In a general sense, the settlers of the township displaced the Indians, but no particular tribe is known to have occupied the territory save as a hunting-ground and fishing rendezvous. The name of one Indian only has come down to us as having any connection with the place, and his record is very traditional and vague. Plausawa, in whose honor the hill in North Pembroke is named, is said to have had his wigwam in that locality. With his comrades, Sabatis and Christi, he was frequent visitor to this and neighboring sections until war was declared, when he cast his lot with the St. Francis tribe. The three are charged with having led or instigated the attack upon Suncook and Epsom in after-years. During a cessation of hostilities Plausawa and Sabatis were killed while on a friendly visit to Boscawen, in 1753.

At a meeting of the grantees or proprietors of the township of Suncook, held at Chelmsford, December 10, 1729, Lieutenant David Melvin, Mr. Eleazer Davis and Lieutenant Jonathan Hubbard, unanimously, and Dr. William Ayer and William Cummings, by a majority, were chosen a committee of five to order the affairs of the new settlement, and to admit the thirteen men of Captain Lovewell's early command who would actually settle upon their rights. At an adjourned meeting the next day, December 11th, it was voted that the committee of five already chosen should view the lands in the township, and, with the assistance of an able surveyor, lay out sixty lots, "the least to contain forty acres if the land will conveniently allow thereof; . . . the lots to be qualified by adding a larger quantity of land where the land shall appear to be of less value than the best, so that the lots be all equal in value in the judgment of the committee." It was also ordered that the interval-land, which was of especial value to new settlers, being already cleared of forest, should be equitably divided; that a plat of these lots should be made and distinctly numbered; and that, at a convenient time after this survey had been accomplished, the proprietors should be notified to meet and draw lots. The committee were enjoined to lay out an additional lot, "as conveniently as may be," for the first settled minister, and a "convenient portion of land reserved for the ministry."

A list of the first forty-seven grantees or proprietors of the township of Suncook, together with the thirteen who were admitted as equal sharers, taken

December 11, 1729, is here given, together with the number drawn by each proprietor in the first division of lots subsequently made,—

The inroad of settlers in 1730 was probably rapid. The giants of the forest fell before the woodman's axe, and the log cabin was rendered homelike by the presence of women and children. The few scattering Indians remaining in the neighborhood were indifferent or friendly, and doubtless the settlers received occasional calls from them.

The log houses built by the pioneers of the last century are unknown to-day in this vicinity, but their type may still be seen in the logging camps of Grafton and Coos Counties, and in all new countries. In summer the life was not unpleasant,—the river teemed with shad, salmon, and trout; the deer and the bear wandered in the neighboring forests; the virgin soil yielded wonderful harvests. Their fare was simple, but with prudence and foresight one could provide for the family during the long winter months with ordinary exertion. Fuel was at their very doors, to be had for the chopping, and pitch pine knots answered for candles and gas.

Wolves, lean and hungry, might howl about their safely-barred windows, but could not enter their dwellings; nor could the cold affect them, with logs hospitably piled in the open fire-place. The Bible and New England Primer might form their thoroughly read library, but tradition was a never-failing source of interest to them.

James Moore probably erected his house this year, said to have been the first framed building in the township, and the frame to-day forms a part of Samuel Emery Moore's house. Neighbors from Buck-street and Concord assisted at the raising, and a few Indians are said to have helped. Tradition asserts that one of the latter was worsted in a friendly contest and trial of strength, usual from time immemorial on such occasions, and became very angry at his overthrow, threatening vengeance. His wrath was appeased by a potato from a brown jug which had already come into use. Moore was very sagacious in his treatment of the Indians, and gained their friendship; his place was avoided by them in after-years during hostilities, though fortified to repel an attack.

In April, 1733, it was "Voted that a meeting-house, twenty-four feet wide and thirty feet long, be built as soon as may be, and set upon or near a lot of land, No. 3, the said house to be of good hewn logs, ten or eleven feet stud, the roof to be well covered with long shingles, well laid and nailed, and one door well made and hung, ye ends of ye house to be closed with good clapboards or boards, all to be done sufficiently workmanlike by the last day of June" ensuing.

The contract for erecting this structure was awarded to Timothy Richardson for the sum of "fifty-five pounds, in good bills of credit," provided he found all the nails and gave bonds for the faithful performance of the work.

This church, which was built in accordance with the above vote, stood at the northeast corner of the graveyard, on Main Street, near the residence of Hon. Aaron Whittemore, not far from the Meeting-House Brook, to which it gave the name. It answered the purpose for which it was built for more than a dozen years, when it was replaced by a more pretentious framed building occupying the same site.

At a subsequent meeting, at the same place, September 19th, a grant of fifty acres of land and a sum of money not to exceed sixty pounds, was voted to encourage the person or persons who should build a good and suitable saw-mill and corn-mill in some convenient place in the township, acceptable to the proprietors' committee.

In 1737 the first road to Rumford was laid out. It led diagonally across the lots very directly from the first meeting-house, at the northeast corner of the cemetery, over intervening land to the bridge; thence by the river-bank to the great bend in the Merrimack, where a ferry was early established, about a mile below the lower bridge in Concord, and nearly as far above the railroad bridge.

At this period the township of Suncook included a part of the present towns of Pembroke, Hooksett, Allentown and Bow, as may be seen by consulting the plan. Buck-street and North Pembroke were not included. The former was probably settled by the Cochran, McLucas, Sinckler, Martin, McGaffey, Fullerton and other families. The north and east parts of the town were then a wilderness, covered by the primeval forest. The Suncook settlers, for the most part, were on the home lots, which were on each side of what is now Pembroke Street. Their meadow lots, on the Suncook and Soucook Rivers, were reached by winding paths through the forest, and were valuable to the pioneers from the wild grass that grew upon them. The interval lots along the Merrimack are said to have been open at the first settlement, from inundation of the river, or kept so by the former occupants of the land, the Indians, as corn-fields.

An old man once said that the pioneers settled on high land, not on account of its fertility, but to avoid the trails of the savages, which were made by the river-bank; that the Indians would never turn from their march to do malicious injury, except when on the war-path; and because from an elevation the clearings could be better protected by a stockade and garrison-house.

Mention has been made of the dispute between the provinces of Massachusetts and New Hampshire as to their boundary line. To settle the conflicting claims, an appeal was made to the King, who appointed a board of commissioners, selected from the councilors of Nova Scotia, Rhode Island, New York and New Jersey, with power to settle the question. This commission first met at Hampton, August 1, 1737. A few days later the Assembly of New Hampshire met in the same town, while in the neighboring town of Salisbury, across the line, the Assembly of Massachusetts was gathered. Jonathan Belcher was the Royal Governor of both provinces; David Dunbar was Lieutenant-Governor of New Hampshire. This Assembly of the Great and General Courts was attended with much pomp and ceremony. Evidently the legislators were acting the part of lobbyists on a grand scale. The decision of the commissioners was not satisfactory to either party, and they had to again refer the subject to the King.

In this appeal New Hampshire had the advantage of the most skillful advocates, who represented the "poor, little, loyal, distressed province of New Hampshire" as crowded and oppressed by the "vast, opulent, overgrown province of Massachusetts;" and New Hampshire won the case. The question was settled by His Majesty, in council, March 5, 1749, and the present southern boundary of New Hampshire was established. With many other townships granted by Massachusetts, Suncook was found to be without the jurisdiction of the province that had granted the charter, and within a province governed by different laws, and under a proprietary system where the wild land was owned by individuals and not by the State.

This was the more bitter to the inhabitants of Suncook because of the Masonian claim. This hung over their heads and affected their ownership in the lands which they had recovered from a wilderness by years of toil and exposure. They had become attached to the beautiful locality, and would not give it up, at least without a struggle. They stood in the places of those heroes who had dislodged the Indians from this region and rendered the whole habitable. Some of the number were in their midst, and they clung to their lands and hoped for the best. This act of the King led to a more serious contest, which lasted a score of years, to the detriment of all engaged. In Suncook and Rumford it was generally known as the Bow controversy.

To certain of the settlers, whose families for over a century had shared the fortunes of Massachusetts and imbibed its prejudices, this change in jurisdiction must have been unwelcome. To the Presbyterians it was objectionable only so far as it affected their property rights. As individual preferences were not regarded, all had to submit to the inevitable.

In 1744 the long-expected war between France and England was declared, and the New England settlements were exposed to the merciless and treacherous attacks of the Indians along the whole frontier. These foes were armed and rewarded by the French authorities in Canada. Four block-houses were erected in Suncook,—one where Mr. Moody K. Wilson lives, one on the farm of Mr. Edward Elliot (formerly occupied by Colonel James Head, and later by Deacon Hazel-tine), one where Mrs. Mary A. Vose lives (formerly occupied by Rev. Aaron Whittemore) and one where Mr. Samuel E. Moore lives,—as places of refuge in case of an attack. These block-houses, or forts, were constructed of green logs, two stories in height, the upper story projecting, and affording port-holes through which the sides of the structure could be protected by those within. Moore's house was protected by a stockade. Aware of the danger which surrounded them, arms were carried on every occasion, even to the meeting-house, where they were stacked, ready for instant use, in case of a surprise.

The New Hampshire Assembly was petitioned in June, by Moses Foster, in behalf of the inhabitants, for a garrison of soldiers to act as a protection. The whole province was in arms all through the year.

The good people of Suncook became dissatisfied with their log meeting-house in 1746, and resolved to replace it with a frame structure better adapted to their wants. The frame of timber was accordingly prepared, and the whole town turned out to the raising. So important was the movement that citizens from the neighboring townships gave their presence and assistance to the work, and tradition affirms that among others were the Bradleys, from Concord, who, within a short time after, perished by the hands of the Indians.

The building was interfered with by the Indian disturbances, but at length it was finished, and answered for a meeting-house and town-house for over half a century. It stood at the northeast corner of the cemetery, on Main Street, until about 1896, when it was moved to its present position. Its solid frame, having been converted into a barn, is now owned by Hon. Aaron Whittemore, a great-grandson of the first settled minister in town.

In August the Indians made a successful attack upon a party of seven men in the neighboring settlement of Rumford, killed five and carried two captives to Canada. The inhabitants of Suncook were justly alarmed, and took extra precautions to escape a surprise. The firing of three guns in quick succession was the signal of alarm, when men, women and children would hasten to the garrison-houses as places of safety. A commissioned officer was stationed in each of these for command in its defense. Rev. Aaron Whittemore, who occupied one of the block-houses, was thus commissioned. The planting and harvesting were attended with peculiar danger, yet, as they were necessary exposures, these hardy pioneers ventured all rather than desert their new homes. Companions of the dreaded Captain John Lovewell or their descendants, they kept their foes at a respectful distance by fear of their unerring rifles and attested bravery.

The following petition is of interest:

"To his Excellency Benning Wentworth, Esq. Governor and Commander-in-Chief in and over His Majesty's Province of New Hampshire, and to the Hon^{ble} Majesty's Council and House of Representatives of said Province, in General Court assembled:

"The humble petition of the inhabitants of Suncook, in said Province humbly sheweth,

"That on Monday the twentieth of this instant May, about two hours after sun rise, the Indians set on two men in ye lower part of this town, and killed one of them, and the other narrowly escaped, and they fired at a house but was repulsed, and toward evening of the same day, the Sun about two hours high, they totted two or three houses and fired on our men going to the pasture for their cows, within abt half a mile from the meeting house, a considerable number of the enemy, we believe they intend to destroy ye place, and ever since we have been penned close in our garrisons and can do no work abroad, so that without speedy help we must all move off.

"May it therefore please your excellency and honors, in your great wisdom, to send us such speedy help and protection as in your great wisdom you shall think fit, and your Petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

"Dated at Suncook this 26 of May, 1747.

The Indians who led the attack are supposed to have been Sabitas, Plausawa and Christi, who were familiar with the localities.

After this event the General Court of New Hampshire were pleased to order a garrison of eight good men to be stationed at Suncook through the summer and fall for the protection of the settlement.

The three assessors appointed by the proprietors have left on record a document of considerable interest, as it gives the name and residence of each of the possessors or claimants of the several original rights January 30, 1748. Each right was assessed twenty-two pounds.

It was voted in the General Court of New Hampshire, January 31, 1753, that "Whereas there are sundry persons inhabiting within the province of New Hampshire upon a tract of land" called Suncook, who were "within no town-ship," they should be, with a part of Penneycook, in one district, and be compelled to pay their proportion of the province tax.

Rev. Timothy Walker, as agent for Rumford and Suncook, crossed the ocean to lay the case of these two townships before the King in Council in 1754. It may be here stated that Mr. Walker was eminently successful in his mission, when it came to a final hearing, and the claims of the proprietors of Rumford and Suncook were supported against those of Bow, and, behind them, the officials of the provincial government of New Hampshire. This decision was not reached, however, until 1762, too late to be of advantage to the inhabitants of Suncook, who had entered into a compromise before that time with the proprietors of Bow.

War with France was again declared in 1754, which involved a war with the Canadians and their Indian allies. In the previous war the people of New Hampshire had depended upon block-houses for a defense against their savage foes, were constantly surprised, and paid dearly for their want of care and watchfulness. They had been goaded to desperation, and resolved to carry the war into the country of the enemy, and inflict some of those cruelties to which they had been subjected. From the first it was a terribly offensive war on the part of New Englanders. They aimed at the conquest of Canada, and its reduction to a royal province. Robert Rogers and his trusted lieutenant, John Stark, with their fearless rangers, became a terror to the Canadians and a scourge to the Indians.

The terms of settlement between the proprietors of the township of Suncook and the proprietors of the township of Bow is known from the petition which was presented by a committee of the latter to the General Court of New Hampshire, dated January 1, 1757.

This petition, presented by Daniel Pierce, Esq., Thomas Wiggin and Daniel Marston, gentlemen, William Pottle, blacksmith, and Benjamin Norris, yeoman, in behalf of the proprietors of Bow, represented that many persons claimed a right to lands in the township by titles not derived from the proprietors of Bow, who had made considerable improvements, and with whom many expensive suits at law had been had, which impeded the settlement of the township; that many of the claimers and settlers, particularly those who held their title from the proprietors of Suncook, were desirous of an accommodation and settlement of the disputes, and were willing to become not only inhabitants of Bow, but to hold their title from the proprietors of Bow; that the proprietors of Bow were desirous of having the question settled without further expensive lawsuits by reasonable concessions on their part. Notwithstanding the amicable and peaceable disposition of the parties concerned, certain impediments existed to the solution of the question, which the General Court was called upon to remove, the most important of which were the conflicting plans of the two townships.

The proprietors of Bow were willing that those who had made improvements should enjoy the fruit of their labor; and, accordingly, they asked the court to annul and vacate the survey of the home-lots of Bow, so far as they interfered with the divisions of land already executed in the township of Suncook, and that a new survey of the undivided lands in the township should be ordered.

This petition was favorably received, and, no one objecting at the hearing ordered, the petitioners were given liberty to introduce a bill in accordance.

The inhabitants thus gave up the struggle, and became, for the time being, citizens of Bow, having effected a compromise by which they retained their homes and cultivated fields, but sacrificed the undivided lands of the old grant, curtailing their respective rights more than one-half.

So the township of Suncook, or Lovewell's township, ceased to have an existence save in the memory of gallant men and women who, for thirty years, had braved the hardships of frontier life to secure homes for themselves.

John Noyes, in behalf of the inhabitants of Bow living on the east side of the Merrimack River, petitioned the General Court for parish privileges, and were granted the liberty of bringing in a bill April 25, 1758.

Pembroke was incorporated a parish November 1, 1759, by the General Court of New Hampshire, the agents of the town of Bow not making any objection, but favoring the charter, claiming that it would be to the advantage of both.

People are naturally curious as to the origin of the name of their native town. The name of Pembroke was bestowed upon the township by Governor Benning Wentworth, probably in honor of the Earl of Pembroke, an influential member of the Court of St. James at that period. The word is derived from the Welsh, penbroch, signifying head of the foam. The old town of Pembroke is situate in Pembrokeshire, the southwest county in Wales. The town is of great antiquity, and is on a peninsula extending into one of the bays of Milford Haven. A part of the walls which once surrounded the town still remain.

The charter of Pembroke included that part of Bow east of the Merrimack River, between the Suncook and the Suncook Rivers, a place called Suncook and a place called Buck Street.

Rev. Daniel Mitchell was ordained pastor over the Presbyterian Church December 3, 1760.

The Presbyterian meeting-house, which stood on the west side of Main Street, opposite C. L. Dow's house, was probably erected this year.

The Scotch-Irish, so-called in New England history, were of the purest Saxon lineage, with their blood unmingled, in the seventeenth century, with the half barbaric Scotch highlanders, or their more rude cousins, the Irish Celts. They were rigid Presbyterians, followers and admirers of Oliver Cromwell, enemies of Popery and the Established Church of England, brave, zealous lovers of learning and liberty, and withal, bigoted in their advanced notions. Cromwell had peopled the wasted districts of northern Ireland with these, his most trusted and reliable troops, to pacify that land most effectually.

They could present a brave front to an open attack, but they were not equal to withstanding the petty encroachments of the Established Church insidiously undermining their beloved Kirk. The Pilgrims had found religious freedom in a new and undeveloped country, and thither the Scotch-Irish sent agents to spy out and report the condition of the land and its fitness for occupation. The Irish had not intimidated them; they scorned the untutored Indian. Like a horde they flocked to the sea-board and poured into New England, Pennsylvania and the southern provinces, pushing the frontiers rapidly into the untrodden wilderness, and settling the fertile valleys and hill-sides far in advance of their predecessors. One stream striking Boston was diverted to Londonderry. In 1719 a Scotch-Irish colony located there to stay. Hundreds followed in their footsteps, tarried awhile with their friends so happily settled, and pressed on into the wilderness, over the hills to the Falls of Amoskeag, up the Merrimack, by Hooksett Falls, to the fertile valley of the Suncook, still farther to the blooming intervals of Pennecook and the wide meadows of the Contoocook. Early in the records of this township we find the Scotch-Irish holding "original rights," admitted as proprietors and freeholders, and even as early as 1737 claiming a majority. Being in a majority, they claimed a voice in the settlement of a minister to preach the gospel, but were "counted out," and paid their rates toward the support of a minister not to their liking with evident disrelish.

The Presbyterians were exempted from paying toward the support of the Congregational minister, and were incorporated a distinct parish by a special act of the General Assembly, passed December 16, 1763. It was enacted that all persons living in the parish of Pembroke, who belonged to the Presbyterian congregation and assembly, or should join that society, should be included in the new parish, and Lieutenant Thomas McLucas was authorized to call the first meeting.

The breach between Great Britain and the colonies was widened during 1766, although Parliament repealed the odious Stamp Act. Peace prevailed in Pembroke, for not a ripple of trouble has reached us from that remote year. The Congregationalists and Presbyterians had agreed to disagree, and pursued their respective ways with outward amity. There is a tradition that the families ostracized each other, forbidding the young people to associate or mingle together, and absolutely prohibiting intermarriage with those of the other sect, under pain of disinheritance. At this day the difference between the two denominations is so small that the common reader could hardly comprehend it were some one to fully explain.

Rev. Aaron Whittemore died November 16, 1767.

The first census of the town on record was taken this year, from which it appears that there were 49 unmarried men from sixteen to sixty, 85 married men from sixteen to sixty, 134 boys under sixteen, 16 men over sixty, 169 unmarried females, 97 married women, 5 widows, 2 slaves,—a total of 557 souls.

In 1774, Dr. Richard Eastman and Captain Andrew Buntin were chosen a committee to run the lines of the new township granted by the General Court of the Massachusetts Bay to the "sufferers of Suncook." The following January, Captain Joseph Baker was directed to deposit the plan in the office of the Secretary of State, which he accordingly did. This township was located in the State of Maine, called Sambrook, and is now known as Lovell and New Sweden, on the banks of the Saco.

At Pembroke the people were up with the times. A Mr. Dix persisted in selling tea in town; but a company of "Sons of Liberty" from the adjacent towns, under the command of Andrew McClary, made him a visit, and taking the tea from the store, made a bonfire of it in the public street.

Nearly a century had elapsed after the landing of the Pilgrims before the settlement of Pembroke; a half-century more had passed, and the descendants of the early pioneers, who had fled from persecution in the mother-country, had become accustomed to self-government in the vast wilderness of America, and more and more alienated from the dominion of the King. They had been joined by the discontented spirits from Great Britain, notably the Scotch-Irish, and were ready to resist any and all encroachments upon their rights, and were ripe for rebellion.

A foolish King and a stubborn ministry at home hastened the catastrophe—a long and exhaustive war, which resulted gloriously for the United Colonies, and gave birth to a great nation.

Before this date Pembroke had been a parish without a representative,—a part of a royal province without a representative in the home government, ruled by a royal Governor. From this time the town was a republic, soon, with other towns, to be united in a great and free State, which, in turn, was to become, a few years later, one of the United States of America.

The first overt act of open rebellion had been committed in December of 1774, in the attack upon and dismantling of Fort William and Mary, at the mouth of the Piscataqua, by the people of New Hampshire, and the citizens of Pembroke seemed alive to the importance of the crisis upon them. With the rest of New England, they sprang to arms to resist the invasion of their soil by British troops, and to drive them from their borders. The differences of creeds were forgotten in planning and doing against the common enemy. The veterans of the French War flocked to the standard of the intrepid Stark, fought by his side at Bunker Hill, hemmed the British within the limits of Boston and helped to force them to evacuate the town. From that time onward, through the darkest days of the unequal struggle until the disbandment of the victorious army, Pembroke did her share in achieving our independence, and in caring for the dependent families of those who were absent in the field.

In the city of Paris, September 3, 1783, David Hartley, for the King of England, Benjamin Franklin, John Adams and John Jay, for the United States, signed their names to a treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States, making the thirteen States forever independent.

This war, as it affected Pembroke, should be considered as a whole.

It was the struggle of a small body of free, poor, liberty-loving and unorganized patriots against the land and sea forces of the most powerful nation of modern times. That the contest was finally decided for the weaker party was owing to their perfect unanimity of sentiment, their bravery, their endurance and the opportune assistance given by France, England's great rival. Eight years of warfare had disciplined the raw troops, who, by their bravery and zeal, had hemmed the British within the limits of Boston, until, when disbanded by General Washington, they were war-scarred veterans of whom any commander might be proud and of whom any enemy might stand in dread.

With the close of the war came the complete collapse of the Continental currency. It disappeared from commerce as worthless. But the rich land was left, with its abundant crops; freedom had been assured, and barter answered for currency.

In 1792 there were licensed six tavern-keepers. Two years later occurs the first record of a post-rider through the town and a weekly line of stages.

The charter for the first New Hampshire turnpike was granted in 1796.

Mr. Stickney was the first postmaster, appointed in 1806, and from this date Pembroke became a post-town.

The establishment of a post-office in Pembroke was, without doubt, very welcome to the inhabitants, and may be justly considered an important event in its history.

In earlier times it was customary to intrust to some friend or acquaintance who might be traveling in the right direction a missive for an absent friend or relative. Doubtless the post-rider, in his journeying through the town, accommodated those living on his immediate route, and the blowing of his horn announced his welcome approach. As a matter of course, few letters were written in those days, so that high rates of postage were not onerous.

It was decided to erect a town-house in 1811, and Isaac Morrison, John Knox, Jr., Jacob Emery, Jr., Robert Martin, James Cochran, Jr., Asa Robinson and Timothy Barnard were chosen a committee to determine the "center of money and travel," and report at an adjourned meeting. Their report was accepted; the site of the town-house was located near the pound. The sum of four hundred dollars was voted toward building it. The sum was afterward increased to five hundred dollars, and the construction was entrusted to John Knox, Jr., Samuel Cochran, Jr., and Robert Martin.

An effort was made to have the town accept the use of the north meeting-house for public meetings, but it failed.

A meeting was called in the new town-house in October, when enough money and labor was voted to thoroughly repair the various bridges in town.

Manufacturing of cotton into cloth, which has since become an industry of great importance in the village of Suncook, was first undertaken in 1812, by Major Caleb Stark, a Revolutionary soldier and a son of General John Stark. He purchased the establishment known as Osgood's Mills, which was being enlarged or rebuilt by a company, and introduced machinery lately invented.

In July, 1813, Christopher Osgood contracted to build a stone pound "in the corner of Mr. Lakeman's pasture, by the town-house," for one hundred and thirty-five dollars.

The act of incorporation of Pembroke Academy was dated June 25, 1818. The building for the school was erected by subscriptions raised among the inhabitants of Pembroke. The trustees of the corporation were Rev. Abraham Burnham, A.M., Hon. Boswell

Stevens, A.M., Daniel Knox, Esq., John H. Merrill, Timothy Barnard, Deacon Moses Haseltine, William Haseltine, Captain Jacob Elliot and Rev. Jonathan Curtis, A.M.

John Farmer wrote of the town, in the year 1823,—

"There are many water privileges, four paper-mills, the cotton-factory of Major Stark and several mills, together with a flourishing village. The main street extends nearly on a parallel with Merrimack River in a straight course about three miles, and is very pleasant. On this are situated the academy, one of the meeting-houses and the principal village."

The visit of General Lafayette to Pembroke in 1825 shall be described in the words of his youthful companion, Colonel A. A. Parker, aide-de-camp of Governor David L. Morrill, now living at a venerable old age and in the full possession of his faculties, in Glastonbury, Conn. (1883).—

"Our route lay through Suncook village, at the south end of Pembroke. There Major Caleb Stark, son of Major-General John Stark, lived, and, as he had a slight acquaintance with General Lafayette in the Revolutionary War, had written him a request that he would call at his house, as he very much wished to see him and introduce him to his family. We called, and, on introducing him to the general, he seized his hand and began an animated speech about Revolutionary times, which did not seem soon to terminate. His family were standing on the opposite side of the room, waiting to be introduced, but he seemed to have forgotten them.

"I was so acquainted with the major, but not with his family, and could not introduce them myself. In this dilemma the spirited Miss Harriet Stark, no longer able to brook delay, came forward, seized General Lafayette's hand and said: 'Permit me to introduce myself to you as the eldest daughter of Major Caleb Stark, with whom you are talking, and the granddaughter of Major-General John Stark, the hero of Bennington; and now permit me to introduce you to my mother, brothers and sisters,' who she did, with her usual promptness and energy.

"When we were seated in the carriage, General Lafayette said,— 'Miss Harriet Stark does, indeed, inherit all the fire and spirit of her grandfather, and would have been a heroine had she lived in the exciting scenes of the Revolutionary times.'

"Near the close of a beautiful summer day (Tuesday, June 21st), one of the longest in the year, we entered upon the long, main street of Pembroke. The sun, having moved round his long circle in the sky, was resting in crimson robes on the western hills, and soon retired for the night. Not so Pembroke village; that was wide-awake and gave the general as enthusiastic a welcome as he had received anywhere on the route. Sometimes, it seemed, the less the numbers the greater the zeal.

"We had used the diligence and had traveled rapidly when not hindered, but our coming had been so well advertised by the well-known Walker, the stage-driver on the route, that it was known to all people, far and near. And so it was, that we were not only detained at villages, hotels and cross-roads, but even at a single cottage. Our approach seemed to have been watched; and, at the report of a musket or rattle-blast, people would rapidly appear from their lounging places where none were visible before; and the general most needs pause a moment, take by the hand those near by and speak a few words. Infancy and age were alike presented, and the holt and the lame were sitting in easy-chairs before the cottage doors. At one of these cottages an invalid old lady, 'eakavrons and pale,' was brought by two men, in her arm-chair, to the carriage; she seized the general's hand with both of hers, and with tearful eyes exclaimed, 'Bless the Lord!'

"At Fiske's hotel, on the main street of Pembroke, five miles from Concord, we rested for the night. A large concourse of people gave the general a hearty welcome and shook hands with him, and he made a short speech. On my suggesting to the most active men that the general had had a long and fatiguing day and needed rest, the people promptly retired and Pembroke village could never have been more quiet."

After supper the general leaned back in his easy chair, and carried on a long and agreeable conversation with his escort before retiring.

RESIDENCE OF GEORGE P. LITTLE.
PEMBROKE ST., PEMBROKE, N. H.

The next day (June 22, 1825) a committee of the Legislature, then in session at Concord, consisting of Hon. Stephen P. Webster, of the Senate, and four members of the House, came down in a coach-and-six to escort the general to Concord. Six white horses were attached to the barouche, in which were General Lafayette and Mr. Webster, and the procession, made up of a long line of carriages, proceeded on their way, being met on the Concord line by twenty independent companies of the New Hampshire militia, under the command of General Bradbury Bartlett.

The town was shocked, on Sunday, June 23, 1833, by the rapidly-spread intelligence that Sally, wife of Chauncy Cochran, had been murdered by Abraham Prescott, a boy of eighteen, who had been living with the family.

Prescott accompanied Mrs. Cochran into a field near the house to pick strawberries, and struck her the fatal blow, in a secluded spot, with no motive that was ever known. From the testimony at the trial, it was evident that he was of weak mind.

He was lodged in jail at Hopkinton, and was allowed two trials, in which he was ably defended by Hon. Ichabod Bartlett, of Portsmouth, and Charles H. Peaslee, Esq., of Concord, who firmly believed in his moral irresponsibility. At this period in the history of the town the farmers were simply farmers and nothing more. They raised nearly all the supplies for their own tables, and largely for their clothing, which was manufactured from the raw materials in their homes. Wheat was much more generally grown then than now, but not in sufficient quantities to furnish bread for the household. Flour was rarely bought by the barrel, and barley, rye and Indian corn were extensively used. In those earlier days flour bread was, with large numbers of families, dignified with the name of "cake," and considered a luxury for use on extra occasions, when company was entertained. A story is told in one of our old Rockingham County towns which illustrates this fact. A high-toned gentleman, known as the "Squire," called at a farm-house one day on some business, and when he had finished his errand and had remounted at the door, the good house-wife, wishing to impress the squire with the dignity and thrift of her family, said to him: "Squire, won't you stop and have some flour bread and butter?" thinking it now too late for him to accept her invitation. To her chagrin the doughty squire replied: "Thank you, marm, I don't care if I do," and promptly dismounted and entered the house. The poor woman could only explain that, to her surprise, she found the flour bread all out, and offered him the best she had, some Indian bannock. When a boy, the writer had often seen at the neighbors' a string of these bannocks, eight or ten in number, set upon tins in front of the fire in the broad fire-place, there being room then left in the corner for him to sit and look straight up the chimney into the blue heavens. There was very little market for farm produce in those days, except in the larger towns; long journeys had to be made, mostly to such as were known as "sea-ports," as there were no interior towns of sufficient population to be centres of such trade. Every farmer kept a flock of sheep, and wool constituted a large portion of the clothing. It was carded, spun and woven at home, and made into garments for both sexes. The best clothes for men and boys were made of what was called "fulled cloth." This was made at home, of the finest material, and taken to the mills known as "fulling-mills," where it was put through a process of thickening, dyeing and finishing. The women used to wear gowns of cloth which was called "pressed woolen." This was simply home-made flannel, taken to the mills above named, and pressed, so as to present a glossy surface.

Every farmer had a small patch of flax. This was pulled and spread out in rows on the ground, "rotted," and then "broken" and "swingled," and was prepared for the combing, carding and the "little wheel," as the machine was called, on which the flax was spun, to distinguish it from the larger machine for spinning wool. It was woven into cloth for table-covers, toweling, sheeting and shirting. The "tow," which was the coarse portion combed out on the "hatchel," was spun into a coarse yarn, of which a cloth was made for summer suits for men and boys. The tow shirt, so commonly worn, was, when new, an instrument of torture to the wearer, as it was full of prickling spines left from the woolly part of the stalk.

Pembroke Academy.—From the first, New England has been noted for her regard for the intellectual welfare of her people. Not to be behind others, the people of New Hampshire early made provision for the mental and moral instruction of their children. In 1647 the first law establishing town schools was enacted. In 1693 an act was passed requiring the different towns to raise money, by assessment on the inhabitants, for building and repairing school-houses and for providing a school-master. In 1719 every town of fifty house-holders or upwards was required to provide a school-master to teach children to read and write, and every town of one hundred house-holders to have a grammar school, kept by "some discreet person of good conversation, well instructed in the tongues." In 1805 the district system was established. In 1807 the assessment for school purposes was increased and the law requiring grammar schools to teach Latin and Greek was repealed. From that time to the present, laws have with great frequency been passed regulating educational matters. The act repealing the law requiring towns to have instructions given in Latin and Greek was probably owing to the fact that previous to this time nine academies had been incorporated. Whatever may have been the influence operative in the abolition of such instruction, it is evident that the class of work attempted by the grammar school was now left to the academies. It appears, then, that very early was felt the need of a classical education, and so the same spirit which had originated the previous enactments led to the founding of institutions of a higher grade. In accordance with the law referred to above, there was formerly in this town a grammar school, the house being located on land between the dwelling-house of Mr. William Fife and the Ferry road, so called, there being but one house to accommodate the people of Suncook and Pembroke Street. Thus early, then, was evinced in the history of this town a desire to give to the youth a higher education. It was about this time (1807) that there came to this town three men, who, no doubt, had the shaping of Pembroke Academy,—Dr. Abel Blanchard, Rev. Abraham Burnham and Boswell Stevens, Esq.; physician, clergyman and lawyer. Dr. Blanchard was born in Wilton, October 10, 1782. At the age of seventeen he was a clerk in a store in Concord, where he remained two or three years. He afterwards studied medicine in the same city. In October, 1805, he commenced practicing at Pittsfield. Here he showed an interest in education, as he conceived the idea of establishing an academy. He made certain proposals to the town, but they were rejected. In 1808 he removed to this town.

Rev. Mr. Burnham was born in Dunbarton November 18, 1775, graduated with honor at Dartmouth College in the class of 1804 and was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in this town in 1808.

Boswell Stevens, Esq., was born in Pomfret, Conn., in 1782, graduated at Dartmouth College in the same class with Rev. Mr. Burnham and established himself in the practice of law in this town in 1807.

Fortunate indeed was it for Pembroke that three such men as these should become identified with its interests.

Dr. Blanchard was not a man of vigorous constitution. His health began to fail him about the year 1817. It seems that during his last illness he had conversation with Mr. Burnham about the disposition of his property, and that it was at Mr. Burnham's suggestion that in his will, which was dated January 15, 1818, Dr. Blanchard, after making bequests to his friends (he was an unmarried man), left the residue of his property to found a "Public School or Academy in Pembroke." This amounted to about two thousand five hundred dollars. The school was incorporated as Pembroke Academy June 25, 1818. The first board of trustees appointed by Dr. Blanchard consisted of Rev. Abraham Burnham, Boswell Stevens, Esq., Daniel Knox, Esq., John H. Merrill, Timothy Barnard, Deacon Moses Haseltine, William Haseltine, Capt. Jacob Elliot and Rev. Jonathan Curtis. In his will Dr. Blanchard expressed the desire that the people of the town raise the funds and erect the school building.

On the Fast Day subsequent to Dr. Blanchard's decease Rev. Mr. Burnham preached a sermon on the text, "Behold, I have set before you an open door, and no man can shut it;" and a subscription at that time was taken amounting to eight hundred dollars.

The foundation was laid in October, 1818, and the building was dedicated on the 25th of May, 1819. Rev. Jonathan Curtis, of Epsom, preached the sermon. The school opened the following day under the instruction of Mr. Amos W. Burnham and Miss Frances Newell, with an attendance of forty-eight students. Thus, with much devotion, was instituted a school which, with varied success, has never failed to open its door regularly to welcome those who have sought its instruction. Its stated object is "for the purpose of improving the rising generation in science, morality and religion;" also, "for the education of youth in the English, Latin and Greek languages, writing, arithmetic and other branches of literature commonly taught in the public schools."

The aim of the founder has been in the main the aim of the trustees and teachers. It will not be out of place to say that Dr. Burnham ever looked upon the school as his child, for which he cared until his death in 1852. He was president of the board of trustees from the establishment of the school.

It has a long list of gentlemen and lady assistants, who have shown themselves "worthy of the vocation wherewith they were called." There is a strong inclination on the part of the writer to mention by name some of its alumni; but since there are so many, it would be invidious to give way to that inclination.

From its halls have gone forth Governors, Lieutenant-Governors, United States and State Senators and Representatives, judges, physicians, clergymen, teachers, and, in fact, its alumni have graced all the walks of life. The building first erected in 1818-19 was enlarged in 1841, and in 1866 remodeled and fitted up with modern furniture, and from time to time has been repaired, and at present writing (1885) is in good condition. The original fund at present amounts to two thousand three hundred dollars. In 1836, Hon. Boswell Stevens left a legacy of one thousand dollars. In 1865, Mrs. Mary T. Wilkins, of Suncook, widow of the late J. H. Wilkins, Esq., a former treasurer, made a donation of one thousand dollars. In 1866, Mr. John C. Knox, a former trustee, made the acad-any residuary legatee. There were received two thousand five hundred and forty-four dollars. In 1874, Mrs. Betsey Whitehouse made a donation of one thousand dollars, and in 1877 left by will two thousand dollars. Samuel P. Langmaid, Esq., of Somerville, Mass., a native of Chichester, left by will five thousand dollars.

In 1885, Hon. Asa Fowler, of Concord, a native of this town, left by will one thousand dollars. The institution has lately had several thousand dollars bequeathed to it by Mr. Guy T. Little, a former student, residing at the time of his death at Bismarck, D. T., but it has not yet come into possession of the bequest. The library is not large, yet of late the number of books has been steadily increasing. In 1879 a room was fitted up as an art gallery, in which already are several portraits of the alumni. The students publish monthly, during term-time, a school journal called The Academician, devoted to the interests of the school. The present condition of the school is encouraging and its future hopeful. The sixty-sixth annual catalogue (1884-85) gives an attendance of one hundred and eighty-three for the year. It has three courses of study; viz., classical, academic and English, fitting students for college as well as for a business life. Since 1877 classes have regularly graduated. Previously, a few young ladies had secured diplomas. Its present board of trustees is as follows: Hon. William Haseltine, president; Hon. Aaron Whittemore, secretary; Solomon Whitehouse, Esq., treasurer; George P. Little, Esq., Henry T. Simpson, Esq., George O. Locke, Esq., executive committee; Martin H. Cochran, Esq., Trueworthy L. Fowler, Esq., William Thompson, Esq. The instructors are Isaac Walker, A.M., principal; Mary Ella Rowe, preceptress.

In connection with this sketch of the academy it would be well to say that from 1841 to 1863 there existed another school, known as the People's Literary Institute and Gymnasium. Isaac Kinsman, A.M., a former principal of Pembroke Academy, was its first principal. This was not intended to be a school preparatory to college, but one where the student might obtain a thorough education, preparing him for the general duties of life rather than for any particular profession. Mr. Kinsman died October 26, 1843, aged thirty-one years. He was succeeded by Messrs. Wright, Jewell, Anderson, Sippitt and others. It has quite a noted alumni. In 1863 it was united with Pembroke Academy, being represented on the present board of trustees. The history of the town for the past half-century is still fresh in the memory of living witnesses. For many years there has been an exodus of families from the old farms to more promising sections in the Middle and Western States.

In 1842 the Concord Railroad was opened, and soon boating on the river became a tradition of the past. A few years later the Concord and Portsmouth Railroad was built through the town.

At the breaking out of the Rebellion Pembroke responded to the call for patriotic volunteers, and many went to the war never to return. The village of Suncook received an impetus during the season of high prices, and in spite of severe losses by fire, it has become a village of much wealth and importance. Although situated at the extreme southern limit of the township, it already has a commanding influence. Here are located the mills of the Webster, Pembroke and China corporations.

As will be noted from the preceding annals, there was originally but one church in town and one meeting-house. In 1760 the Presbyterians were organized into a parish. In 1790 the two parishes were united under Rev. Zacheus Colby, and a few years later two meeting-houses were built, one on the site of the present Congregational Church, the other on the Third-range road, near the pound.

The last was taken down about 1840 and rebuilt on the street as the Gymnasium, now the town-house. A Methodist society was gathered about 1805. Some twenty years later the denomination built a meeting-house on the hill, on the Third-range road, which at present is fast going to ruin.

Of late years the tendency has been to desert the farms in the outlying districts, and to congregate in neighborhoods. Most of the people of the town, outside of the village of Suncook, live on three sides of a square or rectangle formed by Pembroke Street, Buck Street and the Eighth-range road, although there are many families on the Third-range road and on the Borough road.

In early times there was a considerable variety in the manufactured products of the town, including glassware, leather, musical instruments and woollen cloth. Now the three great mills are devoted to the manufacture of cotton cloth, while not a little capital is invested in saw-mills and grist-mills.

CHAPTER II.

PEMBROKE—(Continued).

CHURCH HISTORY.

IN the grant of the township of Suncook was the following provision: "And that the Petitioners and their associates, within the space aforesaid, settle a learned Orthodox Minister, and Build a Convenient House for the Public worship of God."

October 13th, of the same year, a call was extended to Rev. Aaron Whittemore to settle in the ministry.

Rev. Aaron Whittemore was ordained to the work of the ministry March 1, 1737-38, with appropriate ceremony. The church is believed to have been organized at that time with nine male members, beside the pastor,—Aaron Whittemore, pastor; Elias Whittemore, Noah Johnson, deacons; Abner Gordon, David Lovejoy, Benjamin Chandler, David Chandler, Stephen Holt, Richard Eastman, Dudley Broadstreet.

There were in the settlement at the time certain dissenters, most of whom were probably Presbyterians. They were Andrew McFarland, Timothy Knox, Patrick Garvin, James Moore, Nathan Mann, William Dinsmore, Robert White, James Neil, James White, Thomas McConnell, James Mann, William Laffin, Hugh Young, Thomas Cunningham, Samuel Gault.

Rev. Daniel Mitchell was ordained pastor over the Presbyterian Church December 3, 1760.

The Presbyterian meeting-house, which stood on the west side of Main Street, opposite C. L. Dow's house, was probably erected this year.

The Presbyterians were exempted from paying toward the support of the Congregational minister, and were incorporated a distinct parish by a special act of the General Assembly, passed December 16, 1763. It was enacted that all persons living in the parish of Pembroke, who belong to the Presbyterian congregation and assembly, or should join that society, should be included in the new parish, and Lieutenant Thomas McLucas was authorized to call the first meeting.

Rev. Mr. Whittmore was an able and learned divine, a graduate of Harvard College, and settled in the town as a young man. He lived but a few years after this controversy, dying in 1767.

Rev. Jacob Emery was ordained August 3, 1768.

Rev. Jacob Emery resigned his ministerial charge March 23, 1775, on account of failing health.

Rev. Daniel Mitchell died the following December, at the age of sixty-nine. From the Presbyterian church records we learn that Andrew Robertson received from the parish five shillings for his expenses on a journey "to Derry for the ministers to Mr. Mitchell's funeral;" Richard Bartlett, Esq., two pounds, ten shillings and eight pence for rum and gloves for the funeral; and Nathaniel Ambrose, seven shillings for the coffin. Rev. Mr. Milmore probably preached the funeral sermon, as Robert Moor received ten shillings and sixpence for entertaining him.

For the next four years, or until 1780, there was no regularly ordained minister, Congregational or Presbyterian, settled in Pembroke.

A parish-meeting of the Congregationalists, in which the Presbyterians were invited to participate, was called January 17, 1780. Mr. Aaron Whittmore was chosen moderator. It was voted to give Rev. Zacheus Colby a call to settle in the work of the ministry in Pembroke, to give one hundred pounds of lawful money, as valued in 1774, for a settlement, and to give a salary of seventy pounds and furnish twenty cords of wood yearly.

Caleb Foster, Richard Bartlett, Joseph Emery, John Ayers and David Kimball were chosen a committee to treat with Mr. Colby. The meeting was adjourned to February 8th, when Rev. Mr. Colby's acceptance of the call was read. He was ordained March 22, 1780.

Rev. Zacheus Colby gave up his ministerial office in Pembroke May 11, 1803.

The churches also agreed, in 1788, on occasional communion together, yet remained distinct bodies for nine years. After this, as it is added in the language of Mr. Colby, "on the first of June, 1797, the respective churches, after months of consideration, did vote themselves into one church." This was called the consociated church.

Two houses of worship were erected in 1804, the one on the hill, and the other on the street, where the present house now stands. In the location of these houses, as we have been informed, there was not a little difference of opinion and some strong feeling manifested.

After the departure of Rev. Mr. Colby the town was destitute of a settled ministry for nearly five years. It appears from the records that the Presbyterian society continued to raise money by a small tax upon one hundred and thirty or more tax-payers; that different men were employed to preach more or less of the year.

A call was extended to Mr. Abraham Burnham to settle in the ministry in the place, proposing to him a salary of five hundred dollars per annum, and two hundred dollars as a settlement. This proposal was accepted, and Mr. Burnham was ordained to the work of the ministry in this place March 2, 1808.

In 1812 there was a marked and striking manifestation of Divine power, when the Holy Spirit came down in gentle but copious showers of grace. Revivals also occurred in 1814, '16, '19, '26, '31, '32, '33 and '35, each revival exceeding, in interest and power, its predecessor, till the number of the church had increased from fifty to two hundred and forty.

Rev. Dr. Burnham continued his labors to November, 1850. He died September 21, 1852.

At the time Rev. Mr. Burnham was dismissed, Rev. John H. Merrill was installed pastor of the church, November 20, 1850. Mr. Merrill had been pastor of the church in Falmouth, Me. He came here, it is said, with high hopes of usefulness. His ministry, however, was short—less than three years; but long enough for him and his family to become endeared to many of the people. Observation, we think, shows that a long ministry is quite often followed by an unsettled state of the pastoral relation. Mr. Merrill was dismissed August 7, 1853.

Rev. Robert Crosssett succeeded Mr. Merrill. He commenced his labors in July, 1853, and was installed pastor of this church March 16, 1854. At this time a pleasing religious revival existed in the place. Mr. Crosssett continued his labors until October 8, 1855, when, on account of a failure of health, he sought a release from his engagements here, for a warmer climate and a more competent salary.

Rev. Lewis Goodrich, from Dedham, Me., came to this place May 24, 1856, and commenced his labors in the ministry. He was installed pastor of the church May 13, 1857. A revival of religion was in progress at the time of his installation, which continued more than a year. Many were interested, in both the academies and in the town. During the nine years of Mr. Goodrich's labors, as he states, over one hundred indulged the Christian's hope, and some fifty of them united with the Congregational Church. His pastorate ended in 1865.

Following Rev. Mr. Goodrich, Rev. Nathan F. Carter spent one year in the work of the ministry.

Rev. Benjamin Merrill commenced his labors here November 25, 1866,—an earnest, Christian man of much skill and efficiency in his work. He labored directly for the conversion and salvation of souls, and was happy in enlisting a portion of the church to do the same. A revival of religion was experienced, and a quickening influence was felt by the church during his ministry of three and a half years.

Rev. Lyman White, from Phillipston, Mass., and formerly pastor of the church in Epping, in this State, commenced his labors as acting pastor of this church in April, 1871, and continued until the fall of 1875.

Rev. C. C. Sampson was settled in the ministry in October, 1879, was ordained May 18, 1881, and was dismissed in March, 1885.

The society now worship in a commodious meeting-house on Pembroke Street.

Methodist Episcopal Church.—The first Methodist preaching in Pembroke was by Rev. James Cofran, a local preacher from Readfield, Me. Some years before, Mr. Cofran left Pembroke to seek his fortune in the East, and being a wild and thoughtless young man, celebrated his departure at a tavern with his gay friends by drinking and dancing till a late hour at night. Going into Maine, he happened to hear Jesse Lee preach, and became convicted of sin and was converted to God. In 1804 he sent word to Colonel Cofran, of Buck Street, his brother, that he was coming to Pembroke and would preach to the people if he would cause a notice to be given. Colonel Cofran remarked to his family that he would have the meeting at his own house, and then, if his brother should prove to be one of the howling Methodists that he had heard tell of, he could hawl as loud as he chose, and it would be nobody's business. The preacher came; the house was filled; he preached with power, and several were convicted and converted, among whom was Robert Martin. Mr. Cofran left, but Mr. Martin was so much interested that he attended the next Quarterly Meeting and requested George Pickering, presiding elder, to include Pembroke in a circuit. This was done, and David Batchelder was the first minister to preach regularly. Mr. Batchelder formed the first class, of which Robert Martin was leader. Their names were as follows:

Robert Martin, Benjamin Fowler, Abigail Martin, Melitable Fowler, John Kelley, Joshua Phelps,

Rachel Kelley, Hannah Phelps, Lydia Abbott, Nancy Sargent, Mrs. Head, Elizabeth Frye. These events occurred in 1804. In 1805 Pembroke was connected with the Northfield Circuit, and Caleb Dustin was the preacher. This year the first Quarterly Meeting was held in town, at the old Presbyterian meeting-house, at which John Broadhead presided. Great interest was awakened, and the church grew in numbers. In 1806, James Young was the preacher; in 1807 and 1808, Thomas Peck; in 1810, Abner Clark; in 1811, Hezekiah Field; in 1812, Jacob Sanborn; in 1813, Richard Emery; in 1814, Anson Summers; in 1815, James Jaques; in 1816, Noah Bigelow. Abner Clark formed a small class in Suncook in 1810, of which Nathaniel Nutting was the leader. This class did not long survive, and another was not formed until about 1840. The record from 1816 to 1825 is not easily accessible. At the latter date the Pembroke Society, numbering one hundred and forty-four members, was a part of a circuit, and the preachers were Moses Sanderson and William R. Stone; in 1826, James B. Norris and R. Newhall; in 1830, James G. Small and Ezekiel W. Smith; in 1832, when there were two hundred and twenty-one members, Orlando Hinds, R. H. Spaulding and Caleb Beesle; in 1833, R. H. Spaulding and Orlando Hinds.

The society was joined to the Concord Conference in 1836, and the preachers were William J. Kidder and D. Jones, the former continuing in 1837; in 1838, B. D. Brewster and J. C. Cronack; in 1839, S. Norris; in 1840, A. Folsom; in 1841, L. Howard; in 1842, A. H. Worthing; in 1843 and 1844, James Pike; in 1845 and 1846, Warren F. Evans; in 1847, A. H. Fullerton; in 1848 and 1849, A. Folsom; in 1850, when first mention is made of preaching in Suncook, James Thurston, who was returned in 1851; in 1852, Elijah Mason; in 1853 and 1854, William Hayes; in 1855 and 1856, O. H. Jasper; in 1857 and 1858, George S. Barnes; in 1859 and 1860, C. M. Dinsmore; in 1861 and 1862, Nelson Green; in 1863, L. Howard; in 1864 and 1865, C. H. Chase; in 1866 and 1867, N. Culyer; in 1868, J. W. Guernsey; in 1869, 1870 and 1871, A. C. Mason; in 1872 and 1873, J. Noyes; in 1874, C. W. Miller; in 1875 and 1876, Henry Dorr; in 1877, 1878 and 1879, S. C. Keeler; in 1880 and 1881, George W. Roland; in 1882, 1883 and 1884, Otis Cole; in 1885, James Cairns.

The first meeting-house built by the society, about 1828, still stands on the hill, but it has not been used for many years. The meeting-house in Suncook, built in 1849, was burned October 10, 1882, and was rebuilt the next year and the year following, and was dedicated July 6, 1884. It cost about fifteen thousand dollars, and is located very centrally in Suncook.

The Baptist Society.—It was organized April 21, 1869. At first its growth was fostered by Rev. Drs. David Gage, E. E. Cummings and Rev. J. M. Coburn,

In 1872, Rev. T. H. Goodwin was settled in the ministry. He was succeeded in 1877 by Rev. H. W. Tate; in 1880 by Rev. N. D. Curtiss; in 1885 by Rev. H. A. Stetson.

The meeting-house was built in 1871 at a cost of three thousand dollars, and is located in Suncreek village.

CHAPTER III.

PEMBROKE—(Continued).

MILITARY HISTORY.

THE military history of Pembroke has been especially honorable and creditable to the citizens of the town. The original grant was made to the brave men who served with Captain John Lovewell.

In Captain Daniel Ladd's company, scouting in the neighborhood of Pembroke, in the summer of 1746, are the familiar Pembroke names.—

William Knox, William Moore, John Moore, James Moore, William Moore, Jr., Joseph Mann, Samuel Moore, Joseph Eastman, Jacob Doyen.

The muster-roll of the company in His Majesty's service, under command of Moses Foster, captain, has been preserved, dated November 1, 1752,— Moses Foster, captain; Rev. Mr. Whittemore, Luther Morgan, lieutenants; Benjamin Crum, Edward Bean, William Fowler, Ezekiel Flinders, Samuel Lovejoy, Abner Goodwin, Henry Trussel, Abraham Rowel, Timothy Blake, Ephraim Philbrick, Daniel Blake, James French, Jonathan Heath, John Cooper, Jeremiah Allen, John Moore, Samuel Fifield, Theophilus Gibbs, Jonathan Swan, John Cabot, Edward Bean, Dery Kelly, Samuel Abbott, John Carr.

At this time, or a little later, there was a garrison on Buck Street, under command of Captain Thomas Lucas, the muster-roll of which has been preserved,— Thomas Lucas, captain; Joseph Gale, Thomas Lucas, Jr., sentinels; Jonathan Ingalls, Thomas Thompson, John Fuller.

In the expedition against Forts DuQuesne, Niagara and Crown Point, Noah Johnson was ensign in Robert Rogers' company of rangers. In Captain John Goffe's company, in the same expedition, appear the names of Samuel Moore, Nathaniel Martin, Samuel Martin, John Moore, Joshua Martin, Benjamin Eastman, Thomas McLaughlin. In other companies—Enoch Noyes, Stephen Hazeltine, Christopher Lovejoy, Seth Richardson, Jonathan Fowler, Francis Doyen, John Fowler. In Captain John Moore's company—James Moore, Robert Cochran, John Cunningham, James Otterson.

In an expedition against Crown Point, in 1758, the company under command of Nehemiah Lovewell, son of Captain John Lovewell, contained the following, probably all from Pembroke:

Francis Doyen, James Mann, John Tite, James Garvan, Stephen McConnell, Henry Hemphill, Timothy Knox, Jonathan Eastman.

The Pembroke company, at the battle of Bunker Hill, was in Colonel John Stark's regiment, and was under the command of Captain Daniel Moore, Lieutenant Ebenezer Frye and Second Lieutenant John Moore.

MUSTER ROLL.

William Towle, Moses McConnell, Thomas Baker, sergeants; Nathan Batchelder, Moses Merrill, Christopher Bartlett, Noah Dollar, Noah Emery, George Evans, William Fraser, Jonathan Fifield, Benjamin Folsom, Josiah Gordon, Timothy Gordon, Ezekiel Gilman, Thomas Hoyt, Jeremiah Homan, corporals; Zebadiah Lovejoy, drummer; James Moore, fifer; John Buswell, Josiah Batchelder, Samuel Lawrence, Nathaniel Martin, Isaac Moore, Caleb Morse, Theodore Marston, William Morrill, Nathaniel Moulton, Benjamin Norris, Moses Noyes, Moses Page, Husley Brown, Paul Blake, Joseph Broderick, Daniel Cass, Andrew Cunningham, Eliphalet Connor, Dudley Clifford, Samuel Cate, Moses Roberts, Robert Stinson, Lemuel Stekney, Job Sherburn, Jacob Sunkler, John Thung, Thomas Towle, William Towle, Jr., Jephth Tyler, Samuel Wells, Nathan Holt, William Harper, Jonathan Judkins, Samuel Kelley, Moses Kelsey, Oliver Lyndon, Samuel Piper, James Gumbo, Joseph Rawlins, John Rawlins, Jeremy Rollins, Richard Robinson, John Wallbridge, Andrew Wigan, Abraham Brown, William Bee, James Robinson, John Wilson, privates.

In December, General Sullivan appealed to the citizens of New Hampshire to recruit his forces on Winter Hill, and two companies were raised in Pembroke.

Of one company Andrew Buntun was captain; Samuel McConnell, first lieutenant; Peter Robinson second lieutenant.

Of the other company Samuel Connor was captain, Matthew Pettigill, first lieutenant; Nathaniel Head, second lieutenant.

In July and August, 1776, a New Hampshire regiment was raised for service in Canada and on the northern frontier, and placed under command of Colonel Joshua Wright.

Second Lieutenant Stephen Bartlett was from Pembroke, as were the following soldiers, all in Company Nine.

Samuel Kimball, Nathaniel Lakeman, David Frye, Benjamin Haggzett, William Knox, James Knox, John Knox, Nathaniel South, Eliphalet Connor, Samuel McConnell, Levi Carter, Asa Foster, Jr., James Head, Jonathan Elliot, John Lander, Eliphalet Norris, Phedris McCutchen, John Beton, John Gumbo, Joseph Cochran, Ephraim Garvin, Samuel K-B, Thomas Stekney, Jeremiah Abbot, Nathaniel Martin, Benjamin Norris, John Cook, John Cochran, James Martin, John Jenness.

Captain Benjamin Frye became disaffected with the management of public affairs, complained of the court publicly and asserted that he should not go into the service until he was paid his dues. As it appears from the town records that he had a wife, at least, dependent upon him, and, from the complaint of the zealous patriot who reported him, was without an estate and dependent upon his pay, at this distance of time his fault-finding seems not unreasonable, but justifiable. During his absence his wife was admitted to the privileges enjoyed by the families of non-commissioned officers and privates by a special vote of the town. It evidently required wealth for a man to hold a commission during the Revolution, for the money received for pay from the Continental authorities had very little purchasing power compared to its face value.

"A MUSTER-ROLL OF CAPT. SAMUEL MCCONNELL'S COMP' IN COL STEKNEY'S REGIMENT BELONGING TO REGIMENT-GENERAL STARK'S BRIGADE OF THE STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE, PEMBROKE, JULY 18, 1777. Raised for the Defence of AMERICAN Liberty, against the UNCONSTITUTIONAL Acts of BRITAIN."

Samuel McConnell, captain; Robert Gilmore, first lieutenant; John Orr, second lieutenant; Thomas Holt, ensign; Jephtha Tyler, first sergeant; Robert Burns, second sergeant; Ebenezer Foyren, third sergeant; James Gay, fourth sergeant; James Knox, first corporal; Robert Spear, second corporal; Samuel Huston, third corporal; Enoch Sergeant, fourth corporal; Matthew Gault, drummer; Patrick Beach, fife; Enoch Eaton, Elphadlet Richards, Benjamin Stevens, Jr., Samuel Ames, Amos Richards, David McClure, Jr., Nicholas Feltz, Jonathan Cilley, Isaac Sargent, Joseph Colby, Daniel Hadley, Stephen Mors, Charles McCoy, Jeremiah Abbot, Ephraim Garvey, John Moor, John Robinson, Samuel Piper, James Alexander, Fry Holt, Solomon Ames, George Evans, John Wallace, John Bell, William McLaughlin, James Walker, Isaac Huston, Robert Matthews, Adam Smith, Samuel Rennie, Samuel Carr, Samuel Holt, Benjamin Stevens (5th), Nathan Haws, Samuel Dunlap, Mahudu Davis, John Astor, David McClure, John Kowell, Reuben Wells, Samuel Eaton, Caleb Page, Jr., Thomas Mills, Jr., William Holmes, Jr., John Church, David Morrison, William Wheeler, Jr., Archibald McCurdy, David Farmer, Theophilus Griffin, Zachariah Holden, Enoch Harcey, John Nutt, Jacob McQuaid, John Morrison, John Aiken, John Barret, Hugh Biddle, John Gilmore, Reuben Trapsell, John Huntington, Joshua Willet, Benjamin Betle, Ebenezer Thacker, Daniel Collins, James Wallace, Samuel Whitehouse, Zebulon Davis, Joseph Norris, William Moor, Samuel McDuffee, Daniel Story, Samuel Kelly, Otadiah Hadley, Hezekiah Colby, William Emerson, John Abbot, Gershom Durzin, James Barker, privates.

This company was with General Stark at the battle of Bennington, and did good service. Major James Head was mortally wounded in the battle, and was buried in the village of Bennington.

In 1777, Ebenezer Frye was captain and John Moore was first lieutenant of a company in the First New Hampshire Regiment in the Continental army.

The training-band "was constituted of all the able-bodied male persons in the State, from sixteen years old to fifty, excepting certain persons in position and employment specified, and negroes, Indians and mulattoes." The alarm-list "included all male persons from sixteen to sixty-five not included in the training-band," not specially exempted, and was organized in a separate corps.

The militia of each county was organized in regiments and companies, the field officers being chosen by the Council and House of Representatives. The companies consisted of about sixty-eight privates, who elected their company officers.

Pembroke during these dark days, like all other towns in the American colonies, was an armed camp, every citizen under military orders.

In 1781, Major McConnell, Lieutenant Samuel Daniell and Lieutenant Samuel Noyes were chosen a committee to divide the parish, and to give to each company their quota of men required from the town for the army. Major McConnell was also empowered to purchase the quantity of beef required of the parish by the State authorities. In March the committee reported that Captain J. Cochran's company should furnish six men, and Captain N. Head's company five men, to fill the quota of the town. Every able-bodied man, liable to serve, was enrolled a militia or minute-man. While the actual fighting had been progressing no draft had been required to fill Pembroke's quota. Volunteers were willing and ready. Now that the powerful aid of France had been successfully sought and obtained, and the British were acting on the defensive, and peace seemed probable, the enthusiasm had in a measure subsided. Yet Pembroke again willingly did her duty, and the men were furnished.

The extreme poverty of the people was very distressing after the war, and the Legislature was impetored to issue a fiat money to an unlimited extent to relieve the wants of the most needy, and finally did emit fifty thousand dollars; but this did not suit the most clamorous, and it was determined to coerce the authorities. Runners were accordingly sent into the most disaffected towns, calling upon the people to arm, go to Exeter and demand an emission of paper money, and other enactments to suit their views. September 20th, about two hundred young and thoughtless insurgents entered the town of Exeter, some on foot, some mounted, armed with every variety of weapon, from a musket to a staff. Of the military men in this insurrection are handed down the names of Major James Cochran, Captain James Cochran, and Lieutenant Asa Robinson, of Pembroke, and probably a large part of their following were from the young men of the town. The dispersion of the mob is a matter of history,—how General Cilley arrested with his own hands Major Cochran; how the rash men were dragged from their homes and brought to trial at Exeter, plead guilty and were discharged with a reprimand. Major Cochran was cashiered, but was restored on account of former good conduct,—more fortunate than Captain Cochran and Lieutenant Robinson, whose sentences were not revoked, and they lost their military rank.

Under the military organization of the State in 1812, Asa Robinson was brigadier-general of the Third Brigade; Samuel Cofan, lieutenant-colonel Eleventh Regiment; David Norris, major First Battalion; Asa Foster, major Second Battalion.

In a company sent for the defence of Portsmouth, in July, were Moody Dustin, Edla Foster and William Abbot, of Pembroke.

The following Pembroke men were called into active service in the summer and fall of 1814, under the command of Captain William Marshall: Samuel Ames, Samuel Evans, Joseph Emery, Edmund Holt and Richard Morse.

September 26th the company under command of Captain Edward Fuller was called out for sixty days; the following were all or in part from Pembroke:

The company was stationed at Portsmouth on garrison duty.

Lieutenant Head seems to have been on detached service, for the pay-roll of his company, all Pembroke men, has been preserved.

Asa Beal, second lieutenant; Samuel Whitehouse, ensign; William Ham, John Palmer, Jr., William Knox, sergeants; Aaron Martin, corporal; Peter Tucker, Andrew Gault, musicians; Prescott Kimball, Seth Baker, Levi Baker, John Conner, Stephen de la Cour, Jeremiah Edmunds, George French, Samuel Kelley, Joseph Knox, Nathaniel Lakeman, Robert Moore, Jr., John Morrison, Isaac Knox, John Nickson, Charles Bowe, Samuel Robinson, Isaac C. Swan, Joseph Seavey, John Phillips, Edmund Whiteher, John Sargent, Jr., privates; Tim Lyndstone, waiter.

Of course, many never returned from the war. There is in Suncook a branch of the Grand Army of the Republic, and a flourishing Masonic lodge.

COL. DAVID LYMAN JEWELL.¹

The chief industry of the flourishing village of Suncook is the manufacture of cotton cloth. The China, the Webster and the Pembroke Mills are three great establishments under one management, built on the banks of the Suncook River and operated principally by its power, where print cloths are made. About these mills, which give steady employment to over fifteen hundred operatives, has grown up a substantial village, with fine public buildings, spacious stores, elegant private residences and long blocks of neat tenement-houses, inhabited by a liberal and public-spirited class of citizens, and governed by a wise and judicious policy which renders this community comfortable, attractive and law-abiding. The man to whose clear head and skillful hand is entrusted the management of this great corporation, of such vital importance to the village of Suncook, is a genial gentleman of forty-five, Colonel David L. Jewell, a brief outline of whose life it is my purpose to sketch.

David Lyman Jewell, son of Bradbury and Lucinda (Chapman) Jewell, was born in Tamworth, N. H., January 26, 1837. In the midst of the grandest scenery of New England, under the shadows of the Ossipee Mountains, and in view of bold Chocorua, our friend was ushered to this earthly pilgrimage.

Colonel Jewell is a descendant of Mark Jewell, who was born in the north of Devonshire, England, in the year 1724, and died in Sandwich, N. H., the 19th of February, 1787. He descended from the same original stock as Bishop John Jewell, of Devonshire. Mark Jewell came to this country in 1743, married and located in Durham, N. H., and was the father of three sons, Mark, Jr., Bradbury and John. Mark, Jr., was the first white man who settled in Tamworth, in 1772, on what is now called "Stevenson's Hill," removing soon after to "Birch Interval," as known at the present time. He married Ruth Vittum, of Sandwich, in 1776; they were the parents of sixteen children. He was prominent in all town affairs, and sometimes preached, and was familiarly called among his fellow-townsmen "Elder" or "Priest" Jewell.

Bradbury, son of Elder Jewell, married Mary Chapman, in 1806, by whom he had two sons,—Bradbury and David. Bradbury Jewell, a pupil of Samuel Hildien, was a teacher of considerable note, and his memory is tenderly cherished to-day by many of his pupils throughout the State. While engaged in teaching he pursued a course of medical studies and in 1839, having completed them, collected his worldly goods and removed to Newmarket, a place presenting a larger field for practice. There he commenced in earnest his chosen profession; but being of a delicate constitution, the exposure incident to a physician's life soon told upon his limited strength; he sickened and died "ere the sun of his life had reached its meridian," leaving his widow, with two little children, in indigent circumstances, to combat with a cold and selfish world. A wealthy merchant of the place, having no children, wished to adopt young David, offering to give him a college education and leave him heir to his worldly possessions; but with a mother's love for her offspring, Mrs. Jewell refused the offer, and resolved to rear and educate her children as well as her limited means would allow. Being a woman of undaunted spirit, she opened a boarding-house for factory operatives, when factory girls were the intelligent daughters of New England farmers, who regarded this new industry as a most favorable opportunity for an honorable employment.

Having brothers in Massachusetts, and thinking to better sustain herself and children, Mrs. Jewell removed to Newton Upper Falls, Mass., following there the same occupation. In that village young Jewell first attended school, the teacher of which was a former pupil of his father. To render his mother more substantial assistance than he could afford her by doing irksome chores, he went to work in the factory when but nine years of age, receiving for a day's work—from quarter of five in the morning until half-past seven in the evening—the very munificent sum of sixteen cents a day, or one dollar a week. He worked nine months and attended school three, every year, until he was nearly thirteen years of age, when the close confinement was found detrimental to his health, and he was taken from the mill and placed on a farm. The next three years he passed in healthful happy, out-door work. Returning home from the farm, strong, robust and vigorous, he re-entered the mill, where he was variously occupied, becoming familiar with the operations of the numerous machines in each department, but more particularly those pertaining to the carding-room, where his step-father, Thomas Truesdell (his mother having married again), was an overseer, learning as he pursued his work, gradually and insensibly, things that to-day are of incalculable benefit for the business in which he is now engaged. He little thought, however, when moving his stool from place to place, in order to facilitate his labor, he would some day be at the head of similar works, many times greater in magnitude than those in which he was then engaged.

His inherited mechanical taste was developed by his life among machinery, and when he was seventeen years of age he gladly entered a machine-shop. Here his ready perception of form rendered his work attractive and his improvement rapid. Before completing his apprenticeship he felt keenly the want of a better education, and determined to obtain it. His exchequer was very low, but having the confidence of friends, he readily obtained a loan, and in the spring of 1855 entered the Wesleyan Academy, at Wilbraham, Mass. The principal, after a casual examination, said, "Well, you don't know much, do you?" Being quick at repartee, young Jewell replied: "No, sir. If I did, I would not be here." This brief sip at the fountain of knowledge only increased his thirst for more, and in September of the same year he entered the State Normal School, Bridgewater, Mass., under the régime of Marshall Conant, a life-long friend and counselor.

Mr. Jewell from the first was a favorite among his class-mates, courteous, genial, pleasant in disposition, somewhat careless withal, but physically vigorous and always the first at athletic sports when relieved from study. Mathematics, of which he was very fond, and natural philosophy, were his favorite branches of study, and free-hand drawing his delight, as slates, book-covers and albums attested. While in school he made rapid progress and graduated in the spring of 1857, having acquired, as his diploma reads, "a very creditable degree of knowledge of the several branches taught therein. Besides these attainments, Mr. Jewell possesses tact and skill for rapid sketching and delineation, which give life to his black-board illustrations."

To show the forethought possessed by him in a marked degree, before graduating he had secured a school to teach in New Jersey, and the day after the closing exercises were over he started for his new field of labor. He taught with great success in New Jersey and also in New York, some three years. One school, of which he was principal, numbered three hundred scholars, and employed five assistant teachers, all of whom were his seniors in years. Like his father, he gained an enviable reputation as a teacher, and his credentials speak of him in the highest terms as a competent, faithful and pleasing instructor and most excellent disciplinarian. One superintendent of schools remarks: "He was the best teacher who had been employed in the town for thirty years." While engaged in teaching Mr. Jewell pursued a course of study in engineering and surveying, and finally determined to follow engineering as a profession. He gave up school-teaching, left the "foreign shores of Jersey," and entered the office of R. Morris Copeland and C. W. Folsom, of Boston. His first work was the resurvey of Cambridgeport. He afterwards worked in Dorchester and on Narragansett Bay. He had just commenced this new occupation when "the shot heard round the world" was fired on Sumter, and the tocsin of war sounded the alarm.

Surveying, like all other business, came to a standstill; the compass was changed for a musket; distances were measured by the steady tramp of the soldiery, and the weary flagman became the lonely sentinel. About this time the owners of the Pembroke Mill and property connected therewith in Pembroke and Allenstown, N. H., decided to increase their business by building a new mill twice the capacity of the one then owned by them. Knowing Mr. Jewell to be a good draughtsman, having employed him during the construction of the Pembroke Mill, they again engaged him. Consulting with their then resident agent, he prepared the required working plans and drawings for the Webster Mill. The work of the building was soon under way and rapidly pushed to completion. While thus engaged the agent at Newton died, and the immediate care of the mills was given to Mr. Jewell, until (as the treasurer said) he could find a competent man for the position. Finishing his work at Suncook, and having conducted the affairs of the company at Newton in a very satisfactory manner, the treasurer tendered him the agency of the mills. In accepting the position, his career as agent began, where, fifteen years before, he commenced the work that fitted him so thoroughly for the successful management of the same. The mills were in a bad condition, the machinery old and run down, and the owners impatient and anxious. Nothing daunted, however, Mr. Jewell entered heartily into the business, making such changes that at the time he tendered his resignation he had doubled the production and greatly improved the quality of the goods manufactured. Looms built more than fifty years before, and improved by Mr. Jewell, are still running and producing nearly as many yards per day, and of as good quality, as those made at the present time. These mills were run throughout the war, paying for cotton as high as one dollar a pound, and selling the cloth for thirty-five cents a yard. Mr. Jewell was very anxious to enlist during the exciting times of war, but was prevailed upon by the owners to continue in charge of their works, and by the entreaties of his wife, who was hopelessly ill, to remain at her side.

The treasurer and part owner of the mills at Newton Upper Falls was also treasurer and large owner of the mills at Suncook. The Suncook Company, seeing a brighter future before them, agitated the project of enlarging their plant, and, in 1867, active operations were commenced upon the China Mill, which was, when completed, the largest works of the kind contained under one roof in the State. Mr. Jewell again fulfilled the office of engineer and draughtsman. The company's agent at Suncook, wishing to devote his time exclusively to the construction of the new mill, desired that Mr. Jewell should come from Newton several days each week to look after the manufacturing in the two mills then running. Thus for more than two years he acted as agent at Newton and as superintendent of the Webster and Pembroke Mills. In 1870, before the China Mill had fairly commenced operations, the agent resigned his position. Mr. Jewell, having at Newton proved diligent, faithful and capable, was appointed in his stead. Resigning his position at Newton, he moved with his family to Suncook, and assumed the management of the triumvirate corporation June 1, 1870. He was obliged to go through nearly the same routine here as at Newton. The machinery, however, was more modern, but had been neglected, and the power was inadequate to the demand. With indomitable perseverance he has remedied these defects,—by providing reservoirs, and more thoroughly utilizing the water-power, adding new and valuable improvements, putting in powerful steam-engines, so that now the mills are able to run during the most severe droughts, and the amount produced has been increased from twelve millions of yards in 1871 to twenty-nine millions of yards in 1885, with substantially the same machinery, showing what tireless perseverance and devotion to duty can accomplish, when impelled by men actively schooled from boyhood in practical manufacturing.

Mr. Jewell is a member of the New England Cotton Manufacturers' Association, and of the New Hampshire Club. Mr. Jewell was honored by being appointed aide-de-camp, with the rank of colonel, on Governor Head's staff, and speaks, with a merry twinkle in his eye, of turning out officially more times than any other member. He is a member of the Governor Head Staff Association; an active member of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, of Boston; a member of the Amoskeag Veterans, of Manchester, of which he was elected, in 1885, commander, but declined on account of the press of duty; a member of the New Hampshire Veteran Officers' Association; and an honorary member of the Old Twelfth New Hampshire Regiment. He was elected captain of the Jewell Rifles, a military company named for him, but graciously declined, and was made an honorary member. The Masonic fraternity also claims him, being an active member of "Jewell" Lodge, Suncook, named in his honor, and of the Trinity Royal Arch Chapter, Horace Chase Council, R. and S. M., and Mount Horeb Commandery, Concord. He is a member of the Supreme Council, having taken all the Scottish Rites up to the thirty-third degree, and is an active member of the Massachusetts Consistory, S. P. R. S., 32, Boston, and a member of Connecticut River Valley Masonic Association.

Colonel Jewell is a public-spirited citizen. To him Suncook is largely indebted for its material advancement since his residence in that community. Three times has his presence of mind and mechanical skill been the means of saving the village from entire destruction by fire. To him is the place indebted for its very effective water-works, to guard against fires in the future. In private life Colonel Jewell is genial, affable and approachable. His home is embellished by his artistic tastes, and his private library is rich in works of standard merit and art. In happy combination with the great executive ability of the subject of our sketch is a fine literary taste and a decided artistic talent, the former shown by his architecture in exterior decoration and by his household embellishments.

Colonel Jewell affiliates with the Congregationalists, but the Sabbath with him is a day of rest. His first wife was Mary A. Grover, daughter of Ephraim Grover, of Newton, Mass., to whom he was married in August, 1860. She died October 16, 1862. He was again married, May 31, 1865, to Ella Louise Sumner, daughter of Lewis Sumner, of Needham, Mass., and a near relative of the late Senator Charles Sumner. Mr. Jewell has kept out of politics, but is a good Republican, and should he be the standard-bearer of the party in any future contest, he would probably lead its forces to victory.

EDMUND ERSKINE TRUESDELL.¹

The subject of the following sketch, as the name indicates, is of Scotch descent. Scottish surnames originated in divers ways, and their significance is as varied,—some being derived from locations, others from trades, offices, professions, peculiarities of armorial bearings and from many other sources. The name "Truesdell" is said to have originated as follows: During the troubles and vicissitudes of the early days of Scotland some of her people were more loyal than others to the government. In a particular hamlet or "daile" they were unusually faithful to the laws, so much so that they gained the envious appellation of the "true daile" people. Usage has changed and time softened the pronunciation to Truesdell instead of "true daile."

Edmund Erskine Truesdell, son of Thomas and Mary (Boydon) Truesdell, was born in Jewett City, Conn., March 3, 1845. He is a descendant of Ichabod Truesdell, who came from Scotland about 1700 and settled in South Woodstock, Conn. He had four sons,—Asa, Darius, Thomas and John. Asa was taken prisoner while on a merchantman by the French during the reign of Napoleon the First. Darius, great-grandfather of Edmund E. Truesdell, participated in the War of the Revolution, and was at Valley Forge during the terrible winter of 1777. He was wounded in the side, narrowly escaping death by the ball providentially striking a large, old-fashioned pocket-book, which he carried in his vest-pocket, containing valuable papers. He died a few years after the war from the effects of the wound. Soon after Edmund's birth his mother died at Newton Upper Falls, Mass., where his father had removed and was connected with cotton manufacturing. Edmund attended the common schools from the age of five years until he was fifteen, after which, for a time, he worked in the cotton-mill, becoming familiar with the various operations of the many machines required in the manufacture of cotton cloth from the raw material. While attending school, to help eke out his scanty supply of ready money, he delivered daily papers, when delivering papers to subscribers was in its infancy. This proved very successful. Disposing of the same, he entered Comer's Commercial College, in Boston, to better prepare himself for the various duties of life. After taking a regular course there and graduating, he re-entered the cotton-mill as second overseer in the carding department, where he remained two years. The owners, seeing in him the qualities required for a successful man, promoted him from second overseer of carding to overseer of the cloth-room, at the same time adding the duties of shipping clerk and assistant superintendent.

When the Webster Mill, at Suncook, N. H., was started, the owner of the Newton Mills, Newton Upper Falls, Mass., being treasurer of the Suncook

Mills, knowing Mr. Truesdell's capabilities, induced him to accept a like position—on a much larger scale—at the Webster and Pembroke Mills, in Suncook, N. H. Accepting the position, he entered upon the duties October 20, 1866. The changes he made to cheapen and facilitate the work proved his previous good training and that the treasurer was not mistaken in the selection. His record shows that his judgment was well founded. When the China Mill was started, in 1869, Mr. Truesdell's duties were greatly increased; but with a method reduced to its minimum he was enabled, without much extra exertion, to carry the work incident to the three corporations—producing twenty-nine million yards of cloth per year—with as little effort, apparently, as he did the two.

In 1870 the former agent of the China, Webster and Pembroke Mills resigned his position, and the then acting superintendent was appointed to fill the vacancy. Mr. Truesdell being the most available man for a superintendent, he was again promoted from the cloth-room to superintendent and paymaster of the above named corporation—a position he has ably and successfully filled to the present time.

Mr. Truesdell is an earnest and active Republican, and has, for many years, been accorded the leadership of his party in the town. He was chosen town treasurer of Pembroke in 1878, 1879, 1880 and 1881. He was elected a member of the Legislature from Pembroke in 1879 and again in 1880, serving both terms with credit as member of the committee on manufacturing. The following, in the "Notes from the Capital," published during the session in the Manchester Daily Mirror, speaks thus of him: "From a poor boy, earning a living by selling papers at a profit of half a cent each, to the superintendent of three corporations, employing two thousand operatives, is a long journey, and the man who, at thirty-two years of age, has made it does not need a certificate to his ability; but it is a pleasure to say that one of the best members of this house is the genial, broad-shouldered, big-hearted member from Pembroke. He is a Republican every day and a very lively one election days. He does his own thinking, has the courage of his convictions and fights like a Trojan for any cause or man he believes in."

Mr. Truesdell is the senior member of the firm of Truesdell & Blodgett, one of the finest-stocked and best-conducted clothing-stores in the town. Mr. Truesdell belongs to the Masonic fraternity, being an active member of "Jewell" Lodge, which he was instrumental in forming, and of which he is Past Master. Of his work in this respect the Suncook Journal had the following: "Especial credit is due to the chairman, E. E. Truesdell, who, without delay, secured the dispensation, conducted nearly all the correspondence and was largely the head and front of the whole work from its inception to its consummation." He is a member of the Trinity Royal Arch Chapter, Horace Chase Council, R. and

S. M., and Mount Horeb Commandery, at Concord, N. H. He is a member of the Supreme Council, having taken all the Scottish Rites up to the 35d degree, and is an active member of the Massachusetts Consistory, S. P. R. S., 32d, Boston. He is a member of the New England Cotton Manufacturers' Association and a member of the New Hampshire Club.

Mr. Truesdell is six feet one inch in height, weighs two hundred and seventy-eight pounds, and of good proportion and fine physique. His habits are simple, though a good dinner is not objectionable to him at any time. He hates spirituous liquors and tobacco in all their forms, as those who smoke in his presence know. His home is a neat, pretty place, filled with all that makes a home pleasant and attractive; it is finely situated on Broadway, in the village of Suncook, and was the first house built and occupied on this street.

He married Mary Wilkins Austin, daughter of David Austin, June 11, 1872, who is connected with one of the oldest families of the town. By this union they have one child—a son. Mr. Truesdell is not a member of any church, but attends the Baptist with his family, where he is a liberal giver. He takes a warm interest in all that pertains to the moral welfare of the village in which he resides.

GEORGE PEABODY LITTLE.

George Peabody Little was the son of Elbridge Gerry and Sophronia Phelps Peabody Little. His father was born in Bradford, Mass., and his mother in Danvers, Mass. His mother was a sister of the late George Peabody, the distinguished London banker and philanthropist, from whom the son received his name and to whom he is indebted for his property. Mr. Little was born in Pembroke, Genesee County, N. Y., June 29, 1834. His early life was passed in that town and in Lewiston, N. Y., where he attended Lewiston Academy. He came with his mother to Pembroke, N. H., at about the age of thirteen. He attended Pembroke Academy and the People's Gymnasium and Literary Institute. He taught one term of district school at the age of eighteen. When nineteen years old he went to Portland, Me., as clerk in a store. It was here that he cast his first vote, the same being for Neal Dow as mayor. The next ten years he spent in Palmyra, N. Y. He held the office of United States deputy collector, and assisted in the formation of the first Republican Club in Western New York. In 1868 he returned to Pembroke, N. H., buying the farm and buildings formerly belonging to the late Hon. Boswell Stevens, where he had lived when a boy. The same year (1868) he erected his present substantial and elegant residence, and from time to time has enlarged the farm until now it comprises about one thousand acres, lying in Pembroke and adjoining towns. In 1871 he was elected a member of the board of trustees of Pembroke Academy, and from about the first has been chairman of the executive committee, and the school has always found in him a firm friend and supporter. He has twice been elected representative to the Legislature. At present he is one of the selectmen and also county treasurer, this being his second term of office. He is a Mason, being a member of the Mount Horeb Commandery of Concord, N. H., and the De Witt Clinton Consistory of Nashua, N. H., to the thirty-second degree; also a member of the Odd-Fellows' Encampment. Although belonging to these secret societies, he is loyal to the church (Congregational) of which he is a member, always showing himself ready to bear his part in every good work. For many years he has been superintendent of the Sabbath-school. In 1854 he married Miss Elizabeth A. Knox, daughter of Daniel M. Knox, of Pembroke, N. H. Their children are George William, who died at the age of three and a half years, Clarence Belden, Mary Georgianna, Lizzie Ellen, Nettie Knox, Lucy Bowman and Clara Frances.

Clarence is a resident of Bismarck, Dakota. He is judge of Probate for Burleigh County, a member of the Governor's staff and a director in the National Bank. Lizzie married Lester Thurber, of Nashua, N. H., and Nettie is a student at Smith College, Northampton, Mass. The others remain at home with their parents.

GEORGE H. LARABEE, M.D.¹

The ancestors of Dr. Larabee were French and English. On the mother's side, four brothers, by the name of Sawyer, came from England, and settled in different parts of the United States. The Larabees originated from the Huguenots. One of the descendants, Horace Larabee, was a farmer and settled in the northern part of Vermont, and married Wealthy Howard. One of their sons was Stephen C. who was born December 10, 1813. He was a carriage-trimmer and harness-maker, and married Cynthia Sawyer, of Orford, N. H., and settled in Bradford, Vt. From this union were two boys, George H. and Edward E., whose parents died while they were very young—the mother June 12, 1844, and the father May 8, 1845. The younger of these children was, when an infant, adopted by the Emerson family, who gave him their name. He was educated at Tilton, N. H., and is now a lawyer in Marshall, Ill.

George H., the subject of this sketch, was born in Bradford, Vt., September 15, 1840, and on the death of his parents was adopted and reared by Elisa E. Sawyer, a sister of his mother, who took entire care of him in his childhood, and when he was four years old went to Edgartown, Mass., where, by teaching school, she earned support for herself and her little charge. For twelve years she thus taught, and it was under her tuition, and the High School of Edgartown and Dukes County Academy, that young Larabee was fitted for a teacher. At the age of thirteen he became a member of the Baptist Church at Edgartown, and was afterwards superintendent of the Sabbath-school and clerk of the church for several years. At the early age of seventeen he commenced teaching in the public schools of the same town, for the support of himself and his foster-mother, who at this time became an invalid, and remained so until her death, in 1880. The occupation of teaching, Dr. Larabee successfully followed for six years. It was while teaching school in the town of his adoption that he chose for a calling the medical profession, and during these years of teaching availed himself of every opportunity to study his chosen profession. He studied medicine with Drs. I. H. Lucas and Edwin Maybury, of Edgartown. The first course of medical lectures he attended at Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Me. The following year he attended Harvard Medical College, from which he graduated in March, 1864, and at a time when the government was calling upon her sons to defend her integrity and maintain her rights. The same week in which he graduated Dr. Larabee volunteered, and, upon examination, receiving a commission as assistant surgeon, was assigned to the First Massachusetts Heavy Artillery, and immediately joined his regiment, and was in active service until near the close of the war, when he was honorably discharged for disability. He was with his regiment in their engagements at Spottsylvania, North Anna, Cold Harbor, Deep Bottom and Petersburg, and was on detail duty at City Point General Hospital. In the fall of 1865, Dr. Larabee located in the manufacturing village of Suncook, N. H., for the practice of his profession, and being a thoroughly competent physician and surgeon, devoted to his profession, he soon had an extensive and lucrative practice.

Dr. Larabee became a member of the New Hampshire Medical Society in 1867, and has been a member of the Centre District Medical Society since its reorganization in 1872; in both of which he has been honored with appointments on committees and as delegate to various medical organizations, which he has always filled with signal ability and with honor to himself and the Association. He is a self-made man; in social life a genial gentleman, a friend of the poor and always ready and liberal in the support of every good work. He is a prominent member of the Masonic fraternity, an Odd-Fellow, a Knight of Pythias, and a member of Louis Bell Post, No. 3, Grand Army of the Republic, of Manchester.

TRUEWORTHY LADD FOWLER.

In the memoirs of the Fowler family the name is found to go back into the eleventh century, and was prominent in the political and literary history of England. The subject of this sketch is a direct descendant therefrom, through Philip Fowler, one of the founders of New England, who came over in the ship "Mary and John," in May, 1634. The line of ancestors is Philip, Joseph, Philip, Philip and Symonds to Benjamin.

Benjamin, the father of Truworthy Ladd, was born in Newmarket, N. H., June 10, 1769; removed to Epsom, N. H., with his father in 1778, and, January 15, 1795, married Mehitable Ladd, born in Pembroke March 9, 1776, daughter of John and Jerusha (Lovejoy) Ladd. After his marriage he settled in Pembroke on the farm now occupied by the subject of this sketch, and died there July 24, 1832. His wife died in Pembroke September 9, 1853. This marriage was a singular coincidence. Each was the sixth generation in America of their respective families, and Philip, the ancestor of Benjamin Fowler, and Daniel, the ancestor of Mehitable Ladd (the line being Daniel, Nathaniel, John, Tru-worthy and John), both came to this country in the "Mary and John," at the same time, from the same town. The descendants of these two neighbors, after pursuing different courses under the vicissitudes of a century and a half, were united in Benjamin and Mehitable. From this fusion of two hardy stocks sprang the subject of our sketch. He was the youngest of eleven children, eight of whom lived to mature age, and was born in Pembroke December 21, 1816, and, August 29, 1847, married Catharine L., daughter of Thomas and Abigail (Hutchins) Sargent, by whom he has four children living.—Henry Thomas, born November 30, 1849; Adin Gilbert and Charles Martin (twins), born June 19, 1855; and Lillie Blanche, born February 29, 1860. His education was obtained at the district school, supplemented by attending, for a few terms, Pembroke Academy and the Gymnasium, a rival school, under the instruction of Professor Isaac Kinsman. While at these schools he supported himself by his own labor, being, at the age of fifteen, thrown upon his own resources, with no provision for his education, by his father's death.

He commenced to teach a district school at eighteen, and continued to teach during some portions of each year for eighteen years. During this time he managed the family homestead, which had come into his possession partly by the will of his father and part by purchase. He now resides on the old homestead, which, by improvements and additions, has been made to rank among the largest and most productive farms in town.

Although always ready to devote his time to the interests of his fellow-townsmen, he has never been an office-seeker, and the honors bestowed upon him by the public must yield sweeter pleasure to his mind when he contemplates that they were won not by solicitation, but came as a recognition of his usefulness. Always enjoying the confidence and esteem of his townsmen, he was called upon to serve them in nearly all the offices in the gift of the town. For years his was the familiar face and voice that presided over their town-meetings for town, State and national elections.

Besides holding the offices of collector, auditor and treasurer, he served as selectman eleven years, eight of which as chairman, and superintending school committee twelve years. He was elected to the Legislature in 1858 and 1859, and in 1876 was chosen a delegate to the Constitutional Convention of that year. In 1878 he was elected county commissioner, and served as chairman during the term of two years, from June 1, 1879, to July 1, 1881. In 1870 he was appointed United States deputy marshal, and took the census of Allenstown, Bow, Hooksett and Pembroke.

For many years he has been a trustee of Pembroke Academy, the survivor of the two schools at which his education was completed.

For many years he has done a large probate business in the capacity of administrator and guardian, his judgment and experience recommending him to all who knew him.

Brought up a Democrat, yet convictions of right and duty have always controlled his political acts and affiliations. He voted the last time with that party in 1844. His repugnance to the institution of slavery and its extension brought him to the support of John P. Hale in 1845 for representative to Congress; and he has had the satisfaction of living to see Hale United States Senator, and the weakening and discordant element of slavery wiped out of our government. From the Free-Soil party he followed the lead of Seward and Lincoln, and has since been a supporter of Republican measures and principles.

Of liberal religious sentiments and opinions, though pledged to no creed and identified with no denomination, Mr. Fowler has always revered the Scriptures as the inspired word of God, and has endeavored to guide his conduct by their precepts.

Mr. Fowler is known throughout the county as a man of good executive ability, upright integrity, sound judgment, rare good sense and of large practical experience in business affairs; and these he has always been ready to devote to the service of the public and of his townsmen when required.

Now (1885) he has retired from public affairs, with the exception of acting as one of a committee of three to procure the writing and publishing of the history of his native town, and can be found at his home in North Pembroke, which his thrift and economy has established and maintained, where his counsel is much sought by his townsmen and friends, and where, together with his amiable and estimable wife, he dispenses a liberal hospitality to all who have occasion to visit his home.

WINTHROP FOWLER.

The family name of Fowler received prominent mention in the annals of the literature and government of England as far back as 1191. Richard Fowler, of Foxley, fought under Richard Coeur de Lion in the war of the Crusades, and was knighted by him on the field of battle for having repulsed a night attack by the Infidels on the Christian camp, with a body of bowmen made up entirely of his own tenants. From him descended Sir William in the fourth generation, and his son, Sir Richard, was knighted by Edward IV. and created chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster.

In 1514, Catharine of Arragon was entertained by Edward Fowler, and at his castle received the joyful news of the defeat of the Scottish army at Flodden Field. John Fowler, in 1547, was a member of the household of Edward VI., and it was through his influence that the royal assent was given to the marriage of Lord Seymour to the Princess (afterwards Queen) Elizabeth. William, who died 1614, was one of the poets to the court of James VI. Christopher was a prominent English clergyman; born in 1611; left the Established Church in 1641 to join the Presbyterians. Edward was made bishop of Gloucester in 1691. John and Robert were among the great land-owners of Great Britain. Philip, one of the first settlers of New England, born about 1590, came to America, with his family, in the "Mary and John," Robert Sayers, master. Arriving in May, 1634, and receiving a grant of land in Ipswich, Mass., the same year, settled there and resided until his death, June 24, 1697. The line of descent to the subject of this sketch is through Philip (1), Joseph (2), Philip (3), Philip (4), Symonds (5). Winthrop (6) was born in Epsom, N. H., April 19, 1788. In 1810, he married Abigail, daughter of Samuel and Abigail (Brown) Davis, who was born in Epsom April 19, 1799, and died October 27, 1859. He filled many public offices in his native town and was distinguished for the clearness and soundness of his judgment and for the strict integrity and uprightness of his conduct. He was a man whose practice through life was in exact conformity with his profession. He was one of the selectmen of Epsom in 1824, '26, '28, '30, '38; auditor in 1843-44. He died in Pembroke, N. H., September 22, 1861.

The children of Winthrop and Abigail (Davis) Fowler were Hannah, born September 5, 1810, died April 7, 1821; Abigail, born July 4, 1812, died July 16, 1814; Abigail, born March 16, 1815, died November 15, 1867; Betsey, born July 10, 1818, lives in Pembroke, N. H.; Samuel, born May 8, 1821, lives in Epsom, N. H.; Symonds, born March 20, 1823, died December 23, 1827; Winthrop, born June 28, 1825, died July 21, 1825; Winthrop, born January 20, 1827, lives in Pembroke, N. H.; Nancy, born December 17, 1830, lives in Pembroke, N. H.

WINTHROP FOWLER, JR.

Winthrop Fowler, Jr., son of Winthrop and Abigail (Davis) Fowler, was born in Epsom, N. H., January 20, 1827, and lived with his father on the farm until 1845, when they moved to his present situation in Pembroke. May 16, 1860, he married Ann L., daughter of Ephraim and Sarah (Dyer) Locke, of Epsom, N. H. From this union there were three boys,—Minot Locke, born February 5, 1863; George Winthrop, born November 1, 1864; and Edward Martin, born September 27, 1868. Mr. Fowler always had a firm belief in thorough education, and, by his industry and economy, was able to provide means for his boys obtaining such, the foundation of which was laid in the old Pembroke Academy, justly celebrated in the history of this county. Although of the minority party, and far from being an office-seeker or desirous of public distinction, Mr. Fowler has been prominent in the civil affairs of the town of Pembroke, having held the position of moderator in the town-meetings of the years 1869, '71, '72, '73, '74, '77, '78 and '84; member of the Board of Selectmen in 1872, '73 and '74; auditor, 1878-84, continuously, which position he still holds. In politics Mr. Fowler has always been a firm Democrat, interested and earnest for the advancement of the plans and purposes of his party. He was in early manhood commissioned a justice of the peace by the Governor, which position he continues to hold. He owns one of the finest farms in Pembroke; he has led a hard-working life, and one of decided success. He has in an unusual degree the confidence and respect of all as a valued citizen of sound judgment, having the best interests of his fellow-men at heart, and is decidedly one of the leading men of his town.

ADDISON NEWTON OSGOOD.

For three generations the Osgood family have been prominent in the manufacturing, business and social circles of Pembroke and Allentown, finding a sphere for activity and a home in the village of Suncook.

The family is of English descent, the ancestor having cast in his lot with the Puritans of the Massachusetts Bay colony some time in the seventeenth century. One of the forefathers followed up the valley of the Merrimack with the company who settled at Penacook and laid the foundations of the fair city which later was to become the capital of the State. Many of his descendants may be found to-day in Concord and adjoining townships, while one branch sought a home in North Conway and adjacent towns, in the State of Maine.

Some time before the year 1800, Christopher Osgood and his wife, Annie (Abbott) Osgood, from Concord, settled in the village, and he soon became one of the leading men in Pembroke.

One of their sons, Ira B. Osgood, married Alice

Prescott, settled in town and maintained the reputation for business activity established by the father.

Addison N. Osgood, in the third generation, the son of Ira B. and Alice (Prescott) Osgood, was born in Allentown March 16, 1836.

His education was acquired at the common schools of the village and at Pembroke Academy. In early manhood he left home, and for several years was employed in Boston and vicinity. In 1860, Mr. Osgood returned to his native village, formed a partnership with James Tennant, which continued until Mr. Tennant's death, in 1873, and settled down to the responsibilities of a business career. For twenty-five years Mr. Osgood has enjoyed the confidence and respect of his fellow-townsmen, which has been manifested by their frequent calls upon him to "manage the affairs of the township" and represent them at the General Court.

He was a member of the Board of Selectmen in 1869, 1870 and 1871; representative in 1878 and 1879; a supervisor in 1879; chairman of the Board of Supervisors from 1880 until the spring of 1885, when he was elected chairman of the Board of Selectmen.

Mr. Osgood is an advocate of the advantages of secret societies. He was a charter member of the D. L. Jewell Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons at Suncook, and is a member of the Mount Horeb Commandery, Knights Templar. He is a member of the fraternity known as the Knights of Pythias and is prominent in Odd-Fellow circles.

In creed, Mr. Osgood is a Methodist and is a member and regular attendant of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Suncook.

He was married, December 17, 1865, to Mary Emma, daughter of William A. and Julia (Upham) Phelps, once of Haverhill, N. H., and later of Amesbury, Mass., and Suncook, N. H. No children have blessed their home.

Mr. Osgood is still in active business (wood and lumber), and is interested in every public enterprise calculated to beautify and improve the village of his choice. He is a builder and owner of comfortable homes for workmen. He is the owner of a farm, of some thirty acres and a desirable house on Glass Street, near his mill.

Mr. Osgood enjoys to an eminent degree the respect of his fellow-citizens. He is considered upright and honorable in every relation of life, and by honest labor is accumulating a comfortable fortune to secure his old age from want.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM FIFE.

We are able to trace the ancestors of this family on the maternal side back to Joseph Holt, who was born in the north of England March 5, 1738. He married Elizabeth Widdrington, who was born in the north of England May 25, 1739. They were married in 1769, and emigrated to this country, stopping in one of the seaport towns for a few years, then came to New Hampshire. On the paternal side we can trace the ancestors back to William Fife, who was born in the north of Scotland May 16, 1746; he married Phoebe White, born in 1745. Mr. Fife emigrated to this country in 1768, and they were married after coming here, in 1772, and settled in North Pembroke, on a lot of land bought of James Bartlett, who lived on Pembroke Street at the time. They built a log house and bought a tract of land adjoining the one already purchased. They built a new frame house, and about the time it was finished while the carpenters were at supper, it was destroyed by fire. Mr. Fife, not being easily discouraged, built a two-story frame house upon the same place, which is standing yet. The only children of Joseph and Elizabeth Hoyt of whom we have any account were Nathan, born December 2, 1762, and married Sarah Black, born February 1, 1762, and settled on a farm in North Pembroke. Abigail, the only member of their family mentioned in this sketch, was born February 1, 1777. Jeremiah Fife, son of William and Phoebe, was born December 5, 1779, married Abigail Holt, November 29, 1803, and settled in the north part of Pembroke, where they lived for about fifty years. He was a carpenter and builder by trade, and he died February 22, 1852. They had ten children,—Thursay, born March 15, 1805, married Benjamin Haggat; Nathan H., born December 6, 1807, married Abbie Brooks, and died December 19, 1839; Sarah, born November, 1809, married Samuel Worth; Abigail, born March 18, 1811, married John Haggat, and died December 28, 1861; Jeremiah, born August 10, 1813, died November 1, 1845; James, born May 16, 1816, died July 22, 1817; William, born April 29, 1821; Ruhamah, born December 8, 1824, died May 21, 1854; Noah, born July 15, 1827, married Mary Wilson; Eley, born February 9, 1839, married John Spurlin. Captain William Fife, the principal subject of this sketch, lived with his father upon the farm until he was nineteen years of age. He then began working at the carpenter business, which he has continued since. He is a successful contractor and builder; during the last few years has been engaged in farming. He was made captain in the Eleventh Regiment New Hampshire State Militia in 1817, which office he held for two years.

He built a house on Pembroke Street in 1810, using a part of the old James Bartlett tavern, which was built more than one hundred years ago. Captain William Fife married Mary D., daughter of Andrew and Sarah (Dudley) Gault, October 19, 1843. She was born February 25, 1820, and died August 14, 1875, and they had the following children: Helen A., born May 24, 1843, married Joseph J. Rind, who was born October 12, 1811 (they were married May 28, 1874, and settled in Rye, N. H.; they have one child, Mary A., born June 29, 1875); William W., born July 15, 1848, married Louisa H. Blake (she was born February 27, 1840, married March 4, 1871, settled in North Pembroke, and they had four children,—Henry W., born November 28, 1871; Frank D., born March 12, 1874; Horace E., born June 24, 1880; Sarah A., born April 29, 1882); Edwin H., born January 16, 1851, married Lizzie Alden, April 28, 1885, and settled in Springfield, Mass.; Sarah F., born December 23, 1853 and died July 14, 1880.

MCCONNELL MOORE.

Rev. Daniel Mitchell, born in the north of Ireland in 1697, is the first person on the maternal side of this family of whom we have any knowledge. Upon arriving in this country, he was licensed to preach by the Boston Presbytery, and first entered the pulpit in Georgetown, Me.; December 3, 1769, he was ordained over the Presbyterian Church at Pembroke, N. H.; was the first minister of that denomination in the place. He married Martha White, and to them were born two children,—Ruhamah and Martha. On the paternal side we are able to trace the line of ancestry back to Deacon James Moore, born in the north of Ireland. Before leaving his native country he married Agnes Coolbrath, and in 1713 or '14, upon their arrival in this country, they went directly to Concord, Mass., remaining one year; from there they went to Londonderry, N. H., but not liking the outlook, went to Pennacook, (now Concord), N. H.; his next move was to Suncook (now Pembroke), where he bought a tract of land, paying about four hundred dollars. They found upon their arrival but one white family in this town. Mr. Moore built the first frame house there, and during the French and Indian War it was used for a garrison. A part of the same house is now owned by Samuel E. Moore, one of the descendants. Deacon James died March 11, 1773.

Robert, son of Deacon James, married Ruhamah, daughter of Daniel and Martha (White) Mitchell, and they had ten children. Major Daniel Mitchell Moore, son of Robert and Ruhamah, and the father of the subject of this sketch, was born in Pembroke April 25, 1777. He married Sally McConnell, April 9, 1809, and died December 29, 1848. They had four children, viz.: McConnell, Samuel E., Sally C. and Betsey T. McConnell, the subject of this sketch, was born in this town October 19, 1809, and spent his life upon the farm. He was educated at Pembroke Academy. December 20, 1837, he married Sarah J., daughter of John and Judith (Blake) Sanborn, of London, N. H. Mr. Moore was a Whig in his earlier days, but voted the Democratic ticket later in life. He has never held any office, not having any aspirations in that direction. He was a member of the Congregational Church for nearly fifty years, and always a supporter of church and schools. He was a kind friend and neighbor. McConnell Moore died in this town December 12, 1878, leaving his wife with ample means for support in her old age.

AARON WHITTEMORE.

The Whittemore family originated with Sir John, who was knighted on the battle-field for valorous conduct in the year 1230, and received a tract of land called "Whytemere," or White Meadow, whence he received the title Lord John de Whytemere.

Thomas Whittemore emigrated to this country in the year 1642, and settled in that part of Charlestown now known as Malden. He died in 1660. His son John, who came over with his father, was born in Kitchen Parish, Hertfordshire, England, February 1, 1638; was baptized February 11th of the same year. He married, first, Mary Upham, of Weymouth, who died June 27, 1677; he married, second, Mary Miller, in October, 1677. Children,—Thomas, born 1664; Joseph, born 1666; Benjamin, born 1669; Nathaniel, born 1673; Joel, born 1677; Mary, born 1678, died young; Pelatiah, born 1680; Amos, born 1681; Mary, born 1683; Daniel, born 1685; Rebecca, born 1687; Hannah, born 1689.

Benjamin Whittemore, son of John and Mary (Upham) Whittemore, was born in Cambridge, Mass., September 1, 1669; married Esther Brooks, August 17, 1692; settled in Concord, Mass., and died September 8, 1734; his wife died September 16, 1742. Children of Benjamin and Esther (Brooks) Whittemore,—Mary, born July 12, 1694; Benjamin, born April 9, 1696, died at the age of thirty-nine, was a representative from Concord six years; Nathaniel, born November 23, 1698; Grace, born March 29, 1700; Esther, born May 3, 1707; Aaron, born December 11, 1711.

Rev. Aaron Whittemore, third son of Benjamin and Esther (Brooks) Whittemore, was born in Concord, Mass., December, 1711; graduated at Harvard College in 1734; resided three years at Groton, Mass.; was settled over the Congregational Church in Suncook, or Lovell's township (now Pembroke), as the first minister, March 1, 1737. During the French and Indian Wars his house, which stood just south of the cemetery on Pembroke Street, was a garrison-house, and he held the commission of first lieutenant from the provincial authorities of New Hampshire, and was in command of the post. The house forms a part of the present residence of Mrs. Vose. He married, February 2, 1743, Abigail Collin, of Newbury, Mass., whom he met while visiting her relatives in Rumford. He died November 16, 1767. His wife, born November 18, 1718, died May 11, 1803. Children,—John, born 1744, died January 20, 1746; Aaron, born April 9, 1746, married Sarah Gilman; Judith, born November 6, 1748, died February 13, 1755; Benjamin, born December 4, 1750, married Abigail Abbot; Esther, born August 12, 1752, married, first, Jeremiah Hall, married, second, Rev. Joseph Woodman; Sarah, born May 18, 1751, died June 15, 1759; Ruth, born April 12, 1756, married Deacon David Kimball; Peter, born April 7, 1758, married, February 25, 1783, Elizabeth Baker, settled in Salisbury, N. H.

Aaron Whittemore, son of Rev. Aaron Whittemore, born April 9, 1746; married, January 11, 1770, Sarah, daughter of Peter Gilman, of Exeter. She was born October 27, 1745, died October 14, 1823; he died May 1, 1817. Settled on his father's farm, served honorably through one campaign during the Revolution, and was prominent in town affairs for many years.

Children of Aaron and Sarah (Gilman) Whittemore,—child, born October 21, 1770, died young; Judith, born November 5, 1771, married, November 14, 1793, James Baker, of Bow; John, born October 14, 1772, died October 30, 1772; child, born October 23, 1773, died young; Aaron, born November 28, 1774, married Lydia Fisk, of Derry; Richard, born January 16, 1776, married Nancy Brickett; Sarah, born September 16, 1777, married, November 15, 1796, Jesse Baker, settled in Shipton, P. Q.; Abigail, born November 17, 1781, died unmarried May 29, 1861; Peter, born January 6, 1783, a physician, married, went West; Polly, born April 16, 1785, died February 25, 1788.

Hon. Aaron Whittemore, son of Aaron and Sarah (Gilman) Whittemore, grandson of Rev. Aaron Whittemore, was born November 28, 1774; married, October 23, 1800, Lydia Fisk, of Derry, born February 28, 1776, died March 9, 1862. He settled on the farm and built the house now occupied by his son, Hon. Aaron Whittemore. He was representative, Senator and judge. Died April 26, 1850, at the age of seventy-six. Children of Aaron and Lydia (Fisk) Whittemore,—Benjamin, born March 20, 1801, died in Philadelphia in 1833; Louisa, born September 21, 1802, married, September 23, 1847, Charles P. Hayward (residence, Pembroke, N. H.); Mary F., born August 13, 1804, married, May 15, 1820, Daniel Parker (residence, San Francisco, Cal.); Adaline, born September 28, 1806, died December 28, 1821; Aaron, born November 4, 1808, married Ariannah S. Barstow, of Exeter; Hiram, born March 31, 1811, married, first, November 26, 1828, Elizabeth J. Hoyt, of Exeter, married, second, August 27, 1856, Alma M. Puggalls; Lydia, born June 28, 1813, unmarried; Sarah, born November 24, 1815, married Jacob Sawyer, died September 9, 1845; Dolly D., born February 13, 1819, married David H. Burnham, died April 18, 1843.

Hon. Aaron Whittemore, son of Hon. Aaron Whittemore, grandson of Aaron Whittemore, and great-grandson of Rev. Aaron Whittemore, was born November 1, 1808; married, December 13, 1840, Ariannah S. Barstow (born in Exeter February 20, 1821); settled in Pembroke on his father's farm. He gained his education at the academy, principally under the instruction of Hon. John Vose. He taught school successfully for several years in Pembroke and other towns.

He has been elected at various times to the most important offices in the gift of the people of the town, and held the offices of moderator, selectman and town treasurer for several years in succession.

He represented the town two years in the State Legislature, and was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1850, and also of 1876. He was appointed postmaster at Pembroke in 1829, and held the office for about sixteen years. He was interested in the establishment of the People's Literary Institute and Gymnasium of Pembroke, in 1840, and was chosen the first secretary of its board of directors, and afterwards served for several years as its president. He was elected one of the trustees of this academy in 1863, and at the same time their secretary, and has held said office to the present time.

He was connected with the militia of the State for some years; was appointed ensign of the Second Company of infantry in the Eleventh Regiment June 14, 1828; promoted lieutenant September 6, 1832; captain April 29, 1833; lieutenant-colonel of the Eleventh Regiment June, 27, 1839, and colonel of the same July 6, 1846. He was promoted brigadier-general of the Third Brigade June 4, 1851.

He represented his native town in the Legislature in 1849 and 1850, and also was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1850.

He was appointed associate justice of the Court of Common Pleas for Merrimack County July 1, 1853. General Whittmore is a successful farmer upon the homestead of his father and grandfather. He was also, for a number of years, a member of the Merrimack County Agricultural Society, of which he served as president. Mr. Whittmore is one of the oldest and most highly respected citizens of the town, looked to by all classes as a wise, most prudent and confiding counselor. From the foregoing sketch it will be seen it has pleased his fellow-men to place the utmost confidence in him, and to confer upon him all the honors they could bestow, which is too apparent a token of their esteem to pass unnoticed. The influence and benefit of such a citizen is not easily estimated.

Children of Aaron and Ariannah (Barstow) Whittmore,—Sophia F., born August 1, 1842; married, June 2, 1861, Charles C. Shaw. Ariannah B., born April 23, 1844; married, April 5, 1870, John H. Sullivan. Aaron, born May 22, 1846; died April 3, 1849. Aaron born January 18, 1849; married; lawyer in Pittsfield. Adaline G., born October 13, 1850; married, February 2, 1870, John G. Tallant; died October 11, 1875. John Cambridge, born August 8, 1852; married; residence, Cambridge, Mass. Charles Barstow, born September 28, 1854; married; residence, Pembroke, N. H. Arthur Gilman, born July 26, 1856; lawyer; residence, Dover, N. H. Frederick B., born September 12, 1857; residence, Kansas. Annie Brewster, born April 15, 1859. Elizabeth M. (Bessie), born February 21, 1861.

Hon. Aaron Whittmore, Jr., who died in Pittsfield May 4, 1885, at the age of thirty-six years, was the oldest son of General Aaron Whittmore, of Pembroke, and in many respects one of the representative men of his State, being a lawyer of extensive practice, a State Senator, judge advocate on the brigade staff with the rank of major, and continually laboring for the best interests of the town, of the surrounding communities of his own immediate neighborhood and all his fellow-men.

As a lawyer and military officer, as well as a prominent member of the Democratic party, he was a man of marked influence, while in private life he was honored for his nobility of character and uprightness. Although he has fallen in the midst of his usefulness, in the full vigor of a still brighter future, yet he accomplished much, and his death is greatly lamented.

HISTORY OF PITTSFIELD.

CHAPTER I.

Geographical—The First Settlement—Esquire John Cram—The Pioneer Mills—The First Frame House—The First Town-Meeting—Names of Pioneers—Pittsfield Village in 1812.

The town of Pittsfield lies in the eastern part of the county, and is bounded as follows:

On the northeast by Belknap County; northwest by Loudon and Chichester, and on the south by Epsom.

One hundred and seventeen years ago (1768) a solitary traveler came wending his way through the wilderness, up the valley of the Suncook, to the spot where now stands the flourishing village of Pittsfield. This solitary traveler was Esquire John Cram, who came as a representative of the original proprietors of the town, most of whom resided in Hampton. They were anxious that the grant should be developed, and they were wise, as the sequel proved, in selecting John Cram as the pioneer. He examined the mill privileges at the falls, and finally agreed with the proprietors to commence a settlement on the receipt of fifteen pounds and a deed of the mill privilege with the mill lot of one hundred acres.

In the following year he came up and built a temporary dam across the Suncook, by felling a large tree on each side of the river, the butts resting on the stumps, and the tops meeting on the ledge in the middle of the river, and by setting posts against the trunks of these trees, and throwing in brush, stones and gravel, a rude dam was constructed. He then built a log mill, and by means of this rude dam and rickety mill, timber and plank were sawed, with which buildings were erected and a substantial dam built, and in the following year he removed his family to the place, and to him is ascribed the honor of having made the first permanent settlement within the bounds of the present town of Pittsfield.

The proprietors were indeed fortunate in selecting Esquire Cram to commence the settlement. He not only brought the land into market, but proved a most excellent citizen. He took an active interest in the new settlement, and for nearly forty years he was in public office, and did most of the town business and fairly earned the appellation of "father of the town." He was a native of Hampton. In addition to the mill privilege, he bought eleven hundred acres of land for ten cents per acre, which included most of the present village. He built the first frame house in the town in 1770. In all local enterprises he was a leading spirit. He gave the land for the meeting-house and burying-ground.

"Cram's Mill" was a common centre and resort for the early settlers to talk over the affairs of the country, the town, the laying out of roads and the building of bridges.

The first town-meetings were held at his house, and here, also, the first settlers would gather on foot, coming along blazed paths through the woods from their little clearings, dressed in their sheep's gray frocks and brown tow trousers, to elect officers and take such measures as would result in the promotion of the best interests of the town. Religious meetings were also held at his house, or in his corn barn. Here, also, the first religious society in the town was organized and a public school occasionally kept.

At the breaking out of the War of the Revolution he was chosen captain, and every man in town was a member of his company. With a large family, and fifty years of age, it was not expected of him to go into the army, but during the long seven years' war he, with John McClary, of Epsom, rendered efficient service in furnishing men and means for the prosecution of the war. His large family of children all settled near him. During his forty years of service as town clerk, selectman, representative, etc., he made no charge for his services, only expenses.

The early settlers were all from Hampton, and most of the names in each town are common to both, as Drake, Leavitt, Cram, Green, Norris, Dow, Jones, Marston, Gove, Greenleaf, Perkins, Tilton, Lane, Jenness, Swett, Ring, Sargent, Shaw, Tucker, Fogg, Eaton, Hilliard, French, Phillbrick, Towle, Brown, Blake, Knowlton, Smith, Davis, Sanborn, Clifford, Page, Garland, Mason, Hoag, Moulton, Chase, Brackett, True, Morrill, Prescott, etc.

The rich soil, favorable location and heavy growth of timber induced rapid emigration. The early settlers were young men of pluck and strength, who came up to hew peaceful homes and fruitful farms from the wilderness, and provide a competence for their families by honest toil and rigid economy. They were lineal descendants of the colony of Puritans who settled at "Old Newbury." They were of the same stock that Cromwell chose for his Ironsides, "who feared God and kept their powder dry," and possessed the same leading traits of character.

Pittsfield Village in 1812.—In 1812 the centre of the town was not called the village, but "the city," which consisted of the meeting-house and four or five dwellings. Dr. Thomas Shannon lived in the "Lang house," opposite the meeting-house. Mr. T. Clark lived at the corner of the road east. W. Butters, Esq., lived a few rods west of this ancient building. A store was kept by Esquire Butters in one part of his dwelling, and another store was kept by Jonathan Clark in the west end of the next house,—the tavern and residence of D. Fogg, subsequently known as the "Carroll house." Opposite was a small tenement. The next dwelling in a westerly direction was that of John Cram, with a large mill-yard between his house and the river, and the saw-mill and grist-mill near the bridge. Turning the corner and crossing the bridge on the Concord road, two small dwellings were passed, the first known as the Hilliard house, the other as the David Smith house. This was the last house till the top of the long hill was reached, and there was the house of old Mr. Prescott, and near by, that of his son, S. W. Prescott. On the Gilmanston road was a blacksmith-shop, and the high ledge overlooking the mill-dam, an old fulling-mill on its opposite corner, a carding-mill close by, and then Lyford's tannery filled up the space to the river.

The old River School-house stood at the corner of the River road, with just room enough between it and the mill-pond for the road to Barnstead. By the hill-road lived Colonel Lyford, and at the corner beyond, where the road branched, was the house of Moses Kenney. A few rods above was the Jenkins house, which in 1800 was used as store, tavern and dwelling-house.

One of the earliest school-teachers was Joseph Oriome. For twenty-eight years he was annually chosen town clerk. At the bottom of the page, in the year 1810, is the following memorandum: "Written with a metallic pen." His first record as clerk was in 1802.

Hon. Moses Norris, Jr., was a prominent citizen of Pittsfield. His father, Moses Norris, was an early settler here and served in the Revolutionary War. Moses, Jr., graduated at Dartmouth in 1828, the first graduate from Pittsfield. He pursued his studies with Isaac O. Barnes, of Barnstead, and commenced practice in that town. In 1831 he removed to Pittsfield and soon acquired a large practice, rising to an eminent position at the bar, ranking with the Bells, Atherton, Woodbury, Pierce, Perley, etc. He represented the town in the Legislature in 1837, '38, '39 and '40, and the latter year was Speaker of the House. He was member of the State Council several years; was elected member of Congress in 1843 and re-elected in 1845. He was chosen United States Senator in 1848, and died while a member of that body in January, 1855.

Eighty years ago the "Upper City" was a place of more business than the present village, or "Lower City" as it was then called. Near the "Upper City" was a store kept by William Simpson, and later one by Job Demerit.

The village of Pittsfield is beautifully located on both sides of the river, and the hills, covered with innumerable farms, rise around it like a mighty amphitheatre, while in the background are seen lofty mountain peaks, the principal ones being the famous Kearsarge, the Belknap and Gunstock, and, taken all in all, no town in New Hampshire surpasses it in beauty, breadth and variety of its prospects.

PITTSFIELD—(Continued).

Cotton-Factory.—The cotton-factory was erected in 1827, and after the first impetus had been expended the place went on in a steady, old-fashioned sort of way for nearly forty years. During all this time four and six-horse teams went plodding away towards Concord in the morning and came wearily home at night, while the stage-coach rattled busily about at an early hour gathering up its load of passengers and freight. Pittsfield stood entirely by itself in those days. Then, as now, there was no place of equal importance within a radius of fifteen miles. It was without a rival, and has remained so ever since. Stages went out to Concord, Gilmanston, Alton, Dover and Northwood, and heavy team horses were a familiar feature of the village. It was during this period that Pittsfield Academy was founded, and grew up to be the foremost institution of learning in that section of the State, sending out pupils who have since made their mark in business, in medicine, in law, in the pulpit and in the school-room. It was in this time, too, that the various church edifices were erected, the Pittsfield Library was established and that the lyceum flourished in the hearty fashion which men still delight to recall. Many substantial buildings were erected and some goodly estates were built up by industry and judicious trade. But the time came when Pittsfield people realized that they were standing still, if not positively retrograding, and the effort to shake off the lethargy into which the village was falling led to the building of the Suncook Valley Railroad.

Suncook Valley Railroad.—The building of this road opened a new era in the history of this town and the charming valley through which it passes. The first movement for connecting Pittsfield by rail with the outer world was begun about the year 1850. It was conceived by "Uncle John Berry," who, with others, procured a charter and a survey was made. The struggle for the road was a long and arduous one. Ground was first broken April 26, 1869, at Pittsfield and Suncook. The event was duly celebrated, and the building of the road was rapidly pushed forward, and the last rail was laid November 27, 1869. The first train went over the road with passengers December 6th, leaving Pittsfield at 8.45 A.M. The road was formally opened with a great demonstration at Pittsfield, December 10th. F. B. Berry was marshal of the day. The welcoming address was made by Hon. R. P. J. Tenney, An eloquent address was made by Hon. Lewis W. Clark. Addresses were also made by S. N. Bell, Hon. Isaac W. Smith, "Uncle" John Berry, Benjamin Emerson, Hon. Daniel Clark, Colonel John B. Clarke, Joseph Kidder, Governor Nathaniel Head, P. K. Chandler, John C. French and others.

Pittsfield contributed liberally to the building of the railroad, the town voting the full sum allowed by law and the citizens subscribing heavily for the stock. It was in operation before the close of 1869, and in the spring of 1870 a new order of things began. Situated as Pittsfield is, remote from the cities and larger villages of the State, with thrifty farming towns on every side, it only needed railroad facilities to become the centre of a large and steadily-increasing trade. The effect of the railroad in this respect was realized at once, but a few leading citizens were not content with this alone, and looked about for some business that might be induced to locate among them and bring capital and industry to the place. Lynn parties offered to come and engage in the manufacture of shoes if sufficient encouragement could be secured. As the result, a building two hundred and ten feet long, thirty-five feet wide and three stories high, with a basement, was erected in 1870, furnished with abundant steam-power, and three firms, each taking a third of the factory and power, began the manufacture of shoes on quite an extensive scale. The shop had capacity for three hundred and fifty or four hundred hands, and for several years a large business was carried on. This was Pittsfield's second period of growth, and the village changed as in a transformation scene. New streets were laid out, building was pushed rapidly forward, and the stores increased in number as well as in the amount of business done. Some fine business blocks were erected, the population increased, and a brilliant future was confidently predicted for the village. But five or six years later there began to be a feeling of uncertainty in the very air. The firms engaged in making shoes at the big shop had trouble with their help, grew dissatisfied, and one by one took their departure, leaving the men who had done the most for the general growth, and who had invested heavily in real estate, in the most critical position possible. It was a time of great depression and general discouragement. Tenements stood empty, some traders moved away and others were undecided what to do. It was a terrible experience for the business men of Pittsfield and is often spoken of by them as the most trying period of their lives. It was more imperatively necessary that something should be done than it was in 1869.

Shoe Manufacturing.—In 1879, C. B. Lancaster, an extensive and successful shoe manufacturer and dealer, offered to establish a part of his business in Pittsfield and make no fewer than five thousand cases annually, if the citizens would build him such a shop as he desired and exempt him from taxation for a term of years. An arrangement was quickly arrived at and the work of building was begun at once under the personal supervision of Mr. Ira N. Blake, who has from the first had charge of the firm's business in Pittsfield. It was Mr. Blake's idea to locate the factory on the river in order that the water-power might be utilized a great part of the year, and to use steam only in case the water-power should fail. Accordingly, the building, as well as another erected by the company itself two years later, was equipped for both steam and water-power and the establishment enjoys immunity from stops through lack of motive-power. Work was begun in the shop before the carpenters had fairly left the building, and has continued with but slight interruptions ever since. Mr. Blake himself added greatly to the confidence of business men by purchasing the farm formerly owned by the late Jeremiah Clark, which stretches down the hillside from Main Street to the river, opening up a new street, putting up no fewer than seven new cottage houses for his workmen and erecting an elegant residence for himself at the corner of Main and Blake Streets. Nothing better calculated to revive the courage of the citizens could have occurred. It was evident that the new firm had come to stay, and its representative was a man who would take some interest in the village beyond the number of dollars he might be able to remit to the headquarters of the firm in Boston. Building was begun anew, business revived and Pittsfield entered upon a period of development and general prosperity.

In the six years that the firm of C. B. Lancaster & Co. has been established here it has distributed in Pittsfield between one hundred and twenty-five thousand and one hundred and fifty thousand dollars yearly and has done an annual business averaging more than half a million. It has given almost steady employment to from three hundred to five hundred hands, has cut up thirty thousand sides of leather yearly, and in its largest year did a business amounting to seven hundred and eighty thousand dollars.

MORGAN, DORR & LIBBY.—When the original shoe firm left Pittsfield the old shop remained empty on the hands of the Pittsfield Shoe Factory Association, which offered the free use of the building, with ample steam-power, machinery, etc., to any concern that would come and do business in it. Accordingly, Morgan & Dorr, a firm doing business in Lynn, formed a new partnership with E. A. Libby, a gentleman of twenty years' practical experience in the business, and who had been for a long time previous in their employ as foreman and superintendent, and began operations here under the firm name of Morgan, Dorr & Libby. The business was practically a new venture, it being the purpose of the firm to manufacture a superior quality of ladies' goods and build up a trade on the merits of the work accomplished. The new firm began work here in September, 1881, and in three years' time had established a business of about two hundred thousand dollars annually, employing in flush times two hundred and fifty hands. In September, 1884, the partnership expired by limitation, but the business is continued under the supervision of Mr. Libby, who was retained as superintendent.

The Pittsfield Manufacturing Company manufactures cotton goods. It is a large establishment. Geo. E. Kent, agent.

PITTSFIELD—(Continued).

The Pittsfield Bank—The Pittsfield Savings-Bank—The Farmers Savings-Bank—The Aqueduct Company—The Analecta—Cornelian Lodge, F. and A. M.

The Pittsfield Bank was organized as a State bank March 18, 1851. The first board of directors were Benjamin Emerson, Jacob Perkins, John L. Thorndike, Jeremiah Clough, William Jenkins, Jr., John S. Osborne and S. M. D. Perkins.

The officers have been as follows: Presidents, John L. Thorndike, James Drake and Charles H. Carpenter; Cashiers, Charles H. Carpenter, John L. French, Josiah Carpenter and John A. Goss.

Present board of directors,—Charles H. Carpenter, Hiram A. Tuttle, Thomas H. Thorndike, John A. Goss and Nathaniel M. Batchelder.

It was organized as a national bank February 13, 1885. Capital, fifty thousand dollars.

The Pittsfield Savings-Bank was incorporated in 1855, with the following incorporators: James A. Treat, John Berry, Benjamin Emerson, Reuben L. French, James Drake, Charles H. Carpenter, Sylvester H. French, G. L. Rennie, Lowell Brown, Jeremiah Clough, William G. French, Walter B. Drake and R. P. J. Tenney.

The first officers were John Berry, president; Lowell Brown, treasurer and secretary.

The first board of trustees were James A. Treat, William G. French, G. L. Rennie, Charles H. Carpenter, Isaiah Berry, Sylvester H. French, Louis W. Clark, Reuben L. French, Peter J. Hook and Lowell Brown.

The present officers are R. L. French, president, and G. F. Berry, treasurer.

Present trustees,—R. L. French, S. H. French, J. W. Johnston, Lowell Brown, B. F. Kaime, A. B. Taylor, John J. Jenness, T. H. Thorndike, Jeremiah

Clough, H. A. Tuttle, William G. French, P. J. Hook, B. G. Parsons, E. L. Carr and G. F. Berry.

The present amount of deposits is $259,206; number of depositors, twelve hundred and seventeen.

The bank was first located in John Berry's store, and was afterwards removed to the second floor of Tuttle's Block, which was burned with the Congregational Church, February 14, 1876. The site was taken from the burning building uninjured, and Union Block was soon erected on the vacant spot, the bank taking one-third interest in it and occupying spacious and convenient quarters on the first floor, where it still remains. The present treasurer, Mr. George F. Berry, assumed the duties of his position in July, 1880, upon the resignation of his brother, William H., and has had charge of the business since that time.

Of the sixty-seven savings-bank treasurers in New Hampshire, three were natives of Pittsfield, viz.: J. W. White, of Nashua; George F. Berry, of Pittsfield; and William Yeaton, of Farmington. Two others—Josiah Carpenter, of Manchester, and George A. Fernald, of Concord—have been residents of the town.

The Farmers' Savings-Bank was organized October 13, 1883, and commenced business December 1, 1883. The officers have been as follows: Ira N. Blake, president; John A. Goss, treasurer; Ira N. Blake, Peabody H. Adams, Nathaniel S. Drake, James Griffin, Edwin A. Libby, George N. Foss, Charles H. Carpenter, Thomas H. Thorndike, True H. Mansfield, John J. French, Charles M. Bailey, John A. Goss, Aaron Whittemore, Jr., trustees. Amount of deposits May, 1885, nineteen thousand dollars.

The Aqueduct Company was organized June 1, 1884, with the following officers: R. L. French, president; S. J. Winslow, superintendent; R. L. French, Charles H. Carpenter, Hiram A. Tuttle, S. J. Winslow, Aaron Whittemore, Jr., board of directors; John A. Goss, treasurer; N. S. Drake, clerk. The officers have not been changed.

The Analecta, published by O. H. A. Chamberlin in his elegantly appointed office in Opera Block, has a unique and interesting history. Mr. Chamberlin began printing at his home in Dunbarton as an amateur in April, 1877, when seventeen years of age, and in December of the same year the first issue of the Snow Flake—now the Analecta—appeared. It consisted of twelve pages, six by nine inches, and was to be published monthly, and was offered to the public at thirty cents a year. After three issues it was enlarged to a four-column quarto with patent inside, the outside being printed on a small job press, one page at a time. After October, 1879, the printing was all done at home, and for the first two years Mr. Chamberlain did all the work alone. Its circulation reached over eight hundred at this time. January 1, 1880, it was issued as a four-column folio, semi-monthly, and in the May following the Pittsfield department was added, over four hundred subscribers being received from that and other adjoining towns in the first eight months after. January, 1881, the subscription price was increased to fifty cents, and in the winter of 1882-83 a Cottrell cylinder press and other machinery, with a large amount of type, etc., was purchased, and January 1, 1883, the paper was published as a seven-column folio weekly at seventy-five cents a year. The success of the venture was complete and the circulation rapidly increased. In June following a Hopkinton department was added, and an increase of nearly two hundred was secured by that means. January 1, 1884, the paper was enlarged to an eight-column folio, the subscription price placed at one dollar a year, as at present, and the name was changed to the Analeeta. In April, 1884, the subject of removal to Pittsfield began to be discussed, and although no special inducement was offered by the citizens, it was finally decided to take the step. September 18, 1884, the material was on the road from Dunbarton to Pittsfield, and the paper was issued from the new home with only one day's delay. Such, in brief, is the history of the growth of a newspaper from the smallest beginning to a nicely-printed, well-conducted sheet, creditable to the village and a source of honest pride to its projector. It has reached a circulation of two thousand copies, has a good advertising patronage and one of the best equipped country offices in the State. Power is supplied by a water-motor and the rooms are lighted with gas. The facilities for job work are excellent, and in its new home the Analeeta should continue to be what it has already become, a successful and prosperous newspaper in a broadened field.

Corinthian Lodge F. and A. M., No. 82.—On the 19th day of January, A. L. 5867 (A. D. 1867), the most Worshipful Grand Master of Masons of New Hampshire, John H. Rowell, granted a dispensation to Brothers Henry H. Huse as Master, Daniel F. Smith as Senior Warden, W. Henry Berry as Junior Warden, together with their associates, Bros. R. P. J. Tenney,¹ J. C. French, E. B. Hazzen, C. P. Sanderson,² C. W. Ranlet,² S. A. Trask, J. P. Stinchfield, Harrison Elliott,² J. H. Hill, Nathaniel Blaisdell,² George E. Pendergast,² J. H. Jenkins, J. P. Roby, Benjamin Emerson,² J. J. M. Tenney,² to assemble and work as a regular lodge. Agreeably to the provisions of this dispensation, they met in the old lodge-room of the then defunct Suncook Lodge, I. O. O. F., in the Thorndike building, on the evening of January 30, 5867, with the above-named Masters and Wardens, and H. A. Tuttle as Treasurer, J. G. Ladd as Secretary, J. P. Roby as Senior Deacon, O. S. Roby as Junior Deacon, Sylvanus Smith as Senior Steward, C. W. Ranlet as Junior Steward, Sumner A.

Trask as Tyler, Harrison Elliott as member. At the regular communication, June 14th of this year, the lodge voted to petition for a charter.

On July 24th the "Lodge met in special communication at 2.30 p. m., for constitution and installment of its officers. The following officers were duly installed and the lodge constituted by the Most Worshipful Grand Master John H. Rowell, assisted by Right Worshipful District Grand Master Alexander M. Winn: Henry H. Huse, W. M.; John G. Ladd, S. W.; Oliver S. Roby, J. W.; William Yeaton, Treas.; N. M. Rollins,² Sec.; J. P. Roby, S. D.; N. G. Foote, J. D.;² Sylvanus Smith, S. S.; G. W. Roby, J. S.; Sumner A. Trask, Tyler.

Rev. Bro. L. Z. Ferris preached an installation sermon in the Congregationalist Church; refreshments were served in the old Washington House hall. The lodge held their communications in the old hall until A. L. 5870, when the building was remodeled. Plans were submitted to the brethren for a new and commodious lodge-room, for an annual rental of one hundred and fifty dollars. So rapidly was the work pushed forward that the lodge was enabled to hold its communications within its own walls with one exception. The record reads: "Met in regular communication in May, 5870, at the house of Brother Smith and opened on the third degree, waiving all ceremonies." At the regular communication in June we find them in their new quarters, which they occupied until the 14th of February, 1876, when the building was destroyed by fire. The lodge lost its charter, jewels and furniture; the records and seal the secretary, fortunately, had at his home.

Williard K. Cobb Post, G. A. R., tendered the lodge the use of their hall, which was accepted at a rental of three dollars a communication. Wednesday evening, March 8, 5876, we find a goodly number of the brethren present, ready and anxious to do with all their might for the good of the order. They voted to purchase a solid silver set of jewels and a set of working tools. They remained here until Thursday, November 29, 5881, when they removed to their new and beautiful lodge-rooms in Masonic Hall, built by the Masonic Hall Association over the old town hall.

The rooms are furnished in the very best; the lodge-room proper is carpeted; the chairs, altar, pedestals and settees of solid black walnut; an elegant Bible, presented by the ladies, rests upon the altar; the solid silver jewels hang pendant from a beautiful and costly set of regalia of blue silk velvet, embroidered and bordered with heavy silver bullion fringe, made and presented to the lodge by their ladies.

The lodge has funds at interest, the brethren are in harmony, and everything points to increasing prosperity and usefulness.

² Dead.

The lodge had nine Masters, all of whom are living. Brother H. H. Huse has been elected Speaker of the House of Representatives of New Hampshire. Of its charter members, eight have died, one was a member of Governor Gilmore's Council, and one is at present the popular and efficient secretary of the New Hampshire Fire Insurance Company.

Of its members, seven have died, sixteen have been demitted; the present number is seventy-seven. The following is a list of its Past Masters, the order and years in which they served: Brother H. H. Huse, 5867; Brother J. P. Roby, 5868, '69, '71; Brother W. H. Berry,¹ 5870; Brother C. H. Lane, 5872, '73, '74, '75; Brother L. A. Hodgdon, 5876; Brother E. J. Aiken,¹ 5877; Brother John Waldo, 5878; Brother H. W. Osgood, 5879, '80, '81, '84; Brother Josiah Gove, 5883, and at present its Master.

Masonic Hall Association, Pittsfield.²—Feeling and knowing the want of a lodge-room in which the brethren could meet and feel at home, a few of the brethren of Corinthian Lodge formed themselves into the "Masonic Hall Association," agreeable to the laws of the State of New Hampshire.

Its capital stock was fifteen hundred dollars, divided into shares of twenty dollars each, which was readily taken up by members of the lodge. The association leased the upper story of the old town hall and built thereon a French roof, and finished the elegant suite of rooms rented and occupied by Corinthian Lodge, No. 82, A. F. and A. M. At its first meeting it elected Amos H. Messer, president; Henry W. Osgood, treasurer; Clarence Johnson, clerk; Josiah Gove, William B. Hartwell, trustees; Amos H. Messer, William B. Hartwell, Clarence Johnson, Charles M. Bailey, H. W. Osgood, building committee.

CHAPTER V.

ECCLIESIASTICAL HISTORY.

Congregational Church.—On the 2d of June, 1782 (the same year in which the town of Pittsfield was inaugurated), the town voted to build a house of worship and locate the same where the present town hall now stands. At the next town-meeting, held January 6, 1783, it was voted that the meeting-house should be built "of the same bigness of Hampton Falls meeting-house." The building was not completed before the spring of 1789, although the frame was raised in the summer of 1787.

Where was the customary place, or places, for religious gatherings, previous to this, does not appear; but, in the month of September, 1787, the Congregational Society met at the corn-barn of Colonel John Cram. Colonel Cram's house was the old Mc-Crillis tavern-stand, and his corn-barn stood opposite, on land now belonging to the late S. Tenney's estate.

In 1788 the town voted to hire a Congregational minister for three months.

In November of the year following,—the year which witnessed the inauguration of Geo. Washington as the first President of the United States,—this church was duly organized with ten members.

The council was convened November 17, 1789, at the house of Colonel John Cram, "in compliance," as the old record reads, "with the request of this people by letters-missive."

The following Congregational Churches were represented by their pastors and delegates: Pastors,—Deerfield, Rev. Timothy Upham; Loudon, Rev. Jediah Tucker; Hopkinton, Rev. Jacob Cram; Epsom, Rev. Ebenezer Hazeltine; Gilmanton, Rev. Isaac Smith; Pembroke, Rev. Zachariah Colby; Hardwick, Rev. Mr. Holt.

The council at the same time ordained Mr. Christopher Paige, a graduate of Dartmouth College, as pastor of the church, the society having given him a call, with a settlement of sixty pounds and a salary of sixty-six pounds, annually, one-third to be paid in cash, one-third in good corn at three shillings per bushel and good rye at four shillings per bushel, and the remaining third in good beef at twenty shillings the hundred-weight.

Originally the society received a tract of fifty acres of land, lying upon the south side of Catamount, not far from the old Major William Berry place. In 1779, at the suggestion of Colonel Cram, this land was exchanged for land belonging to him in the village near the old parsonage house.

Mr. Paige's ministry continued for a little over six years. Fourteen were received into the church,— making, with the ten original members, a membership of twenty-four.

After Mr. Paige's dismissal, in January, 1796, there appears to have been but little Congregational preaching till the year 1800. In the fall of that year Rev. Benjamin Sargent, a Calvinistic Baptist, came to supply the pulpit for some one else. His preaching was so acceptable that he was invited to come again, and in December following he received a call to supply the pulpit for a year. Mr. Sargent, it would seem, was considerably exercised in mind over this unusual call from a Congregational Church to one professing close-communication sentiments, and the result was a renunciation on his part of those peculiar views held by his denomination, and he became an open-communicant.

Mr. Sargent commenced his labors as pastor in the beginning of the year 1801. In the spring of this year there was a revival of religion in town. This revival gave three additional members to the church. There were, however, twenty-one other converts. These were baptized by immersion, and on the 29th of October were gathered into an open-communication Baptist Church. Six months after this new Baptist Church was organized, April 29, 1802, it met, with the Congregational Church, at the meeting-house. The old record reads as follows: "1802, April 29th. At a church-meeting at the meeting-house, the two churches in Pittsfield, the Congregational Church and Calvinistic Baptist Church, mutually agreed and passed a vote to commune together at the table of the Lord, and each church to discipline their own church. Attest, Jonathan Perkins, Moderator."

Mr. Sargent continued to supply the two churches during the remainder of his ministry, and for sixteen years the two churches regularly sat around the Lord's table, Deacon Perkins, of the one church, and Deacon James, of the other, officiating as deacons; thus realizing "how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" Forty-four united with the churches during Mr. Sargent's ministry,—sixteen with the Congregational Church and twenty-eight with the Baptist Church. On the afternoon of the Sabbath, March 15, 1818, he went into his pulpit, and while preaching was seized with a fit of palsy, which soon deprived him of speech and reason. He died the following Thursday.

On October 29, 1818, the Calvinistic Baptists withdrew from fellowship with this church and organized a close-communication church. There was at first no little trouble as to which society should occupy the meeting-house,—both churches at one time occupying it alternately,—but this matter was afterwards adjusted, the Baptists yielding their claim.

In October, 1818, Mr. Abel Manning commenced his labors as stated supply, and continued for some time into the following year. During his ministry fourteen were admitted to the church.

Different persons supplied the pulpit after Mr. Manning, until the year 1827, during which time the church became so weak financially that it received aid from the Home Missionary Society, and even then preaching could be secured for but a few months of each year.

In October, 1827, a call was extended to Mr. Ezra Seoville, who was ordained and installed November 24, 1827. His ministry, owing to a lack of pecuniary support, was short, but successful,—twenty-three uniting with the church under his pastorate. He was dismissed September 14, 1829. For two years and a half there is a break in the records. At the end of this period Mr. Preserved Smith was ordained to perform the work of an evangelist with this church, June 12, 1832. He remained less than two years, but his labors were greatly blessed, thirty-seven being received during his ministry, and all but four on profession.

In October, 1834, Rev. Jonathan Curtis, of Sharon, Mass., having accepted a call to the pastorate, was installed by council, Rev. Dr. Bouton, of Concord, preaching the installation sermon. Mr. Curtis' ministry extended over a period of nearly eleven years. He was an able and devoted pastor. Under his ministrations one hundred and sixty-eight united with the church. There were several revivals of great power. The largest addition in one year was in 1838, when forty-four united,—all but one on confession of faith.

On the 18th of December, 1838, Edward Berry, Colonel Nathaniel Bachelder, Samuel White, Thomas Berry, William Berry, Jr., Enoch French, John L. Thorndike, John Berry, Isaiah Berry and John Potter associated themselves together for the purpose of purchasing land and erecting upon the same a new meeting-house. A contract was then made to build a house sixty feet long and forty-one feet wide for the sum of one thousand nine hundred and fifty dollars. The new building was completed in 1839. The old meeting-house, where worship had been sustained for fifty years, was purchased by the town for a town-house. For about thirty-seven years the church continued to worship in the new building, which received, in the mean time, enlargement and improvements.

Rev. Mr. Curtis was dismissed July 1, 1845, and on the 19th of November of the same year Mr. Moses H. Wells was ordained pastor. During his eight years of faithful service forty were added to the church,—fourteen by profession and twenty-six by letter. On account of feeble health Mr. Wells resigned his charge in December, 1853.

December 12, 1854, Rev. J. A. Hood, of Salem, Mass., was installed pastor. His ministry extended over a period of seven and a half years, during which time seventy-seven were added to the church,—fifty-four on confession of faith. A revival in the latter part of 1856 brought thirty-five into the church at one time. To Mr. Hood we are indebted for the historical sketch in the "Church Manual" and other matters of historic interest which appear in the records kept by him.

In 1861, Thomas Berry presented the society with a tower clock and R. L. French with a bell.

Mr. Hood's labors terminated in July, 1862. On the 30th of November, 1865, Mr. L. Z. Ferris, who had previously supplied the pulpit, was ordained and installed pastor. His ministry covered a period of nearly five years, during which twenty-one united with the church. He was dismissed in February, 1870, and on the 21st of December of the same year Rev. H. A. Hazen was installed pastor. During this year the house of worship was repaired, and the next year the Ladies' Sewing Society took measures to build a vestry,—a praiseworthy undertaking, which drew about a thousand dollars from their treasury.

Mr. Hazen's pastorate of nearly two years terminated in November, 1872.

For more than a year following the church had no regular supply. In the middle of the year 1874, Rev. S. S. N. Greeley, of Gilmanton, supplied the pulpit a few Sabbaths, and his preaching gave such satisfaction that his services were continued for four and a half years. He neither assumed nor presented the distinctive work of a pastor, residing as he did out of town and giving his efforts mainly to the special work of preaching. This work he enjoyed, not caring in his later years to take upon himself the responsibilities and burdens of a parish.

In the fall of the year 1875 the Young Men's Christian Association commenced a good work in the village, followed by Mr. Fowler, the evangelist. A powerful revival attended his labors and, as a result, forty-two were added to the church.

During Mr. Greeley's ministry forty-nine united with the church, all but seven by profession.

The church, so richly blessed spiritually, soon met with a heavy loss. A great fire broke out on the night of February 14, 1876, and on the morning of the next day the house wherein fathers and children for three generations had worshipped, and about which clustered so many precious memories, was destroyed.

There was deep sorrow over the loss, but there was also a resolute determination to make good the same; and with courage and faith the people at once addressed themselves to the work of building a new house of worship. A warrant was posted on the 28th of February, out of the very ashes, as it were, calling the society together, March 13th, when it was promptly voted "to build on the old site," and a building committee was appointed, consisting of Messrs. W. H. Berry, R. L. French, W. C. Adams, J. W. Johnston and John Waldo. Subsequently, May 4, 1876, this committee were instructed "to build a new church and vestry." At this very meeting it was voted to raise one thousand dollars for preaching the ensuing year. That was a time of pluck and of consecration.

Soon the débris of the ruins was cleared, the foundations were laid and the walls began to rise, the church in the mean time worshipping in the Grand Army Hall, kindly tendered them by the W. K. Cobb, Post 29. How well the committee executed their trust, let the building itself tell,—substantial and convenient as it is in its arrangements, harmonious in its proportions, and with its commodious-chapel and ladies' room, leaving scarcely anything to be desired, at a cost of a little over thirteen thousand dollars they erected one of the most comely church edifices in the State. The money was raised from the insurance on the old house, by the proceeds of the sale of pews and by generous subscriptions, two members of the church and society giving one thousand dollars each, namely, John L. Thorndike and John True. The beautiful and sweet-toned organ, as well as the carpet and cushions, was procured through the efforts of the Ladies' Benevolent Society. The clock on the tower was the gift of John L. French, Esq., and the bell, recast from the metal of the old bell melted in the fire, was presented by the original donor, Hon. R. L. French.

On the 13th of February, 1878, just two days less than one year from the destruction of the old meeting-house, the new building was dedicated free from debt to the worship of the Triune God. The sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Greeley and the dedicatory prayer was offered by Rev. S. L. Blake, of Concord.

On the 24 of May, 1879, Rev. John W. Colwell became acting pastor of the church, and continued till January 30, 1881, during which period the spiritual life of the church was steadily and healthfully developed, twenty having been received into the church,—ten on confession of faith and ten by letter.

In the month of June, 1879, there was a great temperance awakening throughout the town, as a result of which nearly a thousand persons signed the pledge.

The ninetieth anniversary of the church, which took place November 16, 1879, was an enjoyable and memorable occasion. A discourse was preached in the morning by Rev. Mr. Colwell, followed by a union communion service in the afternoon and a union praise service in the evening. All of these meetings were largely attended. On the following Monday evening there was a social gathering of the church and congregation in the chapel, a bountiful entertainment being provided by the ladies. (To Mr. Colwell's excellent anniversary sermon on that occasion we are indebted for the greater part of the materials for this sketch.)

On the 29th of June, 1881, Rev. Geo. E. Hill, the present pastor, was duly installed by council; the sermon preached by Rev. W. V. W. Davis, of Manchester; installing prayer by Rev. Jeremiah Blake; charge to the pastor by Rev. Lyman White; right hand of fellowship by Rev. C. E. Harrington; and address to the people by Rev. S. S. N. Greeley.

During Mr. Hill's ministry, up to the present time of writing, twenty persons have united with the church,—thirteen by profession and seven by letter.

The total membership of the church from its organization to this date, July 1, 1885, is five hundred and twenty. The present membership is one hundred and fifty-one,—males, forty-eight; females, one hundred and three. One hundred and eighty-one children have received Christian baptism.

The names of the several deacons of the church are as follows: Jonathan Perkins, who was chosen in 1789 and served forty years; Edward Berry and Ebenezer Prescott, chosen in 1828; Dr. Jonathan C. Prescott in 1839; John L. Thorndike in 1844; Reuben L. French in 1855; William C. Adams in 1856; Edward J. Aiken in 1877; John W. Johnston in 1881; Stephen R. Watson and M. Harvey Nutter in 1885. Deacon Adams, the present senior deacon, has served in this capacity nearly thirty years.

The Sabbath-school was organized about the year 1818. John L. Thorndike was its first superintendent and held the office for sixteen years. He was succeeded by Dr. Jeremiah Blake. Since then the successive superintendents have been as follows: Nehemiah Berry, Dr. Charles T. Berry, Rev. J. A. Hood, R. L. French, William P. Adams, J. W. Johnson, M. Harvey Nutter and John S. Rand.

The number of scholars and teachers registered during the present year is two hundred. The Sunday-school has proved a powerful auxiliary to the church, and many from its ranks have entered the fold of the Good Shepherd.

The church has been liberal in its contributions to the support of home and foreign missions and the general Christian work at home and abroad. During the ninety-six years of its history it has given over eighty thousand dollars for church-building purposes, for preaching and benevolent objects. The Ladies' Benevolent Society deserves honorable mention in this connection for its warm sympathy and self-sacrificing devotion to the church and for its efforts in helping the poor and needy.

This church has ever been Congregational in its spirit and practice, managing its own affairs without dictation from any extraneous human authority and governed by the will of the majority of its members, who look to Christ alone as their head.

Weekly devotional meetings have been sustained from the beginning almost without interruption, and though the spiritual life of the church has fluctuated at times, the fire on the altar has never been suffered to go out.

May its future be even more bright than the past! "Peace be within her walls and prosperity within her palaces."

Free-Will Baptist Church.—From the earliest records of this church now extant we learn that prior to February 3, 1791, "the people who called themselves Free-Will Baptists formally covenanted with God and one another to accept Christ as their own Lord and Law-giver, and they were worshiping in two places as two bodies; but on the above date representatives of the two bodies met in council and agreed to write a new church covenant or spiritual agreement, to which the following persons subscribed their names: Robert Dickey, Thomas Blake, Joseph Towle, David Knowlton, Joseph Mason, Mary Knowlton, Elizabeth Towle, and from this date and meeting the church dates its birth." Immediately preceding this date there was an extensive reformation in and around the town of Pittsfield, in which Benjamin Randall, Joseph Bovey, David Knowlton, Isaac Townsend and John Buzzell were the principal workers.

On October 15, 1791, at an adjourned monthly meeting, the church voted to donate to Benjamin Randall one pound and four shillings in money or corn.

The first record of administering the Lord's Supper was on the Lord's Day following December 19, 1791, Daniel Philbrick officiating.

The first record of delegates to New Durham Quarterly Meeting were David Knowlton, Daniel Philbrick; meeting held at Barnstead.

June 3, 1792, David Knowlton, Thomas Blake, Nathaniel Chase and Perkins Philbrick were chosen to attend as delegates the New Hampshire Yearly Meeting at New Durham.

August 12, 1795, David Knowlton was ordained to preach the gospel by a council consisting of John Buzzell, Daniel Lord, Joseph Bovey and Benjamin Randall.

Among the ministers who labored for this church in its early history we find the following names: David Knowlton, Samuel B. Dyer, — Bickford, Ezekiel True, Silas Bean, Ebenezer Knowlton and John Knowles.

May 7, 1831, David Marks being present at the regular monthly meeting, preached a sermon.

On May 2, 1838, another church was organized and known as the Second Free-Will Baptist Church of Pittsfield, until a. d. 1840, October 18th, when the First Church having lost its visibility, by a vote of the church, its title was changed and called the First Free-Will Baptist Church. It was organized in the hall of Stephen W. Libbey. The council consisted of Elders Enoch Place and Daniel P. Cilley, who adopted a constitution and church covenant, which was signed by the following-named persons, viz.: Stephen W. Libbey, Levi True, True Norris, Thomas Smith, Nehemiah Chase, Shurburne Greene, Newell Brown, Enoch Page, Joseph D. Emerson, Solomon Sanders, John D. Williard, Belinda A. Savory, Eliza Smith, Abigail Green, Dorothy Blake, Mary J. Chase, Mary T. Brown, Lucy Page, Judith Chase, Nancy Dennett, Rebecca B. Langly, Lois B. Langly, Melitable L. Dow and Hannah Merrill. All of the above-named persons have gone to their reward, except Elder Daniel P. Cilley and Dorothy Blake (now

William V. Tuttle

Mrs. Andrew J. Young), Mrs. Hannah Morrill having died in 1884.

The whole number of members of this church from its organization in 1838 is five hundred and forty-three; present membership, one hundred and sixty-five; well united and enjoying a healthy and strong growth; at peace with all the other churches and pastors of the town and desiring the prosperity of all.

This church became a member of the New Durham Quarterly Meeting May 25, 1838.

First pastor was Rev. D. P. Cilley, from March 2, 1839, to March, 1843. He was followed by Rev. J. E. Davis, May, 1843, to October, 1846; Rev. Ezekiel True, July, 1847, to May, 1851; Rev. Silas Curtis, November 5, 1852, to November, 1856; Rev. Hosea Quinby, February, 1857, to September, 1860; Rev. J. B. Davis, October 4, 1862, to June 6, 1863; Rev. H. F. Saow, February, 1864, to —, —; Rev. B. F. Pritchard, August 7, 1866, to July, 1867; Rev. E. A. Stockman, May 2, 1868, to September 25, 1870; Rev. A. Deering, April 1, 1871, to —, 1874; Rev. Hosea Quinby, January 9, 1875, to April, 1876; Rev. George S. Hill, July, 1876, to December, 1876; Rev. F. E. Davison, March 7, 1877, to January, 1878; Rev. J. C. Osgood, April 1, 1878, to April 1, 1882; Rev. A. J. Eastman, May 1, 1882, to May 1, 1885; Rev. E. P. Moulton, May 1, 1885, the present pastor.

The meeting-house now occupied was completed in 1838 and dedicated December 12, 1838. Dedicatory sermon by Elder Daniel P. Cilley.

The house was enlarged and remodeled in 1852 at an expense of twelve hundred dollars. Re-dedicated August 4, 1853. Sermon by Elder Silas Curtis.

The Free-Will Baptist Sunday-School was organized November 20, 1853, by Rev. Silas Curtis, John S. Osborn and others.

Ezra C. Willard was the first superintendent of the school; John S. Osborn the first clerk, holding the office twenty years and for many years a teacher in the school, deacon and church clerk; John Smith was an active, earnest laborer in the Sunday-school, also deacon and church clerk. The last two brethren have gone to their long home,—Brother Smith having died January 2, 1884; Brother Osborn, June 22, 1885.

The whole number of superintendents to date, eleven; the present incumbent, John T. Hill, having served nine years. Dudley B. S. Adams served as clerk seven years and is now at rest. L. D. Muchmore is the present clerk.

The average number of scholars during its existence is eighty-two and a half; present number, one hundred and ninety. It has a library of four hundred volumes. Within its wheel is a "Band of Hope" (twenty missionary workers), who are contributing twenty-five dollars toward supporting a school in India.

An Episcopal Mission was established here some years since, but has been practically abandoned. There is also a Baptist Church and an Advent Church here, but we have been unable to secure any information concerning them.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HON. HIRAM A. TUTTLE.¹

Hon. Hiram A. Tuttle was born in Barnstead, October 16, 1837, being the elder of a family of two sons. His father, George Tuttle, and his grandfather, Colonel John Tuttle, were also natives of the same town. His great-grandfather, John Tuttle, settled in Barnstead in 1776, coming there from that locality in Dover known as "Back River," where a part of the Tuttle family had resided since the settlement there of their emigrant ancestor, John Tuttle, who came from England before 1641.

His mother, Judith Mason (Davis) Tuttle, is a descendant from Samuel Davis, a soldier of the Revolution, and one of the primeval settlers of Barnstead. Brave soldiers of the Davis family from four generations have represented that town in the four great wars in which the country has been engaged.

When Mr. Tuttle was nine years of age he moved with his father's family to the adjoining town of Pittsfield, where he attended the public schools and Pittsfield Academy, while the latter was under the charge successively of I. F. Folsom, Lewis W. Clark and Professor Dyer H. Sanborn.

After having been engaged in several vocations, in all of which he showed industry and faithfulness, at the age of seventeen years he became connected with the clothing establishment of Lincoln & Shaw, of Concord, where he remained several years. The ability and zeal which he exhibited while there won for him the confidence and respect of his employers, who established him in the management of a branch store in Pittsfield, of which he soon became the proprietor. His business increased, gradually at first and then rapidly, till his establishment had gained an extensive patronage, and ranked among the largest clothing houses in the State. It is so favorably remembered by former residents and patrons that orders are received for goods from distant States and Territories. Mr. Tuttle has also been interested in real estate. He has built many dwelling-houses, including a fine residence for himself, and the best business buildings in the village. He was one of the prime movers in organizing the Pittsfield Aqueduct Company, which furnishes an abundance of pure water to the village for domestic and fire purposes, and subscribed for a large part of its capital stock. In many ways he has promoted the growth, social and business interests and general prosperity of his adopted town. He is a trustee of the Savings Bank, a director of the National Bank and a trustee of the academy in Pittsfield.

When he had attained his majority, in 1859, he expressed his intention of casting his first vote with the Republicans, although all his relatives belong to the Democratic party. The Democrats of Pittsfield had been victorious and powerful since the days of Jackson, under such distinguished leaders as Moses Norris, Jr., Charles H. Butters and Lewis W. Clark, all being able lawyers, impressive public speakers and having popular manners. Mr. Norris, a native of the town, represented it repeatedly in the Legislature, was Speaker of the House twice, a councillor, representative in Congress four years, and was elected to the United States Senate for six years while residing here. The ability and courteous manners of Mr. Clark (now Judge Lewis W. Clark) made him no less popular than Mr. Norris with all classes, during the shorter time he was in business life in town. Seeing in young Tuttle qualities that might make him troublesome if opposed to them, but useful if in accord with their party, the Democrats used their most eminent persuasive powers to induce him to cleave to the party of all his kindred and vote with the hitherto victorious; but he obeyed his convictions, and remained true to the Republican party. In 1860 the Republicans, though so long hopelessly beaten, made a sharp contest. When the day of election came Mr. Clark was elected moderator, having been a most acceptable presiding officer for several years. The election of town clerk was made the test of the strength of the two parties. After a very exciting ballot, Mr. Tuttle was elected town clerk, and the Democrats were beaten for the first time in thirty-three years.

Although Pittsfield has a Democratic majority under normal circumstances, Mr. Tuttle has received the support of a large majority of its votes at times when his name has been presented for position. In 1873 and 1874 he was representative to the Legislature. In 1876 he received an appointment, with the rank of colonel, on the staff of Governor Cheney, and with the Governor and staff visited the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia. He was elected a member of the Executive Council from the Second District in 1878, and was re-elected in 1879, under the new Constitution, for the term of two years.

Mr. Tuttle has been very successful in all that he has undertaken; but his thrift has never made him arrogant or indifferent. He has cheerfully shared with others the results of the good fortune that Providence has granted him. He is an agreeable and companionable gentleman in all the honorable relations of life.

As a citizen, neighbor and friend he is held in the highest estimation.

He has furnished employment for many and has been kind to the poor, very respectful to the aged, charitable to the erring and a sympathizing helper of the embarrassed and unfortunate. Few men have more or firmer personal friends, whose friendship is founded on kindness and substantial favors received. He gives with remarkable generosity to all charitable objects presented to him, and is very hospitable in his pleasant home. Mr. Tuttle accepts the Christian religion and worships with the Congregational Church. While he contributes very liberally for the support of the denomination of his choice, he does not withhold a helping hand from the other religious sects in his town.

In his domestic relations he has been very fortunate. He married, in 1859, Miss Mary C. French, the only child of John L. French, Esq., formerly cashier of the Pittsfield Bank. Their only child—Hattie French Tuttle—born January 17, 1861, was educated at Wellesley College.

DR. RICHARD PERLEY JEWETT TENNEY.

Dr. R. P. J. Tenney was born in Loudon, N. H., August 18, 1810. His father, Dr. William Tenney, was a native of Rowley, Mass., and a descendant of Thomas Tenney, a member of one of the forty Puritan families who, with their pastor, Rev. Ezekiel Rogers, came from Rowley, Yorkshire, England, in 1639, and settled that ancient town. After studying medicine with Dr. Amos Spofford, of Rowley, he settled in Loudon, N. H., about 1790, where for more than thirty years he was a popular and prominent physician.

Dr. Tenney, the younger, was, at the age of fourteen years, deprived by the death of his father of that paternal counsel and guidance so necessary in that critical period of life when the foundation of moral and business habits is laid, and called to assist a widowed mother in the care of two brothers and a sister, all younger than himself. He discharged his increased filial and fraternal duties in a commendable manner.

Although it had been the often-expressed design of his father that neither of his sons should encounter the hardships incident to the life of a country physician, after a preparatory course at Gilmanton Academy, he studied medicine at Gilmanton under the direction of Dr. Asa Crosby, founder of that distinguished medical family whose labors have reflected so much of honor on society, college and State. He attended medical lectures at Harvard in 1829; at Dartmouth, 1830 and 1831, and took his medical degree from the latter college at the close of the lecture term of 1831, being then but twenty-one years of age. He soon after settled in Loudon, where, with earnest devotion to his profession, and aided by the prestige of his father, he rapidly acquired a good practice.

After sixteen years of his professional life being spent in the town of his nativity, he moved to the neighboring town of Pittsfield, and immediately entered upon a large business there, still retaining most of his former patrons. With duties thus augmented, the remainder of his life was exceedingly busy and laborious.

Dr. Tenney became a Fellow of the New Hampshire Medical Society in 1836, and was the oldest living member, except Dr. Ezra Carter, of Concord, who was admitted in 1826. He was called to various positions of honor in the society. With Dr. C. P. Gage, he represented it in the convention held in New York City in 1846, at which the American Medical Association was formed. He was elected president of the society in 1867.

As a physician, Dr. Tenney was successful, whether his professional labor be judged by the amount performed, methods used or results obtained. He was in the habit of taking charge of patients in more than a dozen towns. We have the best authority for the statement that his average time of sleep did not exceed five hours in the twenty-four, and he was never idle. It would seem almost impossible for one to do more than he did during a large part of his business life.

One of the earliest to discard that treatment known as heroic, which prevailed when he began to prescribe, he adopted milder means, which were certainly very acceptable to his patients, and which soon became reasonable to his medical associates.

He had a very happy manner in dealing with his patients, and wonderful power to inspire confidence in them. "The way he entered my sick-room was medicine to me," said an intelligent lawyer, whose family physician he had been during his whole medical career. Often called as consulting physician, he was faithful and assuring both to patients and physicians—especially to young physicians. He never affected superior knowledge or experience; never obtruded his opinions; never boasted and seldom mentioned his fortunate cases, but frankly gave such clear and practical advice as made his counsel very desirable. Attending to all branches of the profession, and answering calls at all times, he shirked no duty, however disagreeable, and seldom excused himself, but treated each case conscientiously, using his utmost ability. The rich and the poor, the thankful and the ungrateful, seemed to receive uniform consideration and kindness at his hands.

While he preferred the practice of medicine, he never avoided surgical cases when duty or humanity called, but did many creditable things in this branch. He would generously share the difficult and legally dangerous surgical responsibilities of other physicians which he might well have avoided. In obstetric practice he was singularly fortunate. He stated, a few weeks prior to his death, that he had attended two thousand four hundred births. His records were carefully kept. For many years he held the position of pension surgeon and examined applicants from a large territory.

As a citizen, Dr. Tenney was justly esteemed and beloved by all classes, for he was always ready to lend a helping hand to any movement that tended to relieve, reclaim or elevate his fellow-men.

The prominent traits of his character were industry, courtesy and generosity. Though so busy, he never was in such haste that he would not give attentive audience to all who approached him, and careful consideration to wants expressed. Those who knew him confidently counted before-hand on a liberal donation to any benevolent or worthy object presented to him. None who came to him for assistance went away with empty hand. With his numerous debtors he dealt in the most indulgent manner. He acted as though he fully believed the Divine declaration, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Although his time was so fully occupied with professional engagements, yet he faithfully discharged the duties of every public trust which he assumed. He was connected with both the banks in Pittsfield, was president of the trustees of Pittsfield Academy, and also for many years president of the Suncook Branch of the New Hampshire Bible Society.

During the eventful years of 1861, '62 and '63 he was a member of the Executive Council in the administration of Governor Berry. Dr. Tenney was very happy in his domestic relations. He was married (1834) to Hannah A. Sanborn, of Gilmanton, N. H., a sister of Professor E. D. Sanborn, of Dartmouth College. She, with their only child, a widowed daughter, survives him.

Soon after commencing the practice of medicine Dr. Tenney made a public profession of religion, and united with the Congregational Church, in which he was an active worker, and to the support of which he contributed liberally of his means for many years. During the last fifteen years of his life he was of the Episcopal communion, and was one of the chief movers in erecting the chapel and establishing the parish of St. Stephen in Pittsfield, of which he was a generous supporter and a warden at the time of his death.

Dr. Tenney loved peace, and would make great personal sacrifice to avoid contention or controversy. Although extremely sensitive to unkindness, he seemed almost incapable of retaliation, or even resentment. He had an easy and becoming dignity, and was a thorough gentleman in all his words and acts, a position from which he could not be surprised.

Though his thoughts were carefully expressed, he was not a great talker, but, what is much more rare, a patient and excellent listener. He dispensed a liberal hospitality, and delighted in entertaining his guests.

He was so healthy and vigorous that he took no vacation for one period of twenty years; and he was detained from business but very little by accident or illness until the last few weeks of his life.

He died June 16, 1876, after a painful illness of some weeks' duration. He looked certain death in the face for weeks, with unimpaired reason, thoughtfully and trustingly. While passing through this terrible ordeal he seemed to comprehend his situation as fully as it is given to mortals to ween, without showing fear or mental agitation.

His manner was calm and manly. "Waiting for Jesus," was his frequent reply to salutation and inquiry. After more than forty days of severest suffering his prostration had become so great that evidence of pain ceased, reason left its seat, and he lay many hours in a quiet, unconscious state, and, without a struggle, passed calmly away.

"His sufferings ended with the day,
Yet lived he at its close,
And breathed the long, long night away,
In statue-like repose.

"But e'er the sun in all his glory
Illumed the eastern skies,
He passed through glory's morning gate,
And walked in Paradise."¹

BENJAMIN EMERSON, ESQ.

In the days long gone, when the courts held their terms in Gilmanton, there were lawyers toward whom the eyes of the children turned with wondering interest. They contended one against another with force and eloquence, and carried "green bags," in which our childhood imagined was deposited their ammunition. Later knowledge discovers they were "briefs," undoubtedly of precious worth; "skeletons" of their "sermons," or pleadings, and to be found of solid worth to their clients before their causes were adjusted. Well we remember the giant form and towering intellect of Jeremiah Mason, the profound lawyer; the keen, logical Ichabod Bartlett; and the strong man, deeply read and of high standing in the profession, Daniel Christie. Then there were the acute lawyers, Stephen Moody, Lyman B. Walker, Benjamin Emerson, and younger men who were seeking after the success and fame of their elder brethren.

Benjamin Emerson was born in Alfred, Me., March 20, 1792. He was the son of Joseph and Lydia (Durrell) Emerson, who was daughter of Benjamin and Judith Durrell, and was born December 26, 1748. Benjamin was educated at the common schools of his native village, and then fitted for college at Berwick Academy, South Berwick, Me. He entered Dartmouth College and graduated from that institution in the class of 1816. Many of the members of this class became eminent men in after-years, and of twenty-four who composed the graduating class that year, ten were still living when, in 1866, they held a semi-centennial reunion, and among the number was Esq. Benjamin Emerson.

He married, first, Mrs. Rebecca (Story) Porter, a daughter of Rev. Isaac and Rebecca Bradstreet Story, of Marblehead, Mass., and widow of Emerson Porter. They were married June 6, 1845. He married his second wife January 31, 1847, Miss Frances Leighton, daughter of General Samuel and Frances Leighton, of Eliot, Me., but at that time resident of Alfred, Me. Esq. Emerson lived through busy years to an advanced age, from an early life of bodily feebleness. Immediately after his graduation at Dartmouth he went to Gilmanton and engaged in the practice of law.

He was admitted to the bar in 1822; was repeatedly moderator of the town-meeting; was four sessions representative of the town; was one of the selectmen, and in a variety of positions was prominent and useful. A year or so after his second marriage he removed to Pittsfield, where his subsequent life was spent.

As a business man he was successful, and accumulated a handsome property, continuing his legal practice, more or less, nearly to the time of his death. He was selectman and held various town offices in Pittsfield; was a director of the Pittsfield Bank for many years. The Suncook Valley Railroad had in him a strong advocate, so also the Pittsfield Water-works—a late grand improvement in the town. Mr. Emerson was an able speaker, and his powerful words were ever ready in behalf of every cause or enterprise for the good of the people. Politically, he was an Old-Line Whig, and upon the organization of the Republican party he gave to that his earnest and hearty support. Mr. Emerson was a member of the Congregational Church at Gilmanton Iron-Works; afterward of the church in Pittsfield. In the little meetings for social worship, and, at times, in crowded assemblies, his utterances for truth and righteousness were bold and impressive. Mr. Emerson was a studious, thoughtful man, possessed a remarkable memory, and, by a varied course of reading and study, kept himself always abreast of the times.

It was by the unanticipated Sabbath supply of the church in Pittsfield for four years, and occasional tarrying among its pleasant families, that the writer of this sketch had renewal of knowledge of Esq. Emerson. He was frequently with him in his last brief sickness, and with him when his feet were stepping down into the cold river. There was noticeable the lawyer's critical, searching investigation of the "evidence," the characteristics and valid grounds of a genuine faith and hope, and of reading "a title clear" to a heavenly inheritance. Mr. Emerson was long a Free and Accepted member of the Masonic fraternity. His death took place at his home in Pittsfield, January 23, 1878, and his interment in the ancient cemetery in Gilmanton, at the "old Smith Meeting-House."

¹The above sketch of Dr. Tenney's life is abridged and adapted from a memoir by Dr. John Wheeler, of Pittsfield, and contributed by him to the New Hampshire Medical Society at its annual meeting June 19, 1877.

Benjamin Emerson

Mrs. Emerson's brother, Dr. Usher P. Leighton, became a celebrated physician in Ohio, and "was one of the most noble and generous of men." The Leightons of this country are descended from three brothers who came from England in 1650. Two of them settled on the Piscataqua and the other at Plymouth.

From these all of the Leightons are descended. Samuel Leighton, the progenitor of this branch, was an officer in the Revolutionary army. His son, General Samuel Leighton, of militia fame, was several terms a member of the Legislature of Massachusetts.

HISTORY OF SALISBURY.

BY JOHN J. DEARBORN, M.D., TOWN HISTORIAN.

CHAPTER I.

THE name Salisbury is derived from the Latin salus, which signifies safety, or health, and the Anglo-Saxon "bury," or "burgh," a corporate town, —hence, the town of health and safety. It was named directly from Salisbury, Mass., which was so called from Salisbury, England.

It is situated in latitude 43° 23', on the west bank of the Merrimack and Pemigewasset Rivers, sixteen miles north of Concord and eighty miles from Boston. It was originally bounded north by Andover, east by the rivers, above named, south by Boscawen and Warner, west by Warner and what was Kearsarge Gore, and contains twenty-eight thousand six hundred acres.

The town has produced more brains than any other municipality in New Hampshire, other things being equal. There are three, perhaps four, hamlets in the town, but the main dependence of her people has always been upon the native products of the soil.

For many years her hardy and fearless settlers were the pioneers of civilization, repelled the assaults of savage beasts and more savage men, defended their rude dwellings "from violence and destruction," and bared their brows to the tomahawk and scalping-knife and their breasts to the Indian bullet. "Through the fire and blood of a seven years' Revolutionary war" her sons shrank from "no toil and no danger" that they might establish a free country. For several years after its settlement there rose no smoke from the habitation of any white man between Salisbury and the settlements on the rivers of Canada. Her women were slain by the tomahawk, and her men and maidens ambushed, seized, made to run the gauntlet and carried away into captivity; while the inhabitants of other towns were obliged to abandon their recently-made homes, the stalwart inhabitants of Salisbury stood firm, built their cabins and defended them.

When Philip Call, Nathaniel Maloon, Jacob Morrill, Ephraim Collins, Samuel Scribner, Robert Barber, John Bowen, Jonathan Greeley, John and Ebenezer Webster, Andrew Bohanon and Edward Eastman and their associates built their rude dwellings in Salisbury (then Stevestown) they formed the exposed picket-line in this State, and they maintained it till the peace of 1763, notwithstanding Nathaniel

Maloon, his wife and three children were seized by the Indians and carried to Canada and sold into captivity, and the wife of Philip Call was murdered, and Samuel Scribner and Robert Barber were also captured and sold into captivity.

In the cause of religion Salisbury was equal to any other town in the State, and in 1773, Rev. Jonathan Searle settled over the Congregational Church, which church has continued to this day. Long before Concord made a move Salisbury had established an academy, which was one of the noted institutions of learning in the State. When the Merrimack County Agricultural Society was formed, in 1824, Salisbury furnished more members than any other town, and their first gathering was at Salisbury.

When we speak of great men, how illustrious does this noble old town appear! what a roll of honor does she furnish! The Websters, the Bartletts, the Pettengills, the Eastmans, the Haddockes, the Pingrees, the Smiths, the Gales, the Sawyers and the Greeleys. Thomas W. Thompson, Richard Fletcher, Parker Noyes, Israel W. Kelley, George W. Nesmith, Samuel I. Wells and Thomas Worcester became her citizens by adoption. There has been but one man who gained the title of "Defender of the Constitution," and he was born and reared in Salisbury. Hon. Ichabod Bartlett, Ezekiel Webster, Charles B. Haddock, Joel Eastman, Samuel C. Bartlett (the learned president of Dartmouth College), William H. Bartlett, Samuel E. Pingry (present Governor of Vermont), all were natives of the town, and for a list of other noted men the reader is referred to the collegiate record.

Natural Description.—The original growth of wood on land adjacent to the rivers was pitch, Norway and white pine, with occasional elms, maples and birches; on the uplands all the native hard woods were found. The soil is strong, deep and bony, with a substratum of pan.

RIVERS.—The east part of the town is watered by the Pemigewasset and Merrimack. Blackwater passes through the western part of the town, from north to south, forming a large bay which abounds with a variety of fish.

A considerable portion of Kearsarge Mountain is within the bounds of Salisbury.

HILLS.—Searle's (and called "Mount Pisgah" by Daniel Webster) is near the centre of the old town. On its top was located the first church, and its top was the scene of the alarm-fires kindled as signals in the perilous days of the pioneers. The other hills are Loverin's, Culef, Bean, Bald, Smith's and Raceoon.

PONDS AND BROOKS.—Tucker's Pond is the largest body of water within the limits of the town. Greenough's and Wilder's Ponds complete the list. Bog or Banley, Chance Pond, Stirrup Iron, Punch and Wig-wag Brooks are the principal small streams.

MINERALS AND ROCKS.—The rocks are mostly Montalban and Simonite. A species of bog-ore, containing iron, also exists. The mineralogy of Keursarge is Andalusite and tourmaline. Tripoli is found in large quantities. Plumbago exists in several sections of the town. Silver exists in small quantities. There is also a huge boulder foreign to this section. Its dimensions are fifty-seven feet in length, twenty-six in height, and a circumference of one hundred and fifty feet.

Bakerstown.—It was the policy of Massachusetts, during the pendency of the boundary question, to confer grants in the disputed territory on soldiers who had been engaged in the French and Indian Wars. The records of the General Court of Massachusetts indicate that John Tyler, Joseph Pike and others presented a request "for two townships to be granted to the officers and soldiers of the companies under command of the late Captain John March, Captain Stephen Greenleaf and Captain Philip Nelson (deceased)."

The General Court answered their petition by granting them two tracts of land, one of which included the town of Salisbury, and it is not known where the other was located.

The date of the grant was February 3, 1736. Richard Hazen, as surveyor, laid out the township to contain six squares miles, which was divided between fifty-nine grantees or proprietors. It does not appear that the charter was accepted so far as Bakerstown was concerned. The grant was named Bakerstown in honor of Captain Thomas Baker, who, in 1729, killed the Sachem Waternumus by the rapid stream now called Baker's River, at Plymouth.

Steventown.—As we have seen, the grantees of Bakerstown failed to comply with the terms of their grant. The boundary question had been settled and Massachusetts had no title to the territory, and the Masonian proprietors were the rightful possessors. In the month of December, 1748, these proprietors granted the same territory to other parties than the original grantees, as appears by the Proprietors' Records.—

"PROVINCE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

"At a meeting of the Proprietors of Lands purchased of John Tutton Mason, Esq., in the Province of New Hampshire, held at the dwelling-house of Sarah Priest, widow, in Portsmouth, in said Province, on Wednesday the seventh day of December, 1748, by adjournment,

"Voted, That Ebenezer Stevens, Esq., & associates have a Township equal to six miles square, beginning on the north of Centre creek (Boscawen), in the most convenient form, without interline, with the Township called No. One (Waller), as the Grantors shall think proper.

"John J. DORR, Esq., Clerk."

Following are the names of the grantees. A copy of this grant and the grant of Massachusetts, by the name of Bakerstown, and other matters pertaining to this subject will be found in J. J. Darborn's "History of Salisbury," now in press. The grant bears date of Wednesday, the 26th day of October, 1749.

"Ebenezer Stevens, Ebenezer Page, Samuel Bean, Benjamin Stevens, Nathan Sweett, Elisha Winslow, Moses Quimby, Joshua Woodman, John Hutton, Jedediah Philbrick, Thomas Newman, Samuel Colcord, Jonathan Greeley, Jr., Joseph Eastman, Jr., John Fifield, Jr., Henry Merrill, William Coffe, John Hutton, Jr., John Ladd, Jr., Benjamin Wadleigh, Nathaniel Ladd, Ebenezer Stevens, Jr., Elisha Sweett, Samuel Sanborn, John Darling, Jr., Samuel Webster, John Currier, Samuel Winslow, Jr., Humphrey Hook, Jacob Quimby, Jonathan Greeley, Tristram Sanborn, Jr., Ebenezer Long, Abrahm Greene, Joseph Bean, Jr., Tristram Quimby, Benjamin Ladd, Jeremiah Philbrick, The Rev. Joseph Secombe, James Tappan, Tristram Sanborn, terris, Peter Sanborn, Captain Joseph Greeley, William Russell, terris, Nathaniel Hutton, Samuel Eastman, Jr., Samuel Fifield, Joseph Clifford, Ebenezer Eastman, Jeremiah Webster, Jonathan Sanborn, Ephraim Collins, Joshua Webster, Samuel Stevens, all of Kingston in said Province; Peter Ayer, of Haverhill, Jabez True and David Greeley, both of Salisbury (Mass.); Benjamin Sanborn, of Kingston aforesd., Philip Call being in on part of the land hereunto mentioned, and Peter Deborn, of Chester."

The grantees were in earnest to commence a settlement, and on October 25, 1749, issued a call for their first meeting, at which time all the necessary officers were chosen. Meetings were held as occasion required, and annually town officers were elected until the incorporation of the town. In 1752 it was voted to "plow twelve acres of land," and in the year following (1753) the proprietors voted to build four houses. This year the Indian depredations were such as to call on the State for a guard to protect the inhabitants.

In the year 1759 land was granted to Captain John Webster for building a saw-mill.

MAJOR EBENEZER STEVENS, for whom the town was named, was the first grantee and a prominent man in Kingston, where he died November 1, 1749. He was for several years a member of the Assembly, and four or five years Speaker of that body, from 1743 to 1747. It was through his influence that Ebenezer Webster, the father of Daniel, located here.

In addition to the early settlers on page 602, we find Benjamin Sanborn, William Silloway, Henry Merrill, Tristram Quimby, Jacob Quimby, James Tappan, William Newton, John Jenison, John Bawley (Burleigh), David Hall, John Fifield, Jr., John Hutton, Joseph Bean, Jr., Jabez True, Daniel Greeley and Tristram Sanborn.

Incorporation of the Town.—Immediately after the passage of the act of 1766 to enable the proprietors of Steventown to raise money by a direct tax, to carry on the settlement of the town and defray the necessary expenses, a petition was presented by residents in the township to His Excellency the Governor for an act of incorporation.

On the 1st day of March, 1768, Governor Wentworth, in the name of King George the Third, declared and ordained the township called Steventown to be a town corporate, vested and incorporated into a body politic by the name of Salisbury. The first town-meeting, held on the first Tuesday in April, chose officers and transacted all necessary business.

The Association Test.—The articles of which we trust all the readers are sufficiently acquainted with; therefore will not enter into detail. The signers are:

“ Ebenezer Johnson, Benben Greeley, Job Heath, Samuel Scribner, William Sabin, Phineas Bean, John Collins, Benjamin Bean, John Jenison, John Sanborn, Moses Atkins, Robert Smith, Leonard Jenkins, Shubel Greeley, David Pettengill, William Webster, John Fitch, Jeremiah Webster, Ephraim Heath, Nathaniel Maloon, Iddo Scribner, Benj. Scribner, John Challice, Ephraim Colby, Andrew Babonon, Moses Selley, Joseph French, John Bowen, Daniel Samoil, Robert Barber, Ebenezer Clifford, Abel Elkins, Dan. Warren, Jacob True, Rev. Jonathan Searle, Andrew Pettengill, Jonathan Fitch, Benjamin Hinton, Joseph Bartlett, Jacob Garland, William Searle, Edward Fitch, Ezra Tucker, Hezekiah Foster, John Bean, Edward Scribner, Joseph Marston, Benjamin Greeley, John Webster, Jr., Amariah Babonon, Gideon Dow, Stephen Lull, Benjamin Sanborn, John Webster, Nathaniel Marston, Rowland Root, Abraham Fitch, Cutting Stevens, John Tule, Ebenezer Webster, William Cabot, Edward Eastman, Jonathan Cram, John Row, William Eastman, Abel Tandy, Moses Garland, Eben Tucker, Nathaniel Maloon, Jr., Obadiah Peters Fitch, Edward Scribner, Jr., Moses Sawyer, John Fellows, Daniel Hinton, Andrew Babonon, Jr., Nathan Colby, Jacob Babonon, Joseph Bisford, Israel Webster, Matthew Pettengill, Joseph Fitch, Richard Purmort.

“ This may certify to the General Assembly or Committee of Safety of the Colony of New Hampshire, That we, the subscribers, have offered the within Declaration to the Inhabitants of the Town of Salisbury and they sign freely.

“ Sinclair Bean and Joseph Bean excepted.

“ EBENEZER WEBSTER,) Selectman
“ JEREMIAH FITCH,) for Salisbury.”

Nathaniel Maloon, Jr., was the third selectman, and, with two exceptions, the test was signed by every male adult in the spring of 1776.

It does not appear that the two who refused to sign were unfriendly to the cause of the colonies. They were trusted with town business, and aided in supplying the demands of the army. Sinclair Bean was a Quaker in his religious belief, and the other a justice of the peace under royal authority.

In 1817, President Monroe made his tour through New England, arriving at Concord on the 18th of July, where he was received with the most genial hospitality, and every evidence of high personal regard was shown him. On Monday, the 21st, he arrived at Salisbury South Road, stopping at the residence of Mr. Andrew Bowers, now the Congregational Church parsonage. His visit was unexpected, and no preparations had been made for his reception. Samuel Greeley, as chairman of the committee, waited upon President Monroe, tendering him the hospitality of the town in a neat and appropriate speech, to which the President responded, and many of the inhabitants were introduced to the chief magistrate of the United States.

Formation of State Government.—On the 11th of November, 1775, in accordance with a recommendation of the Continental Congress, the Fourth Provincial Congress of New Hampshire adopted a plan of representation, upon which an election of delegates was held. In this plan Boscaawen and Salisbury were entitled to one delegate. Henry Gerrish, of Boscaawen, represented the towns in this Assembly. At the first Constitutional Convention, which was held at Concord June 10, 1778, Salisbury was represented by Captain Ebenezer Webster and Captain Matthew Pettengill. At the second Constitutional Convention, held at Concord on the second Tuesday of June, 1781, Captain Ebenezer Webster was the delegate. In June, 1783, the same convention met and agreed upon another form for a Constitution, Jonathan Cram having been chosen a delegate.

Federal Constitution.—The first session of the convention to consider the subject met at Exeter February 13, 1788. Salisbury sent as delegate Colonel Ebenezer Webster, who, at the first meeting of the convention, opposed the Constitution, under instructions from his town. In the mean time Colonel Webster conferred with his constituents, asked the privilege of supporting the Constitution, and he was instructed to vote as he might think proper. When the convention reassembled, in June, 1788, Colonel Webster made the following speech. It did great credit to the head and heart of the author.

SPEECH OF COLONEL EBENEZER WEBSTER.

“ Mr. President: I have listened to the arguments to and against the Constitution. I am convinced such a government as that Constitution will establish, if adopted,—a government acting directly on the people of the States,—is necessary for the common defense and the general welfare. It is the only government which will enable us to pay off the national debt, the debt which we owe for the Revolution, and which we are bound in honor fully and fairly to discharge. Besides, I have followed the lead of Washington through seven years of war and I have never been misled. His name is subscribed to this Constitution. He will not mislead us now. I shall vote for its adoption.”

The first convention for the revision of the State Constitution was convened at Concord on the 7th of September, 1791. Salisbury sent as delegate Rev. Jonathan Searle. The second convention for the revision of the Constitution met at Concord on the 8th of October, 1850. Salisbury selected as delegate, Abraham H. Robinson, a practicing physician in the town and a graduate of Yale College. In 1876 the State Constitution was revised for the third time, which made the fifth Constitutional Convention. The delegate from Salisbury to this convention was Nathaniel Bean.

CHAPTER II.

SALISBURY—(Continued).

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

THE Masonian proprietors exercised great discretion when, in giving grants of land, they provided that the ordinances of religion should be maintained. One of the essential duties of the grantees was to provide "a place of public worship" and maintain a learned and "orthodox minister."

In the grant to Stevenstown, 1749, a right of land equal in amount to each of the other shares was assigned to the first minister, which he was not only at liberty to use while he continued to preach the gospel to the people, but on his settlement the share became his property. Another share was "set apart for the support of the gospel ministry for ever." Ten acres of land were to be laid out "in some convenient place, as the major part of said grantees shall determine, for a meeting-house, a school-house, a muster-field, a burying-place and other public uses."

This ten acres of land was situated on the north side of Searle's Hill, about midway of the town. The earliest record we have of a meeting-house is from an early map of the Merrimack Valley, which shows the location of a meeting-house in the vicinity of the old Salisbury fort. If this building ever existed, it must have been erected by the first grantees (Bakerstown).

In the spring of 1768, the frame was erected, boarded, shingled and the lower floor laid. The 7th of April of that year two pews were sold, and on the following 25th of May sixteen pews. Among these first purchasers was Hon. Josiah Bartlett, Governor of the State in 1790. The highest priced pew brought £6 3s. The meeting-house was used until the summer of 1790, when the town voted to sell it at auction, the sum realized to satisfy the demands of the pew-owners and the rest to be used for schooling. Some time between this date and the next ensuing April the present Congregational Church was erected at South Road village.

In 1825 changes were made in the church, which have been mainly acceptable to the present day.

The Rev. John Elliot was the first minister invited to settle in the town, January 14, 1771, at a salary of forty pounds a year, increasing five pounds a year until it reached fifty pounds, and there remain for three years. Preparations were made to ordain Mr. Elliot the following September, but before the time arrived he asked for a dismission, and on July 8, 1771, his request was granted.

The Rev. Jonathan Searle, the first settled minister, preached in Salisbury in the summer of 1768. At a town-meeting held October 11, 1773, it was voted to accept Mr. Searle's letter "of acceptance," and Captain Ebenezer Webster, John Collins and Captain Matthew Pettengill were chosen to call a council. It was "Voted, to give Mr. Searle fifty pounds, L. M., for two years, and then rise four pounds, L. M., a year till it comes to sixty pounds, and there stand during his labor in the work of the ministry in said town; also twenty-five cords of wood at his house yearly."

Twenty dollars were devoted to defray the ordination expenses; the ordination occurring on the 17th of November, 1773, Rev. Mr. Jewett, of Rowley, Mass., preaching the sermon from 1 Corinthians, chap. iv., verse 1. After a pastorate of nearly twenty years, May 31, 1790, a church-meeting was called by the pastor to act on the question of his dismission. A settlement was made agreeable to all parties, and he was freed from his ministerial work August 15, 1790.

Eleven persons signed the covenant on the formation of the church, and thirty-three united with the church under his pastorate.

Rev. Mr. Searle was born in Rowley, Mass., November 16, 1746, and graduated at Harvard College in 1765; married Mrs. Margaret Tappan (nee) Sanborn, He died December 2, 1818.

Rev. Thomas Worcester was employed three months on trial in the spring of 1791, and in the following September was invited to settle. One hundred and twenty pounds was voted him as a settlement and eighty pounds yearly. This was quite a salary at that time for a young man only twenty-three years of age. He was ordained November 9, 1791, by the same council which had dismissed Mr. Searle on the day previous. The congregation which attended upon his preaching was for many years very large. He was a faithful and laborious pastor; his pulpit addresses were attractive, earnest and direct. During his ministry there were several seasons of the special outpouring of the Holy Spirit. An extensive revival occurred soon after his settlement, and over eighty were received into the church. In December, 1792, thirty young converts made public profession of their faith. His brother, Samuel Worcester, united with the church February 13, 1793. William Webster, uncle to Daniel, united with the church September 8, 1796. Daniel Webster united with the church September 13, 1807. Another revival occurred about 1815, when more than sixty persons made public profession of their faith.

Under his pastorate 268 united with the church; he administered the sacrament of baptism to 322 children, solemnized 307 marriages and attended 25 ecclesiastical councils.

He was dismissed by a mutual council April 23, 1823, and continued to reside in Salisbury until his death, December 24, 1831, aged sixty-three years. In 1806 he received the honorary degree of Master of Arts from Dartmouth College.

Rev. Mr. Worcester was a son of Noah and Lydia (Taylor) Worcester; born in Hollis November 22, 1768, and was one of five brothers, all distinguished as orators and writers for the religious press. March 11, 1792, he married Miss Deborah Lee.

Rev. Abijah Cross settled over the church December 23, 1823. At the time of his settlement there were one hundred and eleven resident members and thirty-nine non-resident, making, at the time of Mr. Worcester's dismission, a total number of one hundred and fifty. Under Mr. Cross' pastorate there were added to the church seventeen members and nine dismissed. He administered the sacrament of baptism to fifteen. He was dismissed April 1, 1829.

It was during his ministry that an effort was made by Rev. Benjamin Huntoon, a native of Salisbury, to organize a Unitarian Society in town; but, not finding a very large congregation, he continued in town but one year.

Rev. Andrew Rankin was settled over the church July 11, 1829, and dismissed in October, 1832. During his pastorate seventeen were added to the church by profession, eleven by letter and about twenty converted by his preaching.

Rev. Benjamin F. Foster was settled Nov. 13, 1833, and dismissed July 23, 1846. Eighty members were admitted to the church during his ministry in Salisbury.

Rev. E. H. Caswell succeeded Mr. Foster, June 28, 1848, and was dismissed the following February. Four were admitted to the church under his pastorate.

Rev. Erasmus D. Eldridge was settled January 12, 1849, and was dismissed November 1, 1854. During his ministry twenty-six were received into the church.

Rev. Thomas Rhatray was installed May 7, 1856, and dismissed April 15, 1857.

Rev. Horatio Merrill was installed March 17, 1858, and dismissed March 15, 1864.

Rev. Usal W. Condit was installed March 14, 1864, and dismissed January 13, 1869. During his ministry nineteen united with the church.

Rev. Joseph B. Cook was installed January 13, 1869, and dismissed May 19, 1876.

Rev. William C. Scofield came to Salisbury in the fall of 1875, continuing until 1877.

Rev. George W. Bothwell spent five months, between his junior and senior year (1879) in Yale Theological Seminary, at Salisbury, in which time five were added to the church. He is now supplying the Congregational Church in Portland, Meh.

Rev. Samuel H. Barnum graduated from Yale College in 1875, and from Yale Theological Seminary in 1879, removing to Salisbury November 9, 1879, where he remained until May, 1882, when he received a call to go to Durham, where he was ordained and installed April 24, 1883, and still continues.

Rev. Chas. E. Gordon removed to Salisbury in Nov., 1882, and supplied the pulpit in Salisbury and Webster, only a few miles apart, and Oct. 4, 1883, was installed pastor over both churches. The installation took place at the Webster Church. He resides at Salisbury.

The Baptist Societies.—The earliest information we have of the Baptist faith in the town was on May 25, 1789, when a meeting was held at the school-house at the Centre Village, and the society organized by the choice of Daniel Brottlenbank moderator, and Jonathan Cram clerk. Lieutenant Joseph Severance, Jonathan Cram and Lieutenant Moses Clough were chosen a committee to procure preaching. On the 25d of the following June seventy-six persons adopted and signed a covenant.

For a time the society held meetings at private houses and in a school-house which they had bought of the town. The congregation rapidly increasing, on the 9th of October, 1790, it was "Voted to build a meeting-house."

March 17, 1791, it was "Voted to build the meeting-house 52 feet long and 40 feet wide, and to be finished throughout as early as 1794. Chose Jonathan Fifield, Joseph Fifield, John Clement, Benjamin Pettengill and Abel Elkins a committee to erect the frame, and Benjamin Pettengill, Jr., Abraham Fifield, Samuel Bean, David Pettengill, Edward Fifield, William Eastman, Benjamin Pettengill, Reuben True and Bailey Chase a committee to sell pews." The house was erected within the specified time, and stood just north of the present location, the main entrance being on the east side. On each end was a porch, supporting small steeples similar to the one standing on the north end, but not so high. In each of these porches was an entrance. In the north tower was a bell. The interior was like most of the churches at that time,—box pews, a large pulpit on the west side of the house, a gallery opposite and on the two sides. An upper and lower set of windows furnished light. In 1839, Deacon William Parsons remodeled the church to its present general style.

Elder Elias Smith, was the first settled minister, and preached the first sermon in the new church in the spring of 1791, taking his text from 1 Kings viii. 27. In November, 1792, he again visited Salisbury and baptized nine persons. January 7, 1793, he returned, and in February was invited to become the pastor of the church. Accepting the invitation, he permanently remained until 1796, when the enthusiasm began to abate and new doctrines were accepted by some of the members. In the latter part of the year he left his Salisbury pulpit and preached at Woburn, Mass.; but in February, 1798, he returned, remaining until the following January, when, with his family, he returned to Woburn. As early as 1801 he opened a store in Salisbury, which did not prove of pecuniary benefit. In 1808 he began the publication of the Herald of Gospel Liberty, the first religious newspaper published in the United States. He died at Lyme, Conn., June 29, 1846, aged seventy-seven years.

Rev. Otis Robinson, the second settled pastor, was invited to settle in the fall of 1809, and was ordained in the spring of 1810, and continued for sixteen years. In 1826, after a very gratifying revival of religion, in which many were added to his church, Mr. Robinson was dismissed from his pastoral charge at his request and continued to reside in town until his death, March 1, 1835.

Rev. Ebenezer E. Cummings, D.D., was ordained and installed September 17, 1828. Old church troubles existed among the members of the church. The pastor labored assiduously for the union and harmony of his people, and knowing that no good could come of a church which was divided against itself, he refused to longer remain. He asked a dismission, which was granted January 5, 1831. The leading members of the two churches which then existed met in consultation, decided to forget the past and to go on together in a Christian life. A new church was formed January 19, 1831, and an invitation extended to Mr. Cummings to become its pastor. In a letter, bearing date June 4, 1831, he consented to remain, but was not installed. In the spring of 1832 he removed to Concord, where he was settled over the First Baptist Church, March 2, 1832, continuing till January 11, 1854. Still resides at Concord. The records of the society have not been kept in a manner to afford reliable information; consequently we shall give only the following:

Rev. John Learned, installed in September, 1838, remaining one year; Rev. John Burden, came in the fall of 1839; Rev. Stephen Coombs, occupied the pulpit from July, 1853, to January, 1856; Rev. Samuel H. Amsden, installed in 1856. Rev. Joseph B. Damon; Rev. Thomas R. Joy, 1861; Rev. Albert A. Ford, 1864-66. Rev. Joshua Clement, 1866-67; Rev. Joseph Storrs; Rev. J. Q. Smeclar, one year; Elder Hiram Stevens, Elders Rowell and Elias Dane; Elder Peter M. Hersey. Rev. A. H. Martin, 1869-75.

Union Meeting-House is located at the south-west part of the town and west of Blackwater River.

As early as 1791 the residents of the west part of the town had their share of the minister fund paid to them, which they used towards defraying the expenses of a minister. In 1832 they decided to erect a union house of worship, each denomination to occupy the pulpit one Sunday in succession through the year.

February 25, 1834, a meeting was held to "take action in relation to the erection of a place of worship." A committee, consisting of John Couch, Paul True, David Hobbs, David Stevens, Benjamin Scribner, Israel B. Bean, William Couch, Daniel Watson and David Harvey, was appointed to confer upon the most judicious ways and means of building the house. They selected the present site. Forty-two persons pledged themselves twenty dollars each towards building and finishing the house. Joshua S. Bean, Caleb Smith, John S. Eaton and John Couch (3d) were the church committee. The house was completed and dedicated at once.

So far as known, each denomination has had the following permanent ministers: Christian, 10; Methodists, 11; Congregationalists, 2; Universalists, 2.

East Village (or Franklin) Church.—For years there was no church in Pemigewasset, East Republican village or Salisburyville, in that part of Salisbury now included in Franklin. To attend religious services the people were obliged to go to Searle's Hill, subsequently to South road, or to Sanbornton or Northfield. As the village increased in population and wealth, the necessity of permanent ministrations of the gospel was plainly seen. In Feb., 1820, it was decided to establish a Congregational Church, and erect a meeting-house. The lot on which the house now stands was selected.

A subscription paper was circulated for the purpose of raising money to build the house. On this paper were the names of the most active citizens of that village, and over four hundred dollars were subscribed. The lot was given by Ebenezer Eastman, one of the most influential men in the place. The organization was effected March 29, 1820. Parker Noyes, Esq., was chosen clerk; Captain Blanchard and Messrs. Hale, Ladd, Clark, Haddock, Sanborn and Samuel George were chosen a committee to construct the house. The work of completing the house after the erection of the frame was awarded to Benjamin Rowe for three hundred and sixty dollars. He did not finish his contract, and Captain Blanchard, James Garland and Richard Peabody were appointed to finish the house. On three sides of the interior of the church galleries were built, which contained thirty-two pews. The pews were sold July 4, 1820. The Rev. Thomas Worcester, then pastor of the church at South Road, delivered a patriotic oration which was received with great enthusiasm. William Haddock sold by auction the choice of pews, as represented on a plan which he held in his hand. The sum received from the sale was $2202.25. The church was completed by November 25, 1820, and dedicated December 13th, Rev. Asa McFarland, of Concord, preaching the dedication sermon.

The church was organized June 11, 1822, under the advice and direction of Rev. Samuel Wood and Rev. Mr. Price, of Boscawen; Rev. Thomas Worcester, of Salisbury; and Rev. Abram Bodwell, of Sanbornton. A church covenant and confession of faith was adopted and signed by fourteen persons. Paul Noyes was the first deacon. The church had no settled pastor before the organization of Franklin.

Rev. William T. Savage, D.D., for a long time pastor, in his twenty-third anniversary sermon, delivered in 1872, said,—

"In the department of preaching, the church and society for some six years from the beginning seems not to have had a regular pastor. In formal documents and loose papers allusion to the following ministers as having occupied the pulpit for one or more Sabbaths are found: Rev. D. Dunn, Rev. M. B. Murslok, Rev. Abel Wood, of Warner; Robert Page, missionary; Rev. David McElhiney; Stepler and Holt, missionaries; and Rev. Moses Bradford, of Franconstown. In 1826, Rev. Abijah Cross, pastor of the church at South Road, preached fifteen Sabbaths. In 1827, Rev. George Freeman officiated eleven Sabbaths, and in 1828, Rev. Benben Farley sixteen Sabbaths."

County Conference.—The Merrimack County Conference of Congregational Churches was an outgrowth of the Hopkinton Association, and was the result of a special meeting held at the dwelling-house of the Rev. Dr. Wood, of Boscawen, April 4, 1827. Among the articles presented was the following: "This Conference shall be composed of pastors and delegates from the Congregational Churches within the bounds of the Hopkinton Association. It shall assume no control over the faith or the discipline of the church."

The first meeting was held on the fourth Tuesday of June, 1828, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, in the Congregational Church at Salisbury, the Rev. Abijah Cross, then pastor. In 1838 the Association again met at Salisbury, and June 10, 1884, the Conference again assembled, Rev. C. E. Gordon, pastor, eleven churches being represented by their pastors and delegates, the session continuing two days.

Educational.—At the first town-meeting it was voted "to raise some money for school purposes." In 1772 twelve dollars was voted to support a school; it was also voted "to raise half a day's work on the single head, to be done on the south end of the sixty-acre lot, which was laid out for the school." This lot was situated on Searle's Hill, on the centre range-way, opposite the ten-acre meeting-house lot. The school-house was built in the summer of 1772 and was the first in town.

In 1778 the town was divided into four school districts. The school-houses were wooden-framed, boarded and shingled and furnished with windows and fire-places. One was located near Smith's Corner. It was built by Beniah Bean for three hundred and ninety-eight dollars. The second at South Road, built by Deacon John Collins for six hundred and eighty dollars. Another was situated at the Centre Road, nearly opposite F. W. Fifield's present residence, built by Edward Fifield for six hundred and seventy-eight dollars; and the last was at North Road, Mr. Andrew Pettingill receiving four hundred and ninety-four dollars for building it. Such buildings soon after could have been completed for less than half the cost of these. But money was so much depreciated that labor commanded eight dollars per day. The amount raised annually for schools at this time was about five hundred dollars, while three thousand dollars were appropriated for the improvement of roads.

In March, 1784, it was "Voted to sell all the school lands and put the principal in the bank and use the interest for the support of schools in the town annually." It was also voted at the same meeting "to sell the school-houses belonging to the s^d town and the money be contributed to the use of the town."

The sale of the school-houses brought, in the aggregate, $63.75 each, and the land was sold to Ephraim Colby for three pounds, fifteen shillings and threepence per acre. In 1786 the town raised two hundred and ten dollars, in lawful money, for the support of schools, and ordered each district to provide its own school-rooms.

In 1791 a school-house was built at the Lower village (now the Orphans' Home District in Franklin). In this building Daniel Webster attended school and later in life taught. The second school-house, at the South road, was built by subscription in 1787. After the academy was removed from its original location to South road the school was transferred to one portion of it and has since continued.

In 1819 the town was divided into eleven school districts and there were school-houses in nine of them. Changes were subsequently made, increasing the number to fourteen.

No. 1, located at South road, was organized in 1820.

No. 2, known as Centre Road District, was formed April 2, 1825.

No. 3, called "Sawyer's," organized in 1820.

No. 4, located at Scribner's Corner, at the west part of the town.

No. 5, at the North road.

No. 6, the Mills District; school located there as early as 1806. In 1884 a new, commodious building was erected.

No. 7, at "Smith's Corner," at the west part of the town. The first school-house was erected in 1782. The second was twenty by twenty-five feet, erected in 1789. In 1825 the district was reorganized and a new school-house erected.

No. 8, located at "Thompson's Corner." The first school-house in town was on a site included within the limits of this district.

No. 9, on Lovering's Hill. Established in 1826.

No. 10, "Watson District," on the southern spur of Kearsarge Mountain. A school-house was built here as early as 1812.

No. 11 is on Raccoon Hill, known as the "Shaw District." The school-house was built in 1847 and thoroughly repaired in 1876.

No. 12, located at "Shaw's Corner." The second school-house was erected in 1820 and the third in 1881.

No. 13, situated at the Lower village (now the Orphans' Home in Franklin). The present building is of brick.

No. 14, at the East village in Franklin. Ebenezer Eastman gave the land for "educational purposes" in 1816. The first school-house in that part of Salisbury was built in 1805-6.

SALISBURY ACADEMY.—At the close of the last century Salisbury was the residence of an unusually number of prudent, intellectual and scholarly men. They had pride in the good name of the town, and looked forward with cheerful anticipation to a higher position which it might hold in the State, and saw the advantages which would result from a permanent institution of learning, and, at length, united in the establishment of an academy. The petition was presented to the Legislature for an act of incorporation at the winter session, in January, 1795, and the act of incorporation was granted December 22, 1795.

The board of trustees, by authority of the Legislature, had the charge of the institution. The academy was erected on the ridge of Garland's Hill, and was two stories high. Soon after its erection the Fourth New Hampshire turnpike was built, which practically left the academy on an old road and away from the business portion of the town. It was proposed to move the building to South Road village and open it under new management, and for that purpose contributions were solicited, the removal taking place April 29, 1805.

In January, 1806, the district school began on the lower floor, the upper room being reserved for academic purposes. Extensive repairs have been made as needed, and in 1883 a projection was added to the south end of the upper story, new floor laid, the stairway made more convenient and the room fitted up into a fine hall. The academy has had three charters. For a long period it gained and sustained a reputation for good scholarship and excellence in all its departments. Its standing was not inferior to the best institutions of its kind in the State. Following are the list of teachers, so far as known:

Thomas Chase was the first instructor when it was located on Garland Hill. He was succeeded by James Tappan, Rev. Samuel Worcester, Rev. Noah Worcester, D.D., Ichabod Bartlett, 1804; Hon. Richard Fletcher, 1809; Samuel I. Wells, Esq., 1813-16; Nathaniel H. Carter, A.M., 1811; Lamson Carter, 1815; Stephen Bean, Rev. Benjamin Huntoon, 1817-19; Rev. Daniel Fitts, D.D., 1819-22; Zachariah Batchelder, 1822; W. Bailey, 1813; Henry Greenleaf, 1822; Caleb Stetson, 1825-26; Henry Fitts, William Claggett, 1826-27; Alfred Kittredge, 1828; Caleb B. Kittredge, 1829-32; Rev. B. F. Foster, 1838-39; Charles T. Berry, 1840; Elbridge G. Emery, 1842-43; David Dimond, 1843; Caleb P. Smith, William S. Spaulding, A.M., 1844-45; S. C. Noyes, J. H. Upton. —

Clark, Hon. William M. Pingree, Rev. E. S. Little, Dr. J. Q. A. French, Dr. Crockett, D. B. Penticost, Rev. E. D. Eldredge, John A. Kilburn, 1851; John W. Simonds, John R. Eastman.

Social Library.—Early in the year 1794 several of the citizens of Salisbury agreed to organize a voluntary association for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a library. The first regular meeting was held March 27th. Colonel Ebenezer Webster was chosen chairman and Andrew Bowers clerk. An act of incorporation was granted in 1798. Rules and regulations were adopted in March, 1799. In 1859 there were four hundred and ninety-six volumes in the library. It was this library that Daniel Webster referred to when he said that his early reading was gathered from a small circulating library.

Literary Adelphi.—This society was organized June 25, 1813, when the academy was at the height of its prosperity. It was composed largely of members of the academy, who generally conducted its literary exercises. The last meeting of the society was held in June, 1819.

CHAPTER III.

SALISBURY—(Continued).

INDIAN HISTORY.

As there has been so much written about the killing of Sabatis and Plausawa, by the Bowns, and the trouble which arose from it, we will not burden this volume with a repetition of it, but refer the interested reader to the New Hampshire State Papers, or Dearborn's "History of Salisbury," pp. 225-239, inclusive.

For several years previous to 1754 Indian depredations had been committed in the vicinity. On the 11th of May, 1754, the Indians made their attack on Nathaniel Maloon and family, who had some time previously removed to Stevenstown (Salisbury). Maloon was captured in Contoocook (Boscawen). He was taken to his home, where they took, as prisoners, his wife, his children (Mary and Rachel, John and David; also Sarah, then an infant of thirteen months). The eldest son, Nathaniel P., was at work in a field a short distance from the house, planting corn. The father was ordered to call him, which he did; but the son saw the Indians, and, understanding by the signification of his father's voice that he wished him to escape, he dropped his hoe, fled to the woods, swam the Blackwater and reached the fort at Contoocook.

The Indians plundered the house and then returned to St. Francis, Canada, with their captives. After suffering great indignities they were shipped in a French vessel for France. The ship was captured by a British man-of-war. Maloon and his family were landed at Portland, and from that place they returned to their former home, having been gone nearly four years.

Rachel was not redeemed until 1763, and David not until 1761.

On the 16th of August, 1754, an attack was made on Philip Call's house, which stood near the Salisbury fort. Mr. Call, his son Stephen and Timothy Cook were at work on the farm. The savages suddenly appeared at the door of the dwelling-house, and as Mrs. Philip Call opened it she was struck down, killed and scalped. Stephen Call's wife, being within, concealed herself and infant, John, behind the chimney and was not discovered. Both Philip and Stephen escaped. Timothy Cook was pursued, and, in crossing the Merrimack River, was fired upon and killed.

Samuel Scribner and Robert Barber had located within half a mile of our northern boundary line, near Emerystown (Andover), and were then our most northern settlers. They had got out the timber to build a house, and at the time of their capture were mowing in the meadow now owned by Elbridge Shaw. Scribner's back was to the Indians. Barber saw them coming and shouted out to Scribner, "Run, Scribner; run, for God's sake! Run! the Indians are upon us!" But he did not hear him, and he was grasped from behind by an Indian. Barber ran, but went directly into an ambush of the savages. An Indian, holding up a scalp before Barber, asked him, in broken English, if he knew it. He said, "Yes; Mrs. Call's." The Indians took them along as prisoners, and, after a journey of thirteen days, reached St. Francis, Canada. Scribner was sold to a Frenchman at Chamblee. Barber was sold to a Frenchman about a mile from St. Francis, and on the 26th of September, 1775, made his escape. After Scribner's return he built the large two-story house at North road.

Early in the winter of 1755, Governor Wentworth ordered Colonel Joseph Blanchard, of Dunstable, to raise a regiment of six hundred men, and to rendezvous at the Salisbury fort. It is impossible to state when this fort was built, but it was between 1746 and 1750. It was located about forty rods southerly of the cemetery on the Webster intervalve, and surrounded by eight acres of cleared land which was early cultivated. It is quite evident that the regiment arrived in April, 1755, and Blanchard spent about six weeks in preparing boats for transporting his troops up the river. Before they left, the State authorities ordered the enlistment of three hundred men to take their place. They were mustered into service about the 20th of September, 1755, and were discharged at the end of three months.

In these regiments we find many of our early pioneers who settled in the town, viz.: Benjamin Sanborn, Benjamin Baker, Samuel Judkins, John Bean, Robert Smith, Tristram Sanborn, Andrew Bohanon, Henry Ad. Elkins, John Webster, Thomas Welch, Jacob Hancock, Nehemiah Heath, Ebenezer Johnson, Tristram Quimby, Samuel Lovering, Iddo Webster, Benjamin Huntoon, B. Clifford, Edward Eastman, John Wadleigh, Jeremiah Quimby and John Fellows.

In 1756, Colonel Meserve raised a regiment for the Crown Point expedition, among his men being found the following, who located in the town: Jonathan Fifield, John Ash, Samuel Scribner, J. Blaisdell and Daniel Stevens.

In Meserve's regiment, raised in 1757, we find the following soldiers, who afterwards became residents in Salisbury: J. Merrow, Joseph Webster, Benjamin Pettengill, John Sanborn and Stephen Webster.

In 1757, Major Thomas Tash enlisted a battalion of two and three months' men. We append the following names found in this battalion: John Cross, Samuel Scribner, Robert Barber and Matthew Pettengill.

In 1758, Colonel John Hart raised a regiment of six hundred men for the Crown Point expedition. Upon the roll appears the names of the following, who settled in Salisbury: Moses Garland, Moses Sanborn, Benjamin Shaw, Samuel Scribner, James Johnston, William Hoyt and Nathaniel Nelson.

In Captain Trueworthy Ladd's company we find the names of Joseph Bean, Ebenezer Webster, Philip Flanders, Onesiphorus Page, Iddo Webster, John Wadleigh and Moses Tucker.

In Colonel John Goff's regiment we find Ebenezer Webster, orderly sergeant; Tristram Quimby and Stephen Webster, corporals; privates, Rowell Colby, Robert Smith, Benjamin Webster, Elisha Quimby, Richard Tucker, D. Rowe, Moses Tucker, Benjamin Collins and Jonathan Roberts, all settled in Salisbury.

CHAPTER IV.

SALISBURY—(Continued).

MILITARY HISTORY.

The Revolution.—The people of Salisbury caught the first echo of the shot at Lexington, and, although not in season to participate, they were at Bunker Hill. They went, too, uninvited to that banquet of death and fame which was celebrated on the 17th of June, 1775.

When hostilities commenced at Lexington there were but five hundred inhabitants in Salisbury. There was one company of militia, consisting of about seventy-five men, organized and officered, between the ages of sixteen and sixty years. This company was commanded by Captain Ebenezer Webster, who had first received his commission in 1774. Robert Smith was his lieutenant, Moses Garland, for a short time, and then Andrew Pettengill was the ensign.

Upon the alarm of the Lexington conflict, without any authority from the State, they repaired to Cambridge. They there met the Massachusetts Committee of Safety, also John Stark, James Reed and Paul Dudley Sargent. These three men received colonels' commissions from the State of Massachusetts. Stark enlisted eight hundred men, or fourteen companies, while Reed and Sargent had enlisted four companies each. The regiments were Nos. 1, 2 and 3. Colonel Stark had command of the First, Enoch Poor of the Second and James Reed of the Third. The First and Third Regiments were engaged in the battle of Bunker Hill.

Salisbury men enlisted into three or more of the companies of Stark's regiment. Among the early enlistments are the names of Peter Severance, Jonathan Cram and Jacob Morrill; in Captain Henry Dearborn's company, Abraham Fifield, John Bean, Joseph Lovering, Samuel Lovering, Moses Welch, E. Raino, Daniel Stevens, Edward Evans, Moses Garland, Moses Fellows, John Bowen, John Jemson, Benjamin Howard, Reuben Greeley and Samuel Scribner. Two of these men, John Bowen and Moses Fellows, joined Captain Dearborn's company, and, in the autumn of 1775, made a part of Arnold's regiment, that marched through the wilderness of Maine to Quebec. Twelve of the above number enlisted for the term of six months and encountered the perils of the siege.

Of the Salisbury men who participated in the aid to Connecticut, we have been unable to obtain their names. Certainly there was quite a number.

Our next enlistment for 1776 was for the relief of the northern army. In Captain Osgood's company we find the name of Captain John Webster, of Salisbury, as his lieutenant, and Edward Sawyer, as private.

Upon the evacuation of Boston by the British, part of their army soon after invaded New York. Another portion, commanded by Burgoyne, invaded Canada, by way of Quebec. The New Hampshire regiments which had been at the siege were ordered to New York, and thirteen Salisbury men were in Colonel Stark's regiment, viz.:

John Bestford, James Bestford, John Bayley, Wells Burbank, Rowell Colby, Benben Hoyt, Jr., Jonathan Huntoon, Philip Huntoon, Samuel Lovering, Joseph Lovering, Ebenezer Scribner, Simon Sanborn and Israel Webster.

Another regiment was raised for six months, to reinforce Washington at New York. Salisbury furnished ten men for James Shepard's company of Canterbury,—

John Bean, ensign; Benjamin Huntoon, orderly sergeant; Privates, Cutting Stevens, Stephen Call, James Johnson, Samuel Scribner, Philip Flanders, Jonathan Scribner, Jonathan Foster, Robert Wase.

After the disastrous battle of Long Island, Washington again appealed to New Hampshire for aid. Salisbury had furnished her full quota. Captain Ebenezer Webster was appealed to furnish men. Ten men holding militia commissions, and some others, volunteered to serve as privates, and were mustered into service September 29, 1776. They were Lieutenant Robert Smith, Ensign Moses Garland, Orderly Sergeant Andrew Pettengill, Ensign Andrew Bohanon, Edward Eastman, Joseph Fifield, Edward Fifield, Joshua Morse and Stephen Bohanon. Captain Webster resigned the office of selectman to take a private's place in this campaign. Joseph Bean and Nathaniel Huntoon enlisted in Captain Goff's company of the same regiment. They participated in the battle of White Plains.

In 1777 the town was obliged to offer bounties of seventy dollars each to meet its quota. John Ash, who had enlisted March 8, 1777, to serve during the war, was discharged December 31, 1781, and Ananiah Bohanon, Philip Flanders and John Bowen, who had enlisted March 13, 1781, were discharged the following December.

The following men enlisted for three years in Colonel Alexander Scammell's regiment:

Moses Fellows, orderly sergeant; Ephraim Heath, Reuben Greeley, Reuben Hoyt, Matthew Greeley, Philip Lufkin, William Bayley, Daniel Field, Benjamin Howard, Joshua Snow, as privates.

These fourteen men were our quota of Continental soldiers for three years, and were mustered into service in March, 1777.

The following is the list of soldiers from Salisbury who were in Captain Ebenezer Webster's company, which fought in the battle of Bennington, on the 16th of August, 1777:

Edward Evans, one of the staff officers of Colonel Stickney's regiment; Captain Ebenezer Webster; Lieutenants, Robert Smith, Andrew Bohanon; Fourth Sergeant, Abraham Fifield; Third Corporal, Samuel Lovrim; Fourth Corporal, Joshua Morse; Drummer, John Sanborn; Fifer, Jonathan Foster, Privates, Elder Benjamin Huntoon, William Seabrook, Richard Permont, Iddo Scribner, Benjamin Scribner, Peter Severance, Rowell Colby, John Fifield, Joseph Fifield, Edward Fifield, Jonathan Fifield, Jacob Bohanon, William Cabot, Edmund Sawyer, John C. Gale, Jacob True, John Jenison, Robert Barber, Joseph Tucker, Moses Elkins, John Smith, William Newton, Israel Webster, David Pettengill, Abel Elkins, James Johnson, Jacob Garland, George Bayley, Moses Welch, Daniel Brottlenbank, Matthew Pettengill, Edward Eastman,—rank and file from Salisbury, forty-one men.

To this number add Ensign Andrew Pettengill, who served in the Concord and Boscawen company. We also had three other men in Colonel George Reed's regiment, viz.: Samuel Saunders, Jacob Morrill and Joseph Maloon, making, of the Continental and militiamen in actual service in the summer of 1777, forty-five militiamen and seventeen regular troops, a total of sixty-two men.

Though the Salisbury men were largely exposed, and though Saunders was reported among the missing at Hubbardton, Pettengill wounded at Stillwater, yet no death resulted except that of Andrew Pettengill. Early in 1778 disease began to thin the ranks of our veterans, and in March and April we lost four of our men in camp at Valley Forge, viz.: Ephraim Heath, Reuben Greeley, Philip Lufkin and William Bayley.

In August, 1778, the expedition to Rhode Island was organized and executed under the command of General Sullivan. Colonel Moses Nichols raised a regiment to serve about a month in General Whipple's brigade. Captain Ebenezer Webster commanded the Third Company in this regiment. Elder Benjamin Huntoon was his orderly sergeant and Edward Eastman corporal. The following Salisbury men were privates in his company:

Lieutenant Robert Smith, Ensign Andrew Bohanon, Joseph Fifield, Samuel Scribner, Benjamin Pettengill, James Johnson, William Cabot, Jonathan Fifield, Shubal Fifield, Joseph Hoyt, Winthrop Fifield, Ensign Moses Garland, Jeremiah Bowen, John Sanborn, Moses Welch, Benjamin Eastman and Phineas Bean. Also in Colonel Center's regiment, Joseph Bean, Joseph Webster and Daniel Gilman,—total, twenty-two rank and file.

In July, 1779, Stephen Bohanon and James Johnson enlisted for six months to serve in the Rhode Island campaign. In June, 1780, George Hackett, David Greeley, Jonathan Fifield and Joseph Webster were mustered into the Continental army to serve during the war. During the year 1779, John Bean, of Salisbury, was wounded at Newton, N. Y., and afterwards received half-pay.

In 1780, Captain Ebenezer Webster commanded the Fourth Company in Colonel Moses Nichols' regiment, raised for the defense of West Point, and was stationed there for eight months. From Salisbury we recognize Captain Webster's old companions, Robert Wise, Stephen Bohanon, Jethro Barber, Joseph Hoyt, Benjamin Eastman, S. Fifield, Winthrop Fifield, Benjamin Ingalls and Joseph Welch.

In 1780 the term of service of the three years' men expired, and it became necessary to re-enlist some fifteen men, to take the places of those discharged. In addition to the four men who took the places of those who died at Valley Forge, the following men were secured. They enlisted for three years from the spring of 1780:

Joshua Snow, John Smith, Moses Fellows, John Fellows, Jr., John Ash, George Nichols, Josiah Mason, Benjamin Howard, William Lufkin, Ananias Bohanon, Josiah Smith and Thomas Cross.

For Colonel George Reed's regiment the following men were obtained: Samuel Saunders, Edward Scribner, Jethro Barber, Joseph Maloon and S. Fifield.

The following men were enlisted from Salisbury to reinforce the army in New York, and served in various companies in Colonel D. Reynolds' regiment:

Moses Webster, Peter Whittemore, J. Judkins, Peter Severance, Edward Eastman, Thomas Chadis, J. Fifield, Benjamin Sanborn, Abel Morrill, Jacob Morrill, Henry Elkins, Samuel Maloon, S. French.

In November, 1781, the following soldiers enlisted for three months, and were returned to Colonel Stickney's regiment:

Moses Fellows, Matthew Greeley, Benjamin Sanborn, Elisha Shepard, Levi Lufkin, John Smith and Samuel Saunders.

In 1782, Captain Ebenezer Webster performed a six months' service in the north part of this State. Jeremiah Bowen was the only private from the town.

The War of 1812.—One of our active officers in the army of the United States during the war, and in the campaign against the Western Indians antecedent to this war, was Captain John Smith. His brother, Jabez Smith, had the rank of major in the First Regiment of the United States Volunteers.

In 1814 our seaport, Portsmouth, was threatened by the British navy, and our militia were called upon more than once to defend this port.

Those who mustered from Salisbury for three months from the 11th day of September, 1814, were the following, viz.:

Captain Jonathan Bean and his son, Phineas Bean, as water; Privates, Benjamin Fitch, Moses Fitch, Enoch Fitch, Samuel Fitch, Jonathan P. Sanborn, Nehemiah Lowell, Matthew T. Hunt, William Johnson, John Johnson, Nathaniel Stevens, John Webster, Jesse Wardwell, Moses Osgood, Jr., enlisted in the United States service.

Of the sixty days' men who enlisted October 2, 1814, in the company commanded by Captain Silas Call, of Boscawen, we find the following Salisbury men:

Lieutenant, Samuel Quimby; Orderly Sergeant, Timothy Boat; Corporal, Thomas Chase; Musician, A. B. Bohannon; Privates, Nathan Tucker, Jabez True, Theodoré George, Samuel Webster, Jonathan Merrill, Isaac Proctor, Joseph Fitch and Joseph Adams.

In Colonel Davis' regiment, in the company commanded by Captain Thomas Currier, we recognize the following soldiers, who served one year, as belonging to Salisbury:

Daniel Woodard, Sergeant Jeremiah Bean, Samuel Fitch, William Frazier, Amos George and Jeremiah Gove. In Captain Mason's company, Joel Jenkins, Jonathan Johnson, John Sanborn, J. Quimby, Edward West, Ebenezer Webster Bohannon, Ithamar Watson (was a captain of Minute-Men).

The following soldiers are credited to Salisbury:

James Currier, Joseph Stevens, Moses Morse, Abel Wardwell, Samuel Kezir, Matthew Sanborn, Paul Greeley and Richard Greeley.

War of the Rebellion.—On the 27th day of December, 1860, the Confederates seized Forts Moultrie and Pickens. On the 9th day of January, 1861, they fired their first shot, from Fort Moultrie and Morris Island, into a government vessel carrying troops and supplies to Major Anderson, who had transferred his entire force to Fort Sumter. In accordance with the requirements of law, the selectmen for 1861 transmitted to the Secretary of State a list of the names of men liable to do military duty, numbering one hundred and two. Accepting this basis, Salisbury furnished not only the required number, but a small surplus. Salisbury furnished no soldiers until the Tenth Regiment was raised under the call of 1862. Michael T. Donahoe, of Manchester, was appointed colonel. Company E was raised at Andover, and was commanded by Captain Abrieh B. Cook, who was succeeded by Captain Thomas C. Trumbull, who, in turn, was succeeded by Captain James A. Sanborn. The following men enlisted from Salisbury:

Sergeant, John C. Carter; Privates, William C. Heath, Calvin Hoyt, Anson W. Glines, Willis W. Kenniston, Alfred Sanborn, Harry Scott, William Whittemore, Nathaniel Dodge, Henry M. French, George Atwood, George W. Chase.

In the Sixteenth Regiment, Company E, enlisted the following men from Salisbury:

Sergeant, Benjamin Gale; Corporals, Alonzo D. Bayneport, George F. Smith, Privates, Evan M. Heath, Harrison A. Heath, Moses Gully, William R. Donald, Frederick M. Dressing, Benjamin E. Hazen, Charles F. Heath, Albert A. French, Henry C. George, Charles Gully, Moshch W. Bhoshill.

MISCELLANEOUS

Corporal, Madison B. Davis, enlisted in Troop I, First New England Cavalry.

Bugler, Cyrus C. Hinton, enlisted in Troop I, First New England Cavalry.

William Bayley and Andrew J. Colby, enlisted in Company H, Eighth Regiment.

John Miller, enlisted in Company F, Second Regiment.

Lieutenant, Joseph C. Clifford, enlisted in Company E, First Regiment.

Jonathan J. Bayley, enlisted in Company K, Fourth Regiment.

M. H. Whitman, enlisted in Company G, Fifth Regiment.

Clinton A. Shaw, enlisted in Company G, Twelfth Regiment.

John G. Mayfield, enlisted in Company E, Seventh Regiment.

Henry Sanborn, enlisted in Company F, Second Regiment United States Sharpshooters—enlisted September 12, 1862, in Company E, Tenth Regiment.

Frank Stevens, enlisted in Eighteenth Regiment, New Hampshire Infantry.

The following residents of the town were also in service, but we have little knowledge concerning their record beyond the fact of enlistment:

Frank D. Kimball, Company K, Fourth Regiment; John Woodard, Ebenezer Farrum, James Fairman, Charles Bower, Caleb B. Smith, Henry Moore, Benjamin S. Heath, Joseph Ladd, Reel Hinton, James W. Gardner, Daniel W. Shaw, C. O. Wheeler, George H. Whitman, W. C. Whitman.

The following soldiers were either natives or residents of the town of Salisbury at the time of their enlistment, but enlisted out of the town or State:

Amos S. Bean, credited to and enlisted from Manchester, in Company A, Heavy Artillery.

George E. Bean, credited to and enlisted from Manchester, Company A, Tenth Regiment.

Albert Killburn, enlisted in Boston in the Fifth Massachusetts Regiment of three months' men, enlisted at Minneapolis, Minn., afterwards in the employ of the government as a carpenter, died at Vicksburg, Miss.

Abrham S. Sandeen, credited to Manchester, Company G, Fourth Regiment.

Samuel Steper, credited to Canaan, Company D, Fourth Regiment.

Rufus Emerson, enlisted in Company C, Second Vermont Regiment.

Ellbridge G. Emerson, enlisted in Company C, Second Vermont Regiment.

Nathan S. Goser, enlisted in Twenty-second Massachusetts Infantry.

Charles W. Goser, enlisted in Sixth Massachusetts Infantry.

George O. Henry, enlisted in Second Regiment.

Silas Holmes, enlisted in Sixth Massachusetts.

John Shaw.

David F. Bacon, enlisted in Company E, Second Vermont.

Charles H. Bacon.

Demel R. Gale.

John Alfred Gale.

SUBSTITUTES.—The following substitutes performed their engagements with the town of Salisbury; they honored themselves and the cause they supported:

Thomas Fleming, Company G, Fourth Regiment; Hamilton Carr, Company A, Fourth Regiment; Octave Verina, Company B, Ninth Regiment; John Robinson, Company B, Ninth Regiment; James Dolan, Company A, Ninth Regiment; Robert Brown, Company A, Ninth Regiment; James McDonald, Company E or D, Seventh Regiment; Daniel P. Morrison, Company B, Seventh Regiment; James Carroll, Joseph Stearns, Henry Miller, Jerry Potter, Charles Sutton, Peter Carroll, William Lowman, James Meares, John Murphy, Warren Dinslow, Nathan Lacey, Michael Conner, James Moran, George Perry, James Durzin, Corporal Nelson Davis, William B. Winslip, J. F. Coburn, William Williams, Robert Allen, H. C. Rock, Henry McArthur.

Twenty-two additional substitutes were enlisted in 1863 and 1864, but are recorded as deserters. Having degraded themselves as soldiers, we shall not allow them to disgrace the town that employed them, by publishing their names.

In 1680 a militia company was organized in this State, consisting of one company of foot in each of the four towns of Portsmouth, Dover, Exeter and Hampton, one company of artillery at the fort and one "troop of horse."

After the Declaration of Independence a new militia system became necessary, and we will only follow its history so far as it relates to Salisbury, which was one of the towns that helped form the Twenty-first Regiment, the regimental officers being Lieutenant-Colonel Philip Greeley, commander; Major Joseph Gerish, First Battalion; Major Timothy Darling, Second Battalion. The following list comprises colonels of the Twenty-first Regiment, so far as known, who resided in Salisbury:

1787, Ebenezer Webster; 1802, John C. Gale; 1813, Benjamin Swift; 1815-20, Jonathan Bean; 1820-22, John Greeley; 1823, Cyrus Chase; 1845, John C. Smith; 1848-53, Gustavus V. Webster.

Roads, Turnpikes, Bridges and Ferries.—The earliest highway in the town was one along the west bank of the Merrimack River, which was intended to open communication with the Coos country. The three rangeways of the town extended, in an easterly and westerly direction, nearly the entire length of the town.

The South Rangeway extended from Shaw's Corner, through the location of South Road village, and continued westerly over Kearsarge into Warner. It was surveyed in 1763 by William Calef.

The Centre road, occupying the rangeway limits very fully, was surveyed by Mr. Calef in 1768. It commenced by the Webster Cemetery, at the river, extended over Searle's Hill, crossed the turnpike road a little southeast of Centre Road village and extended to the western boundary.

The road corresponding, in part, with the North Rangeway was surveyed in 1763 by Mr. Calef. Only a few sections of it were ever built. As early as 1774 a road commenced at the eastern bound of Dr. Joseph Bartlett's home-lot, east of South Road village, and continued northward to the Centre road, just west of the old meeting-house on Searle's Hill.

North road was constructed in 1770, between Shaw's Corner and Benjamin Huntoon's. It was soon after extended to Andover line.

Bog road was built as a substitute for the Dr. Bartlett road already referred to. Raccoon Hill road extends the whole length of Raccoon Hill, and was built in 1781. Mill's road extends westerly from the Centre Road village, continuing to Prince's Mill, where it then turns slightly and terminates at the foot of the hill west of Frank Whittemore's. A branch of this road turns south at Prince's Mill, continues south past the Union Meeting-House and leads into Webster. Another branch of this road passes the Glines place and comes out at the South Range road east of Blackwater River bridge.

A road begins west of Alpheus B. Huntoon's, and continues over Bench Hill into Andover. Bay's road extends from Shaw's mill, in West Salisbury, around the eastern shore of "the Bays" and intersects the College road. A cross-range road extends from D. C. Stevens' to Centre Range road at Harrison V. Heath's. New road to Franklin begins on the Bog road, one half-mile north of Thompson's school-house, turning eastward to the North road, which it intersects south of the "Birth-place." It was laid out in 1869. Cross-Range road, the northern terminus of which is at Centre Road village, continues southerly and intersects Brattle Street. Its northern extension leads to Raccoon hill. Mutton road extends south from South Road village to Corser Hill, in Webster. It was built in 1819. Water Street commences near the Academy and continues southerly to Boscawen. The new road to North Boscawen, where it connects with the River road, was built in 1849. The new road from Shaw's Corner to Franklin was built in 1823-24. The petition for the College road was presented to the General Court in 1784, and an act was passed authorizing a committee to lay it out. It was not built just where the court ordered it. The route through Salisbury was circular, and we will not follow its windings, as most of the road has become continuous with other roads.

The Fourth New Hampshire turnpike charter was granted at the fall session of the General Court in 1800. It extended from the northwest corner of the bridge just north of the mouth of the Contoocook River to the Connecticut River in Lebanon, and had a branch to Hamover. There was a toll-house in nearly every town, the gate in Salisbury being kept by Deacon Daniel Parker. Amos Pettengill, of Salisbury, carried this corporation, by his personal influence, through many a dark day. He invented a snow-plow that was often drawn through the deep snow by thirty yoke of oxen, cutting a path a rod wide.

In 1810 an order was issued by the court declaring the southern portion of it free to public travel, Salisbury paying the corporation six hundred dollars as its share of indemnity to the stockholders.

The first important bridge in the town was built over the Blackwater River in 1776, and was probably on the line of the south rangeway where it crosses the stream. The second bridge was over the same stream, but on the centre rangeway. It cost thirty-nine dollars, and was built in 1777.

The first bridge over the Pemigewasset River was built in 1802, thereby affording the means of communicating with Sanbornton. Previous to this the stream was crossed either by ferries or by fording the stream with teams, the crossing being just north of the Republican bridge.

An act of incorporation was obtained in 1800 for building a bridge over the Penigewasset River, which, in later years, was called Republican bridge. Ebenezer Webster was authorized to call the first meeting, and the bridge was built at the above date (1802). The bridge was carried away by the great February freshet of 1824, and the great winter freshet of 1839 again demolished it. The following summer the present bridge was erected at a cost of seven thousand dollars. It continued a toll-bridge until 1845.

In 1800 there were two ferries over the Merrimack, —the upper one known as Wise's, and farther down stream was Cross's. They furnished communication with this town, Northfield and Canterbury.

It is generally understood that the first saw-mill in the town was the Webster, or proprietors' mill, located on Punch Brook. At a meeting of the proprietors held March 22, 1759, a committee was chosen to lay out one hundred acres of land to Captain John Webster for building a saw-mill. The site was located and the mill completed by the 1st of October, 1761. The mill was erected on land belonging to Ebenezer Webster.

One-half the use of the mill was voted to Captain John Webster for three years, he to saw the proprietors' lumber at the halves, keep the mill in good repair, and, at the expiration of three years, to leave the mill in good repair. Ebenezer Webster and Elihalet Gale were each voted a quarter-share of the saw-mill on the same conditions as given Captain John Webster. November 3, 1764, it was voted to give Ebenezer Webster the use of the mill for three years from date, he to saw the proprietors' lumber at the halves. Mr. Webster continued to conduct the mill until his removal to his interval farm, when Stephen Sawyer, conducted it in connection with the grist-mill, and, in addition, put in a clothing-mill.

In 1764 efforts were made to build a grist-mill, and the year following two hundred acres of land were voted to the projectors (who were Benjamin Sanborn and Ebenezer Webster) to put in a mill. This mill was built in one end of the proprietors' saw-mill, and for many years did all the grinding, not only for the settlers of this lot, but the surrounding towns, people bringing their corn from Ferrystown (now Sutton) on their backs. It is said the mill-stones were drawn up from below on an ox-sled in the winter of 1765.

Andrew Pettengill was the first blacksmith in the settlement, his shop standing just east of Thomas D. Little's residence.

The first hotel in town was erected at the South Road as early as 1768, and was owned by Lieutenant Andrew Pettengill. The first one at the Centre Road was built by Abel Elkins, and is now occupied as a residence by Caleb E. Smith.

The first hotel at the East village (now Franklin) was built by Ebenezer Eastman on the site of the present "Webster house."

It is traditional that Major Stephen Bohanon had the first store in town, it being situated in one of the front rooms of his dwelling, which stood on the site now occupied by the Congregational parsonage. He sold out to Andrew Bowers.

The first store at East village (now Franklin) was erected by Ebenezer Eastman previous to 1803.

William Hoyt had the first store at the Lower village (now Orphans' Home, Franklin).

The above were the first stores in the several parts of the town, but the principal store, and the one which continues to do the largest business, is the old Greenleaf store at South Road, owned by David G. Bean, and conducted by Andrew E. Quimby. In 1793 there were five merchants scattered throughout the town, who paid the following taxes on stock in trade: John C. Gale, £300; William Hoyt, £130; Luke Wilder, £250; Andrew Bowers, £180; Nathaniel Noyes, £50.

The following list contains the names and short notices of gentlemen who have practiced their profession in the town.

Lawyers.—Hon. Thomas W. Thompson commenced practice in Salisbury in 1790, continuing till 1810.

Parker Noyes, Esq., admitted to the bar in 1801, and, with the exception of two years, continued in practice until his death, in 1852.

Hon. Moses Eastman, A.M. (see biography).

Thomas H. Pettengill, Esq., practiced at the Centre village from 1822 until his death.

Hon. Richard Fletcher, A.M., LL.D., continued in practice from the time he was admitted to the bar till 1819.

Samuel I. Wells, Esq., admitted to the bar in 1819, began practice in Salisbury, continuing until 1836.

Hon. Geo. W. Nesmith, LL.D. read law with Parker Noyes, Esq.; admitted to the bar in August, 1825, continuing in town till Franklin was formed, when he became a resident there.

Physicians.—Dr. Joseph Bartlett, the first physician in Salisbury, was born at Amesbury, Mass., January 14, 1751; read medicine with his uncle, Governor Josiah Bartlett; removed to Salisbury about 1772, continuing until his death, September 20, 1800.

Dr. Joseph Bartlett, born in Salisbury, 1775, read medicine with and succeeded his father in practice. He died 1814.

Dr. Peter Bartlett, brother to Dr. Joseph, Jr., attended lectures at Dartmouth Medical School; received his degree in 1829; began practice in Salisbury as early as 1818; continued until 1836; removed to Peoria, Ill.; died 1868.

Dr. Jonathan Kittredge, of Canterbury, began practice in Salisbury about 1819, continuing until his death, 1819.

Dr. Job Wilson, of Gilmanton, located at Salisbury previous to 1814, remaining till 1834, when he removed to Franklin.

Dr. Thomas W. Wilson, born in Salisbury, 1806; attended lectures at Dartmouth, continuing in practice at Salisbury until his death, in 1861.

Dr. Moses Hill, of Warner, began practice in Salisbury in 1836, remaining one year.

Dr. Benjamin E. Woodman, of Salem, N. H., removed to Salisbury in 1836, remaining one year.

Dr. Jesse Merrill, F.M., M.S., of Peacham, Vt., began practice in that part of Salisbury now Franklin about 1819, remaining quite a period.

Dr. John Proctor was in town and practicing his profession in 1829.

Dr. John Baker, born in Salisbury, 1792; began practice previous to 1841, continuing until 1851.

Dr. Calvin Bachelder was here a short time about 1842.

Dr. Abraham H. Robinson, born in Concord, graduated at Yale College; removed to Salisbury early in 1829; removed to Concord in 1859.

Dr. Charles B. Willis, 1859-63.

Dr. Charles H. Towle came to Salisbury in 1865, remaining until December, 1868; removed to Deerfield, and there continues.

Dr. Warren W. Sleeper, of New Hampton, 1853 till 1875; continues at Franklin Falls.

Dr. Edward B. Buxton, born in Dunbarton,—1875-78.

Dr. George P. Titcomb, of Boscawren, removed to Salisbury in 1868, where he still continues.

Dr. John J. Dearborn, of Concord, removed to Salisbury in the spring of 1878, continuing till December, 1881, when he removed to Tilton.

Biographical Sketches.—The following sketches are of natives of the town, unless the place of birth is given different. (See also Physicians.)

Joseph Bean, son of the grantee Joseph, born at Kingston; commissioned justice by the crown previous to his removal here. He was the wealthiest and most important man in the early settlement, the first town treasurer, and held all the town offices at different periods. He died June 1, 1804; married Betsey Fifield. She died June 25, 1812.

Nathaniel Bean, grandson of Joseph, born in Salisbury, March 5, 1796; always remained in town, taking a prominent interest in its affairs. He was the oldest delegate to the Constitutional Convention in 1876, and was a man of wealth and sociability. He died January 18, 1877, leaving a widow.

Sinclair Bean, a native of Brentwood, removed to the west part of Salisbury in 1766, and, with the exception of the Maloons, was the first settler at that part of the town. He was the town's first clerk, holding the office four years, and was an elder in the church. He died February 21, 1798; married, July 18, 1739, Shuah Fifield.

Rev. James Morey Bean, born in Salisbury, November 18, 1833; great-grandson of Sinclair; attended the New Hampshire Conference Seminary and the Theological Seminary now located at Boston; began preaching in 1862, and since continued; married Mary Trussell.

Rev. John Wesley Bean, born in Salisbury, June 17, 1836; brother to the former; attended the Methodist Biblical Institute; was made elder in 1875, continuing in the ministry. Both are meeting with good success in their calling; married (second) Sarah B. Saunders, of Grafton.

Rev. Julius Cesar Blodgett, born in Salisbury, March 6, 1806; completed his education at the Salisbury Academy; ordained a minister of the Christian denomination at Sudbornton, in January, 1830. In 1845 he became editor of the Christian Herald, then published at Exeter. He spoke with great force and energy, and was a very efficient revivalist. His active labors covered a period of forty-three years. He died at Kensington, March 26, 1878. Married, September 3, 1837, Abigail C. Shaw, youngest daughter of Rev. Elijah Shaw.

Joseph Bartlett, M.D. (see Physicians), born at Amesbury, Mass., January 14, 1751; married, December 16, 1773, Hannah Colcord, of Kingston. He was the first of the family that settled here and his descendants have been among the most prominent men of the State. He died September 29, 1800; she died August 29, 1829.

Joseph Bartlett, M.D. (2d), read medicine with his father, whom he succeeded in practice, and died November 6, 1806, aged thirty-one years.

In 1842, Mr. Couch felt himself called to preach the gospel as an Adventist and has since labored with great success. In 1870 he was chosen senior editor of the Bible Banner, published in New York. In 1873 he was elected editor of the World's Crisis, an eight-page weekly paper published at Boston; married, first, 1855, Almada Greeley; she died May 17, 1870; married, second, Maria G. Pickering.

Hiram Morrill Couch, M.D., born February 16, 1818; educated at the Salisbury Academy and Warwick (Vt.) University; read medicine with Dr. A. H. Robinson, at Salisbury, and Dr. Timothy Haynes, at Concord; graduated at Dartmouth Medical School in 1847; began practice at Georgetown, Mass., where he died December 22, 1862; married Mahala Tilton.

Hon. Joel Eastman, born February 22, 1798, and was the son of Joel and Betsey (Pettengill) Eastman; fitted for college at Salisbury Academy and graduated at Dartmouth, 1824; read law with Samuel I. Wells, at Salisbury, and Hon. William C. Thompson, at Plymouth. After being admitted to the bar, in 1827, he located at Conway. The same ability and studious habits which caused him to rank second in his class at Dartmouth soon gave him success as an eminent lawyer throughout the State. In politics he was a Whig, and was a clear, eloquent and persuasive stump-speaker. He was elected to the Legislature in 1836, 37, 38, 53, 54, and 55. In 1839 he was delegate to the Harrisburg National Convention, and on his return he took the stump for the ticket; appointed United States district attorney in 1841, and was succeeded by Hon. Franklin Pierce, judge of Probate for Carroll County, in 1856, continuing until disqualified by age, in 1868. In 1861 he was a candidate for the Republican nomination to Congress, but on account of a severe storm and the non-arrival of his friends, Hon. Gilman Marston received the nomination and was elected. In 1863 he was nominated for Congress, but was defeated by Hon. Daniel Marcy, the Democratic candidate.

He was a man of vigorous mental and physical constitution, and at the age of eighty-five had not retired from practice. He died at Conway, March 16, 1885; married, December, 1832, Ruth G. Odell, of Conway; she died April 8, 1880.

Patrick Henry Townsend, born October 20, 1823; entered Phillips Exeter Academy. In the fall of 1848 he entered the junior class at Bowdoin College and graduated with honor in 1850; read law with Hon. Amos Tuck, Hon. E. B. Washburn and was admitted to the bar. His was a very eventful and noted life. He died very suddenly at Washington in May, 1864.

Dr. John True, A.B., son of Deacon Jacob True, born April 9, 1789; graduated at Dartmouth College in 1806; read medicine at Concord and at Dartmouth Medical School; began practice at Haverhill, Mass.; thence removed to Tennessee, where he died in 1815.

Walter Wells, son of Samuel I. Wells, Esq., born in 1830; graduated at Bowdoin College in 1852 with high honors; died at Portland, Me., April 21, 1881; married Mary Sturdivant. He was a teacher and lecturer on educational topics, particularly of a scientific nature. In 1867 he took charge of the hydrographic survey of Maine. He wrote a work entitled, "Water-Power of Maine: an Elementary Physical Geography," an elaborate and exhaustive report on the relation of the tariff to the growth and manufacture of cotton in the United States.

William Coombs Thompson, son of Hon. Thomas W. Thompson, born March 17, 1802; graduated at Dartmouth in 1820; read law and admitted to the bar in 1824, beginning practice at Concord; removing to Plymouth in 1826. In 1852 he removed to Worcester, Mass., where he died April 27, 1877. Married, first, Martha H. Leavett; second, Susan B. Nelson.

Charles E. Thompson, a brother of the former, born June 19, 1807; graduated at Dartmouth College in 1828; read law one year; traveled in South America and the South Seas for three years; returned to Mobile, Ala., where he was in trade; completed his law studies with his brother at Plymouth and admitted to the bar in 1838; began practice at Haverhill, continuing till 1854; resides at Cresskill, N. Y.; married Mary, daughter of Hon. Miles Olett.

Henry Lyman Watson, M.D., read medicine with Hon. Leonard Eaton, M.D., at Warner; graduated from the Vermont Medical School in 1848; has practiced at Stewartstown, Guildhall, Vt., and for the last fourteen years at Littleton; has been a member of the Legislature and postmaster; also filled numerous positions of honor and trust, both public and private; married, first, Roxana Hughes; married, second, Mary J. Hardy.

Irving A. Watson, M.D., born September 6, 1849; read medicine and graduated from the Vermont Medical University in 1871; practiced at Northumberland ten years, representing that town in the Legislature. In 1881 he removed to Concord, where he was made permanent secretary of the State Board of Health, filling the position with great satisfaction; married Lena A. Farr, of Littleton.

Hon. Ebenezer Webster, also known as Captain, Colonel and Judge; son of Ebenezer Webster; born at East Kingston, April 22, 1739 (O. S.); married, first, Mehitable Smith; married, second, Abigail Eastman, a woman of clear and vigorous understanding, of more than ordinary common sense, and took great delight in debating any subject; a woman of high spirit, proud of her children and ambitious of their future distinction. Young Webster, like many young men, was bound out to learn a trade, but his master proving a tyrant in every sense of the word, young Webster ran away and went to live in the family of Colonel Ebenezer Stevens, for whom the town was named (Stevenson). Mr. Stevens dying soon after, Webster continued in the son's (Major Ebenezer Stevens') family. When Webster became of age (1760) he located in the town and built him a log house; marrying in 1761, he brought his wife to the new settlement, where they continued to reside, and eventually became the owner of some two hundred and twenty-five acres of land. About 1785-86 he removed to the Lower village and built a two-story tavern, with a two-story ell; here he remained till 1799, when he exchanged his tavern with William Haddock for the latter's dwelling on the opposite side of the street, where he died in 1806, and now known as part of the Orphans' Home at Lower Franklin. The first saw and grist-mill was located on Mr. Webster's land, just east of his log house. On the expiration of the proprietors' lease, Mr. Webster became the owner, and conducted them a number of years. He held his first public office in 1764. At the first meeting after the town's incorporation he was chosen moderator, holding the office forty-three times. In 1769 he was chosen selectman, and held the office nine years. In 1778-80 he was elected representative of the classified town of Salisbury and Boscaawen, and from Salisbury in 1790-91, and Senator for the years 1785, '86, '87, '88, '89, '90, '91; judge of the Court of Common Pleas from 1791 until the time of his death, in 1806. He was one of the delegates to Exeter to the convention which met to form a permanent plan of government, and at the second convention voted for its adoption, prefacing his vote by a speech characteristic of the man. He was the town's first justice of the peace. In church matters he exercised great influence, and was a member in good standing. No citizen of the town did more valiant fighting or was in the service longer than Colonel Webster. As an officer, he was beloved by his soldiers, and set the good example of being found in the front of his men, and in the thickest of the fight. He was born to command, of cool, steady nerve, and possessing good judgment. Many pages might be written of the doings of this noble man.

Hon. Ezekiel Webster, son of Colonel Ebenezer, born March 11, 1780. The first nineteen years of his life were spent upon the farm. When it was decided that he should enter Dartmouth, two terms were spent at the Salisbury Academy; thence to Dr. Wood's, where in nine months he fitted for college, entering Dartmouth in 1801 and graduating in 1804. Read law with General Sullivan and Parker Noyes, entering the profession in September, 1807, at Boscaawen, where he continued. He was finely proportioned, six feet tall, and of light complexion. As a lawyer he possessed few equals. A wise counselor and an able advocate. In debate he was dignified and courteous. His weapons were strong arguments clothed in simple yet elegant language. While arguing a case in court at Concord, he suddenly fell back and immediately expired, April 19, 1829; married, first, Alice Bridge; married, second, Aelsah Pollard, who still resides at Concord.

Hon. Daniel Webster, born in Salisbury January 8, 1782, brother of the former. So many volumes have been printed, orations and memoirs delivered on this great man, that we do not feel competent to say anything farther. As a child Daniel was weak, and it was thought by his parents that he never would be able to perform manual labor; consequently, from the first his education was begun; his first public instructor was Master Robert Hoag; his second, James Tappan. When fourteen years of age he spent six months at Phillips Academy, Exeter; after his return he went to Dr. Wood's, at Boscaawen; here he fitted for Dartmouth College, entering in 1788 and graduating in 1801, with high honors. After teaching at Fryeburg, Me., he returned to Salisbury in September, 1802, and began the study of law with Hon. Thomas W. Thompson, continuing till July 1804, when he went to Boston, completing his studies under Hon. Christopher Gore, and in the following March (1805) was admitted to the bar; he immediately returned to Boscaawen, opened an office, continuing till September, 1807; turning his business over to his brother Ezekiel, he removed to Portsmouth, and was admitted to the Superior Court of New Hampshire. Continuing at Portsmouth until 1816-17, he removed to Boston, Mass., where he continued. In 1822 he was elected to Congress from the Boston District, and re-elected in 1824. In 1827 sent to Congress, remaining till 1849, resigning the office to accept that of Secretary of State under General Harrison; this office he filled with marked ability until 1843, when he resigned. In 1845 he was again chosen Senator. In 1850, on the death of President Taylor he resigned the Senatorship and became Secretary of State under President Fillmore, continuing until his death, in 1852. His public life may thus be summarized.—Representative in Congress eight years, a Senator in Congress nineteen years, a member of the Massachusetts Constitutional Convention, and five years in the President's Cabinet as Secretary of State. During most of this time his party was in the minority. In the spring of 1839 he visited England, Scotland and France. Dartmouth College conferred the degree of LL. D. He united with the Congregational Church at Salisbury September 13, 1806; married, first, May 26, 1808, Grace Fletcher, died January 21, 1828; married, second, 1832, Caroline Bayard Le Roy.

Captain John Webster, a cousin of Hon. Ebenezer Webster, born 1710; a very prominent man of the town, to which he removed very early; he kept the fort at Boscawen, the principal owner of the first mill erected in Salisbury and procured the town's charter; he was very closely connected with the town's affairs, a man universally respected and honored. He died April 29, 1788; married Susannah Snow (?), died 1801, aged ninety-one years.

Humphrey Webster, born December 12, 1789; graduated at Middlebury College (?); served in the War of 1812; removed to Virginia, where he practiced law and died in 1820 (?).

Humphrey Webster, born February 19, 1821; graduated at Dartmouth College, 1844; became a teacher at Springfield, Mass., then at Worcester, then in North Carolina. Previous to the war he took a plantation in that State and died there in 1866; married Eliza Hamilton, daughter of Lucius A. Emery.

Rev. David R. Whittemore, born July 31, 1819; attended school at Draut Academy. In 1842 he removed to Rhode Island, where he was ordained and became pastor of the Free Baptist Church at North Providence. In 1846 he filled the same position for the South Free Baptist Church, at Newport. Resides at Providence. He is extensively known as a great Christian worker and has formed a number of churches. Brightness of intellect, correctness of judgment and positiveness of opinion are traits which make him a wise counselor and a bold leader; married Eliza J. Gilbert.

Rev. Joseph Whittemore, M.D., born in 1813, was ordained pastor of a Baptist Church in Rhode Island, but for twenty years he has practiced medicine at Osage, Iowa.

Jeremiah W. Wilson, M.D., son of Dr. Job Wilson, born January 11, 1816; read medicine and graduated at Castleton (Vt.) Medical School; locating in the village of Contoocook, at Hopkinton, where he continues in a large and successful practice.

Ephraim F. Wilson, M.D., born October 30, 1817; read medicine and graduated at Castleton (Vt.) Medical School in 1845; opened an office at Sanbornton; removed to East Concord in 1849; in 1854 removed to Rockville, Conn., where he enjoyed a large and lucrative practice; married Rhoda Barnard.

Thomas W. Wilson, M.D., born February 16, 1806; married Amanda M. Sawyer; he died in 1861; he completed his medical education at the Dartmouth Medical School; returned to Salisbury and had a large and extensive practice. He first joined the Baptist Church, later the Congregational Church, and was highly respected.

Moses S. Wilson, M.D., read medicine with his father, Dr. Thomas W.; attended medical lectures at Dartmouth, Castleton, Vt., and Harvard Medical Schools, where he graduated in 1849. Opening an office at Warner, he continued until the death of his father, in 1861, when he returned to Salisbury, remaining until his appointment as assistant surgeon of the Seventh New Hampshire Regiment; resigning in the summer of 1864, he removed to Galesburg, Ill., where he died in 1873. Married Mary S. Harvey.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

THOMAS DEARBORN LITTLE.

Thomas Dearborn Little was born in Salisbury, N. H., August 14, 1823. He is a son of Thomas Rowell Little, a native of Newburyport, Mass., and Nancy (Webster), daughter of John Webster, one of the early settlers of Salisbury.

He married, first, November 27, 1851, Susan E., daughter of Robert Smith, M.D. She was born October 2, 1828, in Amesbury, Mass., and died January 31, 1875.

He married, second, Lucy L., daughter of Andrew Davis, of Rutland, Vt. She was born December 26, 1844.

Mr. Little received his education principally at Salisbury Academy, and he subsequently taught school in winter for ten years.

Having a liking for mathematical studies, he studied surveying with his uncle, Rev. Valentine Little, and assisted in the preliminary survey and location of the Northern New Hampshire Railroad, in 1845. He has continued the practice of surveying since that time, as his services have been required.

Although he desired to enter college and get a more liberal education, he yielded to the wish of his parents and remained at the old homestead as a farmer and mechanic.

He was appointed postmaster, under President Lincoln, in 1861, and held the office until he resigned, in 1869.

In 1864 he spent some time in Virginia, in the service of the United States Christian Commission, having charge of Christian Commission headquarters of the Tenth Army Corps, being located on the Bermuda Hundred, about two miles southeast of Dutch Gap.

He has served on the Board of Selectmen several times. In 1869 he was chosen a deacon of the Congregational Church, which office he continues to hold, and has identified himself with the moral and religious interests of the community.

Mr. Little's home is the same that was occupied by his father and grandfather, who came here from Newburyport, Mass., in 1801. It is pleasantly located in the South village, near the Congregational Church with which Daniel Webster united in 1807, and was near the old academy in which Mr. Webster attended school. Such a location, amid the varied and beautiful scenery of these hill-tops, is a fit place for the development of physical and mental powers. They had the following children:

I. Thomas Rowell, born September 19, 1853; married, April 29, 1876, Carrie B., daughter of Lewis A. Hawkins.

II. Charles Webster, born December 20, 1855; died May 6, 1870.

III. Susan Paulina, born July 8, 1858; married, July 13, 1882, Rev. Samuel H. Barnum, son of Rev. S. W. Barnum, of New Haven, Conn.

IV. John Webster, born January 21, 1861; married, November 26, 1884, Hannah M., daughter of the late H. C. W. Moors.

V. Alice Maria, born June 4, 1866.

VI. Robert Smith, born May 7, 1870.

VII. William Dearborn, born January 11, 1874; died November 15, 1874.

VIII. Edwin Dearborn, born September 14, 1878.

¹HENRY PEARSONS ROLFE.

Henry Pearsons Rolfe was born in Boscawen February 13, 1821. His father, Benjamin Rolfe, was also a native of Boscawen. His grandparents, on his father's side, Benjamin and Lydia Pearsons Rolfe, came from Newbury, Mass., immediately after the close of the French War, and settled on the frontier in Boscawen, near the Salisbury line.

His mother, Margaret Searle Rolfe, was the daughter of Rev. Jonathan Searle, the first settled minister of Salisbury. His grandmother, on the maternal side, was the daughter of Jethro Sanborn, a sea-captain, of Sandown, who, to feed our suffering soldiers at Valley Forge, gave a large share of his fortune in exchange for depreciated Continental money, which became worthless, and for which the government never made any return to him or his heirs. Several thousand dollars of this irredeemable scrip came into the possession of the mother of the subject of this sketch, Margaret Searle.

The mother of Mr. Rolfe and Daniel Webster were both pupils of Master Tappan, and for a time were schoolmates. She graduated from Atkinson Academy when it was in charge of the then famous Professor Vose, and after that was a teacher for nine years. She was teaching in Mr. Webster's school district when he returned from his school in Fryeburg. A friendship sprang up between them, and she loved to rehearse, in later years, to her children, how Webster unfolded to her all his struggles and ambitions and his fixed purpose never to be guilty of an unworthy act.

Mr. Rolfe was raised on a farm, and his parents being poor, his education, till his tenth year, was limited to six months yearly in the district school. From ten to sixteen he was allowed only three months of schooling during the winter terms. The winter of his sixteenth and seventeenth year he spent in the woods with his father, driving a lumber team. From that time till he was twenty years of age he enjoyed only nineteen weeks of schooling,—five at Franklin and fourteen at Salisbury Academy.

Such privileges seem scanty in our day, and yet such were his powers of acquisition that at eighteen we find young Rolfe teaching his first district school, an employment which he followed for nine successive winters with unvarying and ever-growing success.

When nineteen, the family moved to Hill, in this State. In 1841, when twenty years of age, he began his preparation for college at New Hampton. He spent three years in the preparatory course, and entered Dartmouth College in 1844. Being obliged to depend upon his own efforts to secure the necessary means to defray the expense of his education, he taught school during the winters of his preparatory and collegiate courses. For several successive seasons he was employed upon Cape Cod, but during his sophomore and junior years he taught for five months each year at Dartmouth, Mass., and three months of his senior year in the same school.

When in attendance upon the college, Mr. Rolfe was exceptionally punctual in the discharge of all his duties. During his senior year he was never absent from a recitation, lecture or other exercise. He asked for no excuse, and met every requisition. Such a record is unusual in college classes, and perhaps stood alone in his own. Mr. Rolfe's student-life was eminently successful, both in the acquisition of mental discipline and scholarly attainments. In 1848 he graduated from Dartmouth with the highest respect of the faculty and the warmest attachment of his class-mates.

Although compelled to be absent, teaching, five months during the first three years of his collegiate course, upon his graduation he received this special commendation from the president of the institution,—

"DARTMOUTH COLLEGE, July 23, 1848.

"This may certify that Mr. Henry P. Rolfe is a graduate of the present year at this college. He is a highly-respected student. His course has been remarkably correct and exemplary. It gives me pleasure to commend him as a good scholar and an upright man. He is a well-qualified teacher, and worthy of the confidence and patronage of any who may have occasion for his services."

After a few weeks of rest he entered the law-office of Hon. Asa Fowler, of Concord, on the 21st of September, and, after two years and a half of study, was admitted to the bar in May, 1851. On admission to the bar he immediately opened an office in Concord, and step by step advanced in professional strength and standing till, in 1869, he was appointed United States attorney for the district of New Hampshire by President Grant, and discharged the responsible and exacting duties of the office vigorously, ably and conscientiously for five years.

During the years 1852 and 1853 he was a member of the Board of Education for Concord, and served as chairman of the board the last year. He was also elected as a Democrat to represent the town in the Legislature of 1853. He was again sent to the Legislature as a Republican to represent Ward 5 in the city of Concord, during the stormy years of 1863 and 1864. This was during the period of war, when the government called for the services of its ablest and most trusted citizens.

In 1859 and 1860 he was the Democratic candidate for State Senator from his district, and during the latter was candidate for Presidential elector for the same party on the Douglas ticket. In 1866 he was appointed postmaster of Concord by Andrew Johnson, but his commission was withheld because he refused to assist in electing Democrats to Congress.

In 1878, Governor Prescott made Mr. Rolfe a member of the commission to take testimony and report to the Legislature what legislation was necessary to protect the citizens in the vicinity of Lake Winnepesaukee against the encroachments of the Lake Company.

An investigation was had and a report made by the commission, and where constant complaint had been made, not a murmur of dissatisfaction has since been heard.

This is no ordinary record and is the evidence of solid merit. Mr. Rolfe has been a patient student, a sound lawyer and a strong advocate. A good cause is safe in his hands, if a suit-at-law can be said to be safe in any hands.

He has often been called to speak before assemblies of his fellow-citizens, political and otherwise. On such occasions he always impresses his hearers with the extent and accuracy of his information, and with his strong and sterling good sense. Mr. Rolfe believes what he says, and says what he believes. His friendships are strong, and he is slow to see faults in those whom he loves.

On the 22d of November, 1853, he married Mary Rebecca Sherburn, daughter of Robert H. Sherburn, of Concord, by whom he has had five children, as follows:

Marshall Potter Rolfe, born September 29, 1854, died August 6, 1862.

Margaret Florence, born January 12, 1858, died May 2, 1858.

Henrietta Maria, born January 17, 1861, died September 22, 1862.

Robert Henry, born October 16, 1863.

George Hamilton, born December 24, 1866.

The fourth child, Robert Henry, is now a graduate of Dartmouth College, class of 1884; and George Hamilton, a lad of eighteen, is pursuing his studies at the Holderness School for Boys, in Holderness, N. H.

In the spring of 1882, Mr. Rolfe nearly lost his life from the kick of a vicious horse. The result of this terrible accident has been the loss of his right eye and a complete prostration of the nervous system, from which he has been slowly recovering. He has not yet regained his former vigor and elasticity, but the original force of his constitution and the sleepless care of his most estimable wife are gradually bringing him back to his professional duties and power. He is resuming his practice, which, at the time of his injury, was quite lucrative.

This brief sketch of life and character has been drawn by an impartial, though friendly hand, and it gives us no ordinary man.

Mr. Rolfe is a man of large frame and unusual gifts of mind. He has led an active, successful life, but in the judgment of the writer, has never yet brought the full strength of his faculties into action. He has a reserve of power which, it is hoped, the future may give him an opportunity to use.

HISTORY OF SUTTON.

BY MRS. AUGUSTA HARVEY WORTHEN.

CHAPTER I.

SUTTON was first granted by the Masonian proprietors of New Hampshire lands November 30, 1749, at Portsmouth. It was called Perrystown, from Captain Obadiah Perry, of Haverhill, Mass., whose name heads the list of the sixty persons receiving the grant, the most of whom were inhabitants of Haverhill, Newbury and Bradford.

Of Perry it is known that he had served in the War of 1744-48, against the Eastern Indians, his name being on record as corporal of the nine men sent by Haverhill at the call of the provincial government.

At a later period, being engaged in Indian warfare, Perry was killed by Indians, and Colonel Josiah Bartlett (Governor Bartlett) became the purchaser of his right in Perrystown.

In the charter the granted township is described as lying west of Kialsarge Hill (so called), containing the extent and quantity of six miles square, adjoining No. 1 (Warner) and No. 2 (Bradford) to the north of said numbers.

No settlement was made in Perrystown till the autumn of 1767, when David Peaslee, from Sandown, moved in with his family.

With all this delay the charter was forfeited and renewed twice. As late as 1773, the conditions remaining unfulfilled, the Masonians demanded of the town a sum of money to prevent its being declared forfeited again, which the town agreed to pay. Colonel Josiah Bartlett and his brother, Major Enoch Bartlett, being security for the town, and using their influence with the Masonians in favor of the town proprietors. Important as was the service he rendered, Governor Bartlett appears not to have been a gainer himself by his Sutton transactions. An autograph letter from him to the proprietors' clerk of Perrystown, under date of 1786, requests that a meeting of proprietors be called to ascertain why the money has not been paid by the town, and that security taken up, adding, "I am unwilling to have it lay any longer against me."

He seems to have been unfortunate in the quality of the lands of which he became possessor in Perrystown. Under date of 1773, the year he assisted in obtaining the new grant, the proprietors, moved probably by considerations of good policy, "Edict that if there is not upon the original Right of Obadiah Perry, now Colonel Josiah Bartlett's, lands fit for settlement, he shall have other lands fit for it, of the undivided lands in town." The committee chosen to examine report that "the First Division Lot is but ordinary, but some lots in town have been settled on meaner land than that, but that the Second Division Lot, we think, will do for a pretty good settlement."

In the charter the Masonians reserve for themselves eighteen rights or shares, which are to be exempt from taxation till sold. The remainder of the land is divided into sixty-three shares,—one each for the support of a minister, for a parsonage and for a school, the remaining sixty shares to be drawn for by the sixty proprietors of Perrystown. Very few of these proprietors ever became settlers in town, and many of their rights were sold for non-payment of taxes.

SETTLERS IN PERRYSTOWN PREVIOUS TO 1780.

- 1767.—David Peaslee and family.
- 1770.—Cornelius Bean, Samuel Bean, Jacob Davis, Ephraim, son of Jonathan Stevens.

1781—Ebenzer Kezar, moderator; Ephraim Gile, clerk; Jacob Davis, George Marten, Samuel Peaslee, selectmen; Peter Peaslee, constable.

1782—David Eaton, moderator; Ephraim Gile, clerk; George Marten, Benjamin Philbrick, David Eaton, selectmen; David Eaton, constable.

1783—Ebenzer Kezar, moderator; Ephraim Gile, clerk; Matthew Harvey, William Pressey, Ephraim Gile, selectmen; Matthew Harvey, constable.

INCORPORATION.

"The Bill for incorporation of Perry-stown, under the name of Sutton, passed the House of Rep's April 9, 1784.

"JOHN DEFEY, Speaker.

"Read in Council three times, and voted that the same be enacted April 14, 1784.

"M. WEAVER, Pres.

"Copy examined by

"E. THOMPSON, Secretary."

In the act of incorporation Ebenezer Kezar was empowered to call the first town-meeting, which was held at the house of Pain Tongue, May 20, 1784. Thomas Wadleigh was chosen town clerk; Jonathan Johnson, Caleb Kimball, Phineas Stevens, selectmen; James King, constable; Silas Russell, Daniel Messer, Benjamin Wadleigh, David Eaton, commissioners to lay out roads; Benjamin Philbrick, Joseph Wadleigh, William Pressey, Asa Nelson, Ephraim Gile, Matthew Harvey, Jacob Mastin, surveyors of highways.

"Fined 60 Lbs. to repair roads, 20 Lbs. to defray Town Charges."

It seems remarkable, at first thought, that, while the new township was yet in its infancy, and all its affairs but a series of experiments, the early settlers should not only have proceeded to organize a sort of home government by calling a town-meeting, but that they should have shown themselves so capable and judicious in the management of town business. It would almost appear that they brought with them the result of actual knowledge and experience in the older and more thickly-settled towns whence they came. Perhaps a few of them did, they serving as the little leaven that leavened the whole lump. Yet, such are not the men most likely to emigrate. If a man's ambition is gratified at home, he is not apt to seek out new fields for its exercise. Therefore, it is to be presumed that our fathers, if they had held the "bird in the hand" in the good old orthodox town of Haverhill, would have valued it more than any possible "bird in the bush" of Perry-stown. It is probable of most of these men, and certain, of course, of the sons who came of age after settling here, that here was their first awakening to the duties of citizenship; that those who, if they had remained at home in a quiet, prosperous community, would have been content to be governed, now felt that the needs of the times required them to govern and manage. So they stepped forward and found, or made themselves, equal to the demands of the hour and occasion. It is certain that one man, who, in affixing his signature to an important document, was compelled to "make his mark," also managed to make his mark most effectually and beneficially on the interests of this town.

All qualities, tendencies and capacities the human soul ever exhibits are inherent in the soul itself, and, more than anything else, great occasions make great men.

It is not possible for us at this day to properly estimate the hardships and inconveniences endured by the early settlers in Perry-stown, so remote from settled towns and so destitute of roads leading thither. Let one try to picture for himself the discomfort of a house made of rough, or even of hewn logs, with no floor but bare earth, or, at best, pieces of bark laid down, and he will probably be willing to own that the mightiest of all civilizing agents in a cold, wilderness country is the saw-mill. Without it the church, the school and the influx of fairly-educated people cannot show their power nor fully wield their rightful influence, since constant bodily discomfort works against us spiritually and intellectually. It was not till the latter part of the decade between 1780 and 1790 that mills were in operation, so that people began to exchange their log dwellings for framed houses. Rough logs laid one upon another did not very effectually keep out the cold or keep in the heat, even when people, as they usually did on the approach of the inclement season, took the hint conveyed in the construction of a bird's nest, and "caulked" their houses with tow or even moss and clay. The chimneys were made of stone and clay, topped out with logs. Yet in these rude dwellings the early settlers lived, and the older children of most of them were born and cradled there.

Mrs. John Pillsbury, daughter of Benjamin Wadleigh, Sr., several years since supplied the following reminiscences:

"The Sutton Wadleighs came from Hamstead. My father's family was the seventh that moved into Perry-stown. They made a log house and we lived in it, but it was cold, and the snow would blow between the logs. So much work was needed on the land that it was more than a year before there was time to dig a well, and we depended on catching rain or melting snow for water. More children were born before we exchanged the log house for a good one, and, in process of time, my parents had twelve.

"When the men went to the lower towns to trade their furs, their families used to go together for safety and companionship—two or three families in a house—and so live till the men returned. Often people gathered in each others' houses and held religious meetings. There was then no saw-mill or grist-mill nearer than Hopkinton,—twenty miles—and my father used to take his bag of corn on his back and go farther to get it ground. When we could do no better, we used to pound our corn in great wooden mortars. The log houses were poorly lighted, of course, on account of the extreme difficulty of procuring and transporting glass, plates of mica, when they could be found of sufficient size, or even oiled paper being sometimes used as its intellectual substitute."

This lady was mother of John S. Pillsbury, who in 1855 emigrated to Minnesota. From 1863 to 1875 he served in the State Senate, and was elected Governor of Minnesota in 1875 and re-elected in 1877 and 1879.

The first framed houses in town were built by James King and William Pressey, on the road from King's Hill to Mill village. The third was built by Jonathan Stevens, of Warner, on the Littlehale place. The first horse in town was brought thither by Ebenezer Kezar, who lived near where the brook enters Kezar's Pond. He was a blacksmith, as was also his son Simon, who, with his family, followed his father, coming from Londonderry.

Ephraim Gile was a tanner,—probably the first.

There was no physician within twenty miles for many years. For more than a quarter of a century Mrs. Cornelius Bean and Mrs. Moses Quimby performed the duties of physicians very successfully.

The first saw-mill in town was built by Ezra Jones about half a mile below the South village, which was known as Jones' Mill. He afterwards built a grist-mill near the same spot, and lived close by, attending both mills.

Moses Quimby came to Perrystown from Hawk. He cut the first tree in the hollow above Mill village, and built the first grist-mill there, carrying on the business till his death, when it passed into the hands of his son-in-law, Daniel Andrew. In process of time they had carding, saw and grist-mills.

A saw-mill was erected by Jacob Davis, Samuel Bean and others, a little above where has since been William Little's clothes-pin building.

Public Roads.—Previous to 1784 no roads had been laid out, except from house to house. The need of public roads had been sadly felt, and formed a considerable impediment to speedy settlement and progress. The first public road built in town of which any authentic record can be found was laid out in 1784, commencing at Fishersfield town line and on by Samuel Peaslee's house; thence over Burnt or Chellis Hill to the bridge at South village; thence on by Ezra Littlehale's and Ezra Jones' to the foot of Kimball Hill; thence over the hill to Warner, passing through the whole width of Sutton diagonally. This became the main traveled road from Warner to Fishersfield and towns above.

About the same time a road was made from New London line on by Deacon Matthew Harvey's to Kezar's Pond; thence on by Daniel Messer's to foot of Gile Hill; thence to the foot of Kimball Hill to intersect with the road before named. This road was the outlet of the town.

Deacon Harvey kept a tavern on a hill north of the pond. Caleb Kimball kept tavern at the same time in the southeast part of the town on Kimball Hill, the newly-opened public roads having made taverns a necessity. Up to 1790 no wheeled carriages had been used, nor were the roads suitable for such. Most burdens were carried on sleds or drays, or on horseback. At that date there were no traders in town, trading being done chiefly at Warner, Salisbury and Hopkinton.

Oxen and Spotted Trees.—When they commenced bringing oxen into Sutton there were not many roads. In most cases the way was indicated by marked trees. When going through a clearing, a man drove his oxen yoked together, and, when they came to woods again, he would take off the yoke and carry it, and let the oxen go singly through the forest. It was noticed that the oxen soon became expert in finding their way along, turning their eyes in all directions in search for the spots on the trees, and following the path thus indicated as well as the men themselves could do.

Representation in the Legislature.—The Convention or Congress of the Province of New Hampshire, assembled at Exeter August 25, 1775, issued an order to the several towns and places in the province for taking a census or "enumeration" of the people, classifying the inhabitants, so as to secure the necessary data whereon to base an adequate representation of them in the Legislature. This census revealed the fact that Sutton and Fishersfield together had only one hundred and thirty inhabitants, as sworn to by Benjamin Wadleigh, who was appointed by the Provincial Congress to take the census. Towns not having enough of ratable polls to entitle them to a representative were, by the Legislature, formed into a class or representative district, contiguous towns, of course, forming the district. In this way Sutton and Fishersfield were, in 1775, classed together, and in 1777 Warner, Fishersfield, Sutton and Andover.

This class remained unchanged till 1785, when Andover was left out, and Sutton, Warner and Fishersfield constituted the class. In 1789, some dissatisfaction having arisen between Warner and the other towns, the class ceased altogether. From that time till 1793 Sutton and Fishersfield appear to have had no representation, as they so state in a petition to the Legislature in that year, they uniting with Bradford in asking to be classed together for that purpose.

Another petition of similar purport the same year includes New London in the request to be classed with the foregoing and is signed by the selectmen of the four towns. These selectmen, in behalf of their several towns, "humbly show that our situation is such that there is not a conveniency in being classed with any other towns for representation, we being about three hundred and sixteen ratable polls in number in the whole. Therefore, we pray that we may have liberty to send two Representatives to the General Court."

The General Court, however, sent an order, about the 1st of March, 1794, that New London and Sutton were classed together to send one representative and directing the selectmen to warn a meeting for that purpose. This class continued till 1803, when, by increase of population, each town was entitled to its own representative.

Ebenezer Kezar, of Ferrystown, represented the classified towns in 1778; Matthew Harvey, of Sutton, represented the class of Warner, Sutton and Fishersfield in 1785; Zephaniah Clark, of Fishersfield, in 1796. With these three exceptions the class, while it continued, was represented by Warner men.

COPIES OF A RETURN OF TOWNS-MEETING IN 1796.

"At a legal meeting holden at the dwelling of Matthew Harvey, in Sutton, by the inhabitants of New London and Sutton March 30, 1796, to wit, for the same purpose, Samuel Messer chosen moderator. The following voted for a Representative to represent said towns in General Court for the present year, as proposed they were unanimously in favor of."

"DEAC MATTHEW HARVEY.

"DEAC TAYLOR, &c. &c."

"VIZ."

"LEVI HARVEY, of Ferrisfield

"LEVI EVERTS, of New London."

Matthew Harvey was again elected in 1798. He died the following year.

From 1803 to 1810, including both years, Sutton was represented by Thomas Wadleigh and again in 1821-22, ten years in all; Jonathan Harvey was representative from 1811 to 1815, inclusive, and five years at a later period, also ten years in all; Moses Hills, from 1816 to 1820, inclusive; Benjamin Wadleigh, in 1823, '24, '25; Ruben Porter, in 1826, '27, '28; John Pressey, 1829-30.

Sutton has, down to the present time, been singularly fortunate in her choice of able, honorable and sagacious men for representatives, of whom lack of space alone prevents especial mention. They have, perhaps, served the town quite as effectually, while their period of service continued, as did those we have named, but have not been made so conspicuous in the history of the town by the repeated re-elections for many successive years, which were customary early in the century and which will probably never again be in vogue.

STATE SENATORS, RESIDENTS OF SUTTON WHEN ELECTED

J. Zephaniah Harvey, in 1816, '17, '18, '19, '20, '21, '22; Asa Paine in 1816 '17; Ruben Porter, 1843-5.

Mails.—The following is a list of subscribers to the New Hampshire Gazette, dated 1803:

"We, the subscribers, agree to take the New Hampshire Gazette for one year, to be paid by quarterly payments, one quarter to be paid in advance. Payment to be made by Mr. Ezra Flanders, store, in Warner."

"Daniel Pice, Amos Pressey, Jonathan Harvey, Benjamin Evans, Harvey Cotton, Joseph Greeley, Thomas Wadleigh, Thomas G. Wells, J. A. King, J. P. G. and B. H. G. Daniel Robins in Philadelphia Hastings, Is. C. Pice, and Messrs Hills, of Sutton; D. W. A. Harvey, J. A. D. Woodcock and Thomas Pike, of New London; Samuel Rogers, of Wendell."

It will be observed that the papers were to be left at Warner, by which it appears that the mail was not extended into Sutton at that early date.

Of the four post routes established by the Legislature of New Hampshire in 1791, two lay through the western part of the State, but the nearest point of approach to Sutton on any route was Andover, nine miles distant. For the transmission of their letters, Sutton people depended much on chance conveyance, being thus compelled to trust to the honor and kind good-will of irresponsible persons. Most store-keepers kept an open rack in plain sight in their stores, in which letters could be deposited. Teamsters and travelers, calling to take a drink,—for all stores in those years had ardent spirit for sale,—would examine the direction on the letters in the rack, take such as were directed to any place through which or near which their route lay, and deliver as directed, or else at some other store near by. For those who did not wish to trust their mail matter to chance conveyance, there remained, of course, the alternative of sending it to Andover, or elsewhere on the route of the post-rider, there to await his coming; for these carriers were empowered to collect as well as deliver. They accomplished their circuitous route to and from Concord every week, going out one way and returning another to accommodate as many towns as possible.

The first mail carrier in Sutton, of whom we have certain knowledge, was a man named Dimond, whose house and pottery, where he at one period manufactured brown earthen-ware, were situated on the Warner road. He performed his journeys on horseback, carrying the mails in saddle-bags, and it was his custom on entering a village to summon the people out to the road to receive their papers, by blowing a horn.

There was established at the South village a post-office previous to 1820, Enoch Bailey being the postmaster. At that period one post-office and one weekly mail sufficed for the whole town. The mail at that time was brought by one Thomas Hackett, of Warner, a lame man, who used to ride in a gig. Afterwards Smith Downing brought the mails.

Not long after 1825 a post-office was established at the North village. Benjamin B. French, afterwards so well known as editor, poet, politician, and in various high positions of public trust in Washington City, but then a young lawyer, having recently come to Sutton to open a law-office (the first in town), was appointed postmaster.

CHAPTER II.

SUTTON—(Continued).

Religions History—School History—Military History.

First Baptist Church.—Not far from the year 1780, Rev. Samuel Ambrose, from Exeter, came to Sutton (then Ferrystown), sent probably by the Warren Baptist Association, in response to a call they had received the year previous for missionaries to labor in this section of the State. He located in Sutton, becoming the recipient of the lot of land which, by a stipulation of the charter, the town was to give to its first settled minister. He gathered a church here in 1752; but of its constituent members there is no record, nor of its formation or dissolution. It is only known that Matthew Harvey was its first deacon.

The labors of Elder Ambrose were not confined entirely to Sutton. He gathered a church in Henniker, which was considered a branch of the Sutton Church, not very numerous as to membership, but which existed for many years, and maintained public worship on the Sabbath, the members meeting where they could, in private houses and school-houses; but no records of its existence were kept. The church in Sutton certainly did a noble work, and became a highly favored body, being especially favored in the work it was permitted to do.

For many years it represented the almost entire religious sentiment of the town. It served as a bond to draw the scattered families together, and showed them that Sunday was something better than simply a day of rest,—that it was indeed the Sabbath of the Lord their God.

This organization, which passed away without leaving any written trace of its existence, was really the nursery of the first germs of spiritual life in the wilds of Ferrystown. Peace and tender love be to its memory!

The people had not been able to provide themselves with a house of worship; they met in each other's houses in winter, and in warm weather sometimes in barns, often traveling many weary miles for the privilege of hearing "the preached word" and strengthening their faith in the better life to come. In all the record of their hard experience which has come down to us there is, perhaps, nothing more touching than these, their early efforts to find God in the wilderness.

Many of the Sunday meetings of the church were held at Elder Ambrose's own house, and not unfrequently people used to come up from Warner on ox-sleds to attend them. Elder Thomas Baldwin, then of Canaan, but afterwards the widely-known Dr. Baldwin, of Boston, was a friend and associate of Elder Ambrose, and occasionally stayed all night at his house, where, with next to nothing between him and the heaven he aspired to, he, according to his own account, found delight in counting the stars through the chinks in the roof as he lay in bed. The house accommodations of the minister were at that early epoch no better than all others; but still he was quite proud to call the attention of the Association to this church that he had gathered in the wilderness, and on one occasion he induced that body to hold their anniversary at his own premises. The religious services were held in his barn. On this occasion there were present Elder Job Seamans, of New London, Elder Baldwin, Elder Otis Robinson and others, perhaps, quite as worthy, though less noted. On the night succeeding this meeting twenty-five persons who could not reach their homes spent the night in the elder's barn.

Near the close of the century Mr. Ambrose requested and received dismission from the town as its minister, though he continued a resident of Sutton till his death, in 1831, at the age of seventy-six years. He was considered sound in doctrine, and an able and energetic man in the field as well as the pulpit, laboring with his own hands on his farm as long as he lived.

After the dismissal of Mr. Ambrose, the church was at times supplied by preachers from abroad, "itinerants," as they were termed. Says Belknap, in his "History of New Hampshire,"—

"In some of the new towns, where the people were not able to support a minister, it was the custom for clergymen of the older towns to make itinerant excursions of several weeks to preach and baptize. Such excursions have always been acceptable and served to keep up a sense of religion in the scattered families."

Of this class, probably, was Rev. Samuel Appleby, who is known to have labored here some time prior to the formation of the now existing church, probably not far from the year 1800. About the same date, also, Elder Rand and Elder Ledoyt, who labored for a short time in Newport, are known to have made such "itinerations" to Sutton.

The present Calvinistic Baptist Church in Sutton was formed November 24, 1803, its constituent members being Joseph Greeley, Jonathan Eaton, Jonathan Roby, John Phelps, Gideon Wilkins, Reuben Gile, Elijah Eaton, James Taylor, Benjamin Fowler, Hephzibah Gillingham, Lucy Davis, Jane Eaton, Sally Fowler, Sarah Parker, Judith Como, Amos Parker, Frederic Wilkins.

Benjamin Fowler was chosen deacon.

This church was the largest in the years 1823 and 1824, when the whole number was one hundred and nine. Since that time there has been a gradual decrease in its membership, as the population of the town has diminished and other religious bodies have arisen.

The following is a list of some of the ministers of the Baptist Church: Nathan Champlin, commenced 1808; Pelatiah Chapin, 1811; William Taylor (native of Sutton), 1814; Reuel Lothrop, ordained 1816; Nathan Ames, 1820; Edward Mitchell, 1826; Stephen Pillsbury (native of Sutton), 1830; H. W. Strong, 1837; Henry Archibald, 1841-48; Charles Nowhall, 1848; Valentine E. Bunker, 1857; Elder Coombs; Elder Eastman, 1873-80; Elder Libbey, present pastor.

Free-Will Baptists.—Organized in 1801, and have maintained their organization ever since, though for many years they did not increase rapidly. They are now a large, respectable and growing body.

Methodists are the least in number of any society in town, though they were in existence as a body since early in the present century.

Adventists.—There were some in town as early as 1841. They organized in 1847. Their number increased steadily for several years.

Spiritualists.—Organized in 1858, and for several years their increase drew largely from the Universalists.

Universalists.—The earliest attempt at association for the purpose of securing liberal preaching seems to have been made in 1817. At that time a few individuals met and formed themselves into a society to be known as the "Universal Friendly Society." They drew up and signed their names to a constitution, the preamble of which declared their belief in the final salvation of all men. It was signed by Thomas Pike, John Harvey, Jr., Joseph Pike, Gordon Huntley, William Bean, Amos Pressey, James Brocklebank, James Brocklebank, Jr., and Eliphadct Gay. This association formed the nucleus around which gathered what afterwards became the Universalist Society and Church.

Since their existence as a society the Universalists have maintained a respectable rank, numerically and morally. Whittmore, Streeter, Ballou and A. A. Miner in earlier years preached here occasionally.

Ministerial Fund of the Town.—Sutton has a fund arising from the sale of lands, which, by charter, were reserved for support of the gospel, the interest of which amounts to sixty dollars a year. Each religious body in town draws annually from this interest a sum proportionate to its numbers. The following table, made out for the year 1868, shows what was at that time the relative strength of each:

Free-Will Baptists drew	$22.54
Calem-stre. Baptists drew	4.67
Universalists drew	14.72
Adventists drew	10.45
Spiritualists drew	4.84
Methodists drew	3.22

The Meeting-Houses.—By a provision of the charter the proprietors of Ferrystown were bound to erect a meeting-house in town within a specified time, but this they never did. Their "Book of Records" shows that the subject was considered in their meetings several times, but the last mention of it is as follows: "Voted that building a meeting-house for the present is let alone."

A rude structure was erected not far from the brook in what is now the Mill village by some of the early inhabitants, which accommodated a few of them, but it was not till 1794 that, by concerted action and subscription of the people, two meeting-houses were built, one at the North village and one at the South, four miles apart, being constructed alike and of the same size, forty by fifty feet, with porches at the ends giving admission to the galleries and other parts of the house, and the whole handsomely underpinned with hewn stone. The gallery pillars and front of the gallery, the communion table, deacon's seat, the pulpit and also the mighty-looking, but deceitful "sounding-board" above it, depending, bell-shaped, from the ceiling, were painted a brilliant green. The pews were square, with the seats hung on hinges for convenience of standing during prayer-time. These meeting-houses were completed in about two years from the time of commencement.

Daniel Page framed the South Meeting-House; John Harvey the North.

It is said that the North Meeting-House was framed from timber that grew on the spot where the house stands. When this house was renewed in 1855 the frame was found to be as sound as when the house was first built. A belfry was added to this church and a bell hung therein, which was rung for the first time on the morning of the 4th of July, 1869.

As is well known, about the close of the last century much inconvenience was suffered on account of the scarcity of money, there being no banks and very little coin in circulation. Nearly all trade and business had to be conducted by barter. In this way were the two newly-built meeting-houses paid for, each subscriber to the fund bringing to the building committee a quantity of grain or corn equal in value to the amount of his subscription, and for which he had given his note of hand at the time of his subscribing. The following are copies of two of these notes:

"SUTTON, Sept. 22, 1794.

"Upon demand, for value received, I promise to pay twelve shillings to the Committee in Rye or Indian Corn at 2s. per bushel; or work at 2s. if called for building a meeting-house at the lower end of Keser's pond so called, as witness my hand,—

"THOMAS WALKER."

"For value received I promise to pay to the committee—Samuel Bean, Mathew Harvey and John King—The sum of Four Pounds lawful money to be paid in Neat Stock, or good merchantable Rye or Indian Corn. To be paid the first day of October, 1795.

"BENJAMIN WELLS, Jr."

Minister's Salary.—The following is a copy of an ancient paper, entitled "A Rate List," containing what the inhabitants agreed to give Rev. Mr. Ambrose for the year 1788. The fractional sums set against each man's name seem at first thought almost whimsical; but, without doubt, the amount of the subscription was to be paid in a specified number of pounds, gallons or bushels of farm produce, and that its estimated value was put upon the paper:

Peculiar Use of the Word "Gift."—In town-meeting in 1804, "Voted to pay Benjamin Fowler Three Dollars, it being for procuring a Gift to preach the gospel." "Gift" meant a gifted brother or preacher.

Taxing the Proprietors' Lands to assist in paying for the Meeting-Houses.—An attempt to compel the owners of reserved rights of land to assist in this work was made by petition to the Legislature in 1795, to empower the town to assess a tax on the same for that purpose. This was probably the origin of "the Cent Tax," occasionally referred to in the town records of the early part of this century. The petition is inserted verbatim in this sketch, because it contains a good description of the "broken and mountainous" town of Sutton, and of the struggles of its early settlers, who can tell their own story better than any one living, as we do now, nearly a century later.—

"To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives at Concord, convened January 1st, 1795:

"Your petitioners humbly show, in behalf of the town of Sutton, that they labor under many great inconveniences by not having a Meeting-House in Sutton. We would beg leave to inform your Honors that the Proprietors of said town obligated themselves to build a Meeting-House in a certain time, which contract was never done in the least title. And, our town being seven miles and eighty rods in length, and but five miles in width, being mountainous and extremely broken, which causes the repair of our roads to be a great cost; And, the centre of said town being so inconvenient, the land poor and broken for two miles each way—not fit for settlements—and no leading road by said center, so that a meeting-house there would be useless for a great part of the year. There are two main roads already laid out, leading through each end of the town, which serve the country and the inhabitants of the town better, to build two meeting-houses—one on each main road—which, we think, will better accommodate the inhabitants. Upon this consideration we have gone forward to build two small meeting-houses; and we think when they are completed they will raise a higher value on all the lands in said town. Therefore we beg leave to inform your Honors that whereas there are some gentlemen that own large tracts of land in said town who never gave away any part of their lands for settling, who are non-residents, and the inhabitants have been making farms by their lands, and roads through their lands, raising the value of their interest by our industry, and have undergone great fatigues and distress in settling said town, being poor. Therefore, we pray your Honors would take into your wise and prudent consideration our case, and empower said town to lay a tax upon all the non-improved lands of three pence per acre, to be laid out in building said Meeting-Houses, to be equally divided between them, or any sum you, in your wisdom, shall think proper. And your humble petitioners, &c.

Schools.—By charter, the proprietors of the township of Perrystown were required to reserve one right (that is, one one hundred acre lot, and one one hundred and sixty acre lot) of land for the support of schools, but there was no stipulation made regarding the establishing of the same, and there is nothing on their book of records to show that they, as proprietors, ever made any effort to do so. Their burdens were very great. Although their land had been granted to them on favorable terms, their outlay far exceeded their income, and many of the proprietors, weary of paying money where there was no prospect of return, suffered their proprietary rights to be sold for taxes, and, therefore, it is not probable that they taxed themselves to maintain public schools.

The settlers, also, had many hardships to bear, many and heavy labors to perform, but having been, most of them, reared in the lower and longer-settled towns, where they had opportunity to acquire, at least, enough of education to know its value, they would not let their children grow up in ignorance.

The first instruction the children received was, without doubt, from their parents; but, in a few years, after the settlements commenced, individual effort and private subscription accomplished something in the way of establishing schools.

Very few school-houses were built before the close of the last century, schools being "kept" in apartments in private houses, the scholars' seats being simply boards resting on blocks of wood, without backs or desks. The first school in the South District was kept in a chamber in the house of Esquire Thomas Wadleigh, the teacher being Master Garvin, perhaps from Lempster, and the school being composed of all grades and ages from little children to young men fitting for college. Matthew Harvey, afterwards Judge Harvey and Governor of the State, attended that winter, 1798, he being then about sixteen years of age. The next winter the South School-house was in existence, and Master Garvin taught there. Dilworth's Spelling-Book was used, "The Young Ladies' Accidence" for grammar, and the "Third Part" for reading; the best readers read in Morse's Geography, and the teacher questioned them afterwards. One authority says,—

"I know something regarding the books used at that period and some years later, having often seen them in the old homes where I have visited. There was Webster's Spelling-Book, Alexander's Grammar, Pike's Arithmetic, Perry's Dictionary. For reading-books prior to the days of the English Reader were The American Precursor, Morse's Geography, and The Third Part, though of what or whom it bore that proportion I do not know."

The first school-master of whom we can glean any account, through either tradition or written record, was Robert Hogg, a Scotchman by birth. Whatever attracted him to Sutton is not known, but being here, and, finding in the untought condition of the children of the settlers a favorable opening for the school-master, he turned his "wee bit of learning" to account for his and their profit. His stock of books consisted of a spelling-book, a Bible and an old catechism. Arithmetic he taught verbally, and demonstrated it by the use of the fingers, kernels of corn and a piece of chalk.

But if the teacher had few books, the scholars had fewer; none, in fact, unless, as a special indulgence, they were allowed the use of the family Bible or rude psalm-book of the day in the exercises of the school.

A stray leaf from an old volume, or even a piece of a torn newspaper, often did duty in place of the modern invention of school-books. He was a severe disciplinarian, and the slightest infraction of the laws of the school was visited upon the offender with as severe a punishment as birch could inflict with safety, causing the offender to feel that knowledge is indeed bought with suffering, and almost forcing him to believe that the cautionary threat given to the dwellers in Eden, "In the day that thou eatest of the tree of knowledge thou shalt surely die" would be literally fulfilled in his individual experience.

The following is an exact copy of one of Master Hogg's receipts:

"March 21, 1792.

"Then my son Robert Hogg received seventeen bushels of Rye from Simon Kezar, of Sutton, which was due to me for teaching & looking two months in Sutton.

"Per me, ROBERT HOGG."

The following is a school-mistress' receipt:

"MERRIMACK, Feb. 1, 1791.

"Received of Jacob Mastin and Hezekiah Parker six bushels of Rye, it being in full for my keeping school for them and others last fall six weeks in Sutton.

"LADY PARKER."

In 1786, two years after incorporation, Sutton, in its corporate capacity, made its first appropriation, twelve pounds, for support of schools. Of this sum, each school, of course, received its proportionate share; but it is evident that private subscription was still needed to make the school terms long enough to be of much profit, and not infrequently they were lengthened in this way. The "six weeks" and "two months" specified in the above receipts might have been additional to the time already paid for by the town appropriation. No district lines had been as yet established. The few school-houses that were built previous to 1808, had been placed where they would accommodate the most families. The first permanent division of the town into school districts was made by a committee chosen by the town for that purpose in 1808, in obedience to the new school law passed by the Legislature that year. The law also provided for the establishment of a superintending school committee, which, with the more liberal appropriations by the town for support of schools, produced decided advancement in discipline and acquirements of the scholars.

The right of land reserved by the proprietors for school purposes, according to a stipulation in their grant of the town, was sold under the direction of the town, and the proceeds of the sale constitute the original school fund.

Some teachers who are remembered were Benjamin Colby, Esq., late of Springfield; Deacon Benjamin Fowler, late of Orange; Hon. Jonathan Harvey; Colonel Philip S. Harvey; Rev. Stephen Pillsbury, late of Derry; Captain John Pillsbury, late of Sutton; Judge Moses S. Harvey, late of Painesville, Ohio; Hon. Charles Hudson, a late member of Congress from Massachusetts.

The first female school-teacher in Sutton was Olive Whitecomb, afterwards wife of George Walker. She taught school in Deacon Asa Nelson's barn about the year 1788.

Deacon Benjamin Fowler taught school in a room in the house of Samuel Bean, an early settler.

For many years after the settlement of the town teachers' wages were from six to eight dollars per month, besides their board, which was given in by the families, each one giving according to the number of scholars sent, and the teacher "boarding around" among them.

Female teachers received from fifty cents to one dollar per week, which amount they sometimes added to by spinning between school-hours for the families where they boarded, often in this way earning another half-dollar a week.

The catechism spoken of as being in use, both in schools and in families, was the "Shorter Catechism of the Westminster Assembly of Divines," and was found in the "New England Primer."

"The Young Ladies' Accidence" was a grammar prepared by the Rev. Caleb Bingham, a graduate of Dartmouth College in 1782. He established a school for young ladies in Boston in 1785, soon after which, seeing the great need of such a book, he prepared and issued this one, which had an immense sale, passed through twenty editions, one hundred thousand copies being sold. He also was author of "The American Preceptor," "The Columbian Orator" and other school-books; one million two hundred and fifty thousand copies of his books were sold.

Thomas Wadleigh Harvey, son of Moses S. Harvey, who emigrated from Sutton to Painesville, Ohio, was for several years superintendent of schools for the State of Ohio.

Lydia Wadleigh, daughter of Judge Benjamin Wadleigh, eminent as a teacher during many years of her life, has, for a long period, held the position of superintendent of the Female Normal College in New York City.

General John Eaton, son of John Eaton, was for some time superintendent of education in Tennessee, and was subsequently appointed by General Grant superintendent of the National Board of Education, which post he still holds.

Addaide Lane Smiley, daughter of Dr. James R. Smiley and granddaughter of Dr. Robert Lane, has been for many years the honored lady principal at Colby Academy, in New London.

William Taylor, a Baptist clergyman, and son of Captain James Taylor, of Sutton, was largely instrumental in the establishment of the New Hampton Baptist Institution, and, at a later period, of a similar institution in Michigan.

SINGING-SCHOOL.—Captain Matthew Buell, of Newport, taught singing-schools in Sutton many years, about the close of the last century and afterwards. He used to teach three afternoons and three evenings in a week while the term continued—one day at Matthew Harvey's tavern, one day at Enoch Page's tavern and one day at Caleb Kimball's tavern.

His schools became one of the greatest social institutions of the winter season, and were looked forward to with much interest, at a period when young people in Sutton were so numerous that some school districts which are now so reduced as to be merged into others numbered one hundred scholars every winter.

The recess between the afternoon and evening school afforded a fine opportunity for the young men to display their gallantry to the girls by treating them to a supper of such good things as the tavern afforded. "On one occasion," says our informant, "Captain Buell's Newport school, by special invitation, came down to visit the Sutton school; had a supper together, and a fine entertainment, every way."

Military History—THE MILITIA.—When the new State Constitution was adopted, in 1792, it contained important provisions for regulating the militia. At its next session the Legislature passed an act, December 27, 1792, for arranging it into companies, regiments, brigades, divisions, and these were to drill two days in a year. Each regiment was composed of two battalions, the regiment being commanded by a lieutenant-colonel and the battalions by majors. The Twenty-first Regiment was thus constituted: First Battalion,—Boscawen, Salisbury, Andover, New London, Kearsarge Gore (Wilnot); Second Battalion,—Hopkinton, Warner, Sutton, Fishersfield, Bradford.

As the population of the towns increased, a different arrangement, of course, became desirable. In 1797 the inhabitants of Sutton united with the inhabitants of the towns of Warner, Bradford, Kearsarge Gore, Fishersfield and New London in a petition to the Legislature, showing that they all labored under many and great disadvantages by reason of the Twenty-first Regiment being so extensive, and asking relief. The petition states that they are,—

"By law obliged to meet a number of times every year, and once in battalion or regiment, which makes fatiguing journeys and hardships for soldiers, and great expense for officers, to march to and from the centre of said regiment or battalion, and much time is spent and lost by reason of the Parade being at such a distance. Therefore, your petitioners humbly pray your honors to take this their hard case into your wise consideration, and grant them relief by making a division of said regiment in the following manner: 1st. That the companies of the towns of Warner, Bradford and Kearsarge Gore make the first battalion. 2d. That the companies of the towns of Sutton, Fishersfield and New London make the second battalion. So that the above said companies may constitute and make one regiment. Or relieve your petitioners in some other way, as your honors, in your great wisdom, shall think best. And as in duty bound, etc."

Here follow, in the Sutton petition, the names of eighty-four men, most of whom were probably of suitable age to be enrolled (between sixteen and forty years), according to the modification of the militia law, made June 19, 1795. In their petition, however, they style themselves simply "inhabitants of Sutton." Some of the petitioners may have been too old to be liable to do military duty, except in case of alarm; but no one of them, of course, could have been less than sixteen years.—

Benjamin Philbrick, Nathaniel Cheney, Henry Dearborn, John Adams, Samuel Kendrick, Joseph Adams, William Lowell, Jonathan Colburn, David Colburn, Nathaniel Cheney, John Philbrick, Moses Nelson, Thomas Peaslee, John King, George King, Moses Davis, Joseph Clough, Samuel Peaslee, Amos Pressey, Samuel Benn, Silas Russell, Joseph Bean, Isaac Wells, Ezekiel Flanders, John Emerson, Philip Nelson, Isaac Peaslee, Jesse Peaslee, John Pressey, Simon Kezar, Jr., Willard Emerson, George Walker, Joshua Philbrick, Ezekiel Davis, Dudley Kendrick, David Davis, Caleb Kimball, Benjamin Williams, Philip Sargent, Joseph Greeley, John Peaslee, Joseph Chadwick, William Pressey, Ezra Littlehale, Peter Peaslee, Kenien Gale, Ephraim Hildreth, Abraham Peaslee, Enoch Page, John Harvey, Jonathan Roby, Phineas Stevens, Seth Russell, Joseph Young, Joseph Johnson, Benjamin Stevens, Asa Stevens, Peter Cheney, Joseph Stevens, Jonathan Eaton, Theophilus Crane, Elphaliet Woodward, Benjamin Wells, Joseph Flanders, Stephen Woodward, Jonathan Harvey, Matthew Harvey, Jr., Joseph Woodward, David Flanders, Zachariah Cross, Oliver French, David Eaton, Daniel Messer, Joseph Pearson, Jacob Mastin, Heskiah Parker, John Pearson, Samuel Ambrose, Jr., Theophilus Crane, Elphaliet Woodward, Stephen Woodward, Matthew Harvey, Jonathan Davis, Josiah Nichols, William Hutchins.

Soon after this petition, and probably as a result of it, a division of the regiment was made, and then and afterwards Sutton constituted a part of the Thirtieth Regiment till the disbanding of the militia, in 1851.

The "Grenadiers" were organized by Captain John Harvey, perhaps about 1810, and until his promotion commanded by him, when his first lieutenant, Daniel Woodward, took the command. Their uniform consisted of white pants, scarlet coats and tall, conical-shaped, black, shiny, leather caps.

The uniform of the cavalry of the Thirtieth Regiment consisted of white pants, red coats with bell-buttons, a black leather cap ornamented with an eagle on a white shield, with chains and tassels, and a red and black plume.

For many of the first thirty years of this century musters were held at Jonathan Harvey's, in his field opposite his house,—a level field of twenty acres in extent, a high table-land, with not another possessing its peculiar characteristics in our hilly town, perhaps not in any town embraced in the regiment, or even the brigade, of which Sutton constituted a part.

At a later period some musters were held in the Wadleigh field, south of Kezar's Pond.

MILITIA OFFICERS.—As is well known, the rolls of the State militia are imperfect. The following list was furnished by Colonel Asa Page from his own recollection, he being at the time of his death—which occurred recently at Newbury—eighty-six years of age. His eyesight was entirely gone, but he retained his mental faculties to a wonderful degree. He possessed the highest integrity of character, and was universally esteemed. Reference to the record of town-meetings shows him to have served as moderator for twenty-one different years; selectman, twelve years; representative, three sessions (1843, '44, '45); Senator, two sessions (1846-47).

The first company organized in Sutton was about the year 1800, Thomas Wadleigh chosen captain and Joseph Wadleigh lieutenant.

NAMES OF REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

(Most of these served for other towns before they became residents of Sutton.)

Samuel Ambrose, Benjamin Colby, Daniel Messer, Philip Nelson, Daniel Emery, Jacob Mastin, David Peaslee, Nathaniel Cheney, Benjamin Critchett, Simon Stevens, Philemon Hastings, Thomas Walker, George Walker, Francis Combs, Silas Russell, Thomas Wadleigh, John Palmer, Joseph Chadwick, Anthony Clark, Jonathan Roby, Plummer Wheeler, Sen., Dudley Kendrick, James Harvey, Aquilla Wilkins, Jonathan Nelson, Solomon Austin, John Putney, Abraham Peaslee (first), David Peaslee (second), Cornelius Bean, Nathaniel Morgan, James Brocklebank, Jonathan Nelson.

Of the foregoing, Silas Russell and Benjamin Critchett are known to have served for Perrystown (Sutton), as it is found on the record of the town that a committee was appointed at a town-meeting to look after their families during their absence in the service.

NAMES OF SOLDIERS IN WAR OF 1812.

Moses Woodward, Caleb Kimball, Jr., John Kimball, Daniel Emery, James Morgan, James Buswell, Hazen Putney, Thomas Cheney, John Peaslee, Timothy Chellis, James Philbrook, Moses Davis, Samuel Roby, Thomas Davis, Gibson Wells, Joshua Flanders, Thomas Walker (second of the name), Levi Fowler, John Mc-Williams, Jacob Harvey (died in service), Daniel Woodward, Isaac Littlehale, Ephraim Fisk, Beniah Woodward, James Wheeler (died in service), Plummer Wheeler, Jr., Samuel Wheeler, Amos Jones (died in service), John French, Daniel Muzzy, John Colby, Daniel Cheney, James Minot (others), Benjamin Wells, John Philbrook, Jr., Frederick Wilkins.

In 1812 Sutton offered a bounty of two dollars per month, and if called into actual service ten dollars per month, from the time of being called into service, additional to what they received of the State or government, to be paid to the soldiers on demand after their return.

The War of the Rebellion.—The following statistics regarding the men and money furnished by Sutton during the last war were supplied by Moses Hazen, Esq., several years since, and are reliable.

Sutton furnished for the last war in all one hundred and sixty-four men. This number includes the thirty-two men who enlisted without bounty. But as no men were credited by the government till they commenced paying bounties, the number credited to this town is reduced to one hundred and thirty-two men.

Sutton paid in bounty	$35,722.00
Average per man	233.80
Recurring expenses	327.41
Recurring expenses per man	2.48
Total	$36,050.41

In 1868 the town debt was $37,029.80.

In 1853 this war debt of nearly forty thousand dollars was all paid.

CHAPTER III.

SUTTON—(Continued).

The Social Library.—This association was formed in 1796, men from Sutton, New London and Fishersfield uniting for the purpose. By the payment of $2.50 a man could purchase a share, and thus become entitled to the use of the books in the library. The money paid for the shares purchased the books. Sixty-nine names of original proprietors appear on the record, which indicates that they had less than two hundred dollars to commence with. All interested in the library were warned to meet at the house of Matthew Harvey.

"Met and chose Levi Harvey, moderator; Dr. John Cushing, clerk; and Matthew Harvey, librarian.

A committee of nine was chosen to draft a constitution,—viz.: Captain Jonas Hastings, Fishersfield; Elder Job Seaman, Dr. John Cushing, Levi Harvey, Esq., and Lieutenant Thomas Pike, for New London; Benjamin Wadleigh, Captain Thomas Wadleigh, Mr. David Eaton, Lieutenant Asa Nelson, for Sutton.

The following directors were chosen,—viz.: Levi Harvey, New London; Jonas Hastings, Fishersfield; David Eaton, Sutton.

"Voted to pay in the money, what the proprietors can, a fortnight from next Saturday." "Voted, that the Directors shall purchase the books and open the library as soon as $30 are paid in."

This association was incorporated by the Legislature in 1799, and existed till 1868, when the proprietors gave up their rights to the town to help form a town library.

This Social Library contained between three hundred and four hundred volumes, and was of immense benefit to the people, the books being well selected, eagerly sought for and thoroughly read.

Books were scarce at that day, but there were not a few men and women who knew how to appreciate their contents. Many a hard-working man was glad to walk weary miles, and then climb the steep hills to Deacon Harvey's house for the privilege of having a book to read.

None can tell the influence that the perusal of those volumes has had in developing and shaping the minds and characters of Sutton's noblest sons and daughters.

King Solomon's Lodge, No. 14, Free and Accepted Masons.—Date of its charter, January 27, 1802. First meeting in New London, June 16, 1802, at the hall of Jonathan and Daniel Woodbury: John Woodman, Worshipful Master, pro tem.; Levi Harvey, Jr., Secretary; Daniel Woodbury, Treasurer; Richard Cressey, Senior Deacon; Moses Hills, Junior Deacon; Enoch Hoyt, Steward; Joseph Harvey, Tyler; Stephen Hoyt, Benjamin Sweet, Ezra Marsh, Thomas G. Wells, John King, Caleb Lowering, Ebenezer Cressey, members.

Removed to Wilnot Flat December 3, 1851. Removed to Scytchville September 4, 1878.

The Great Tornado, September 9, 1821.—The following description of the tornado was written by the late Erastus Wadleigh, of Sutton:

"Standing on the front of my father's house, Benjamin Wadleigh's, the day being Sunday, about 5 o'clock P.M., we observed black clouds rising rapidly, bearing southeasterly, in the vicinity of Sunapee Lake, accompanied with continuous lightning and roaring. Above and below every thing seemed in frightful commotion.

"The tornado struck Sutton westerly of Harvey's Mills, near the White Lot, passing through Dea, Josiah Nichols' farm, prostrating his entire wood lot, southeast of his buildings, and a short distance to the south, where resided Stephen Woodward and son. After it had passed here, Mr. Woodward and family, to their surprise, were in plain sight of New London Hills, which had ever been hid from them by the intervening woods. From Dea, Nichols' it passed by the south end of Chadwick's meadow, near the bridge, thence a little south of Ira Rowell's, near Critchett's Hill, destroying all the wood on the Edmund Chadwick farm. From Critchett's Hill it passed through the large dense pine-forest of Hon. Jonathan Harvey, above North Sutton village, to the adjoining farms of Dea, Benjamin Fowler and Elder Elijah Watson. At the residence of the latter was a religious meeting, and the room was filled with worshippers. The north door was wide open. Elbridge G. King, then a young man of twenty-two years, sat near the door, and feeling the force of the wind, sprang with almost lightning speed, and with tremendous effort closed the door, and thus, in all probability, saved the house and its inmates from harm. The adjoining barn and out-buildings were entirely demolished and thrown in every direction. Fences, forests and all movable matter were scattered promiscuously. Dea Fowler resided about 50 or 60 rods south. His was a large double two-story house, fronting to the west with an ell on the east.

"The tornado crashed a hole through the north end of the front chambers, tearing away the partitions between the chambers, passing out at the south end, taking all the furniture and movables from them. Some of the furniture was afterwards found in the towns of Andover and Salisbury. The family were in the ell part and were not injured. Near by were the large barn, cider-mill and other buildings, which were blown down and scattered in every direction; only a portion of the hay in the great lay was left. The forest, fences and implements, and all kinds of personal property were destroyed or blown away. The adjoining orchards of Dea, Fowler and Isaac Mastin, near by, were blown over, cattle and other stock were damaged, and everything lay exposed. The tornado then passed to the valuable and extensive wood-lots of Isaac and Jacob Mastin, prostrating as it went fences, fences and everything in its way. Thence it went near the Parker farm, thence southerly near Warner line, east of Daniel Mastin's, through Benjamin Wadleigh's mountain lot, near the 'Gore Road,' at Warner line. We, at home, had no intimation of all its disastrous consequences till Monday morning. A military training was to take place at North Sutton that day, at 1 o'clock P.M. The writer of this, then a boy of thirteen years, attended with his father who was a soldier. After the company was brought into line, Capt. Levi Fowler, son of Dea. Benj. Fowler, informed them of the great need of help that the sufferers by the tornado were experiencing, and said that there would be no military duty required, and such as could go to their relief. The soldiers, boys and all, hastened to the place of distress, rendering such aid as they could. One party, of which the writer was a member, set to work to right up the apple-trees. Some of these trees are yet standing in a bearing condition, standing to the southeast, in the direction in which they were blown.

"The area passed over, doing damage in Sutton, was about ten thousand acres, extending from near the northwest corner of the town, passing almost the entire width diagonally, striking Warner line a little south of the centre of the eastern line of Sutton, a distance of about six miles, which was the centre of the tornado. The damage done in this town could not be less than from six to ten thousand dollars.

"We have merely referred to the remarkable tornado which raged through Sutton. Other portions of the State have been visited by it more accurately than we are able to do. Dea Fowler, through kind offers who suffered most by the tornado, was then past the prime of life, and, becoming disheartened, soon after disposed of his remaining property, and, leaving the scene of his great misfortune, removed to Orange with his son, Merrill, where he had several more children, and where he spent the remainder of his days. By his departure the town lost one of its noblest citizens, and the Baptist Church a strong right arm.

"Governor Harrison, in his 'History of Warner,' says:—'The tornado passed along the northerly part of Sutton, cutting a swath through the forests which is visible to this day.' The woods where this hurricane did its worst damage have to this day been known as 'The Hurricane Woods.'

The Great August Freshet of 1826.—The summer of 1826 had been very dry. With the drought came innumerable grasshoppers, which were, however, swept away by the freshet. On Monday, August 28th, rain began to fall in the forenoon,—occasional showers, accompanied by thunder. From three o'clock till ten P.M. it fell in a continuous torrent, and did great damage to roads and bridges. At the White Mountains occurred the landslide whereby the Willeyes lost their lives. This freshet made great havoc in Sutton, especially in places near the foot of the mountain. The rain-storm lasted but a few hours, but it was more violent than any ever before known. It came down in sheets and floods. The grass and potato-fields in the intervalles were quickly covered with water four feet deep, and so great a deposit of gravel-stones and rocks was left that the fields were then supposed to be ruined, and many of them were not cultivated for twenty years after.

A torrent came roaring down Kearsarge Mountain, bearing along whole trees and rocks weighing tons, tearing out a channel as wide as Connecticut River, and depositing all its frightful burdens in the valleys and intervalles below. It changed the course of one of the main tributaries of Stevens Brook from the Warner to the Blackwater River. It carried away a log house and a saw-mill from the base of the mountain so entirely that no vestige of them met the owner's eyes next morning. It filled Merrill Roby's yards with stones, washed away every part of the foundation stones of his house, and deposited a pair of cart wheels in place of them. The awful gulfs and ravines created by this freshet are not even now obliterated.

Centenarians of Sutton.—Francis Como (a native of Canada), supposed to be aged 100; Mrs. Mary Bean, wife of Samuel, died in 1811, aged 100; Mrs. Sally Philbrook, mother of Benjamin, Sr., died in 1813, aged 100; Jacob Davis, died in 1819, aged 105; Thomas Walker, died in 1822, aged 103; Nathaniel Eaton, died in 1875, aged 100; Cesar Lewis, died in 1862, aged 100; Anthony Clark, aged 107; Benjamin Philbrook, Sr., aged 99; Mrs. Jacob Davis, died in 1819, aged 99; Sally, wife of Thomas Burpee, died in

1839, aged 99; Joseph Johnson, aged 98; Mrs. Jesse Fellows, aged 97; Samuel Dresser, Sr., aged 97; Mrs. Thomas Peaslee, aged 96; wife of Samuel Dresser, Sr., aged 95; Joseph Wells, aged 95; Nathaniel Cheney, aged 93; Edmund Richardson, 92; widow of Henry Dearborn, aged 91; Jane, wife of Jonathan Eaton, aged 91; Sarah, widow of Daniel Messer, aged 91; Mrs. Nathan Andrew, aged 91; widow of Joseph Wells, aged 91; Sarah, widow of Reuben Gile, aged 90; David Davis, aged 90; Martha, wife of Abraham Peaslee, aged 90; Cornelius Bean, son of Samuel and Mary,—the centenarian,—aged 90; wife of Cornelius Bean aged 95; Jonathan Stevens and wife died within a few days of each other about 1840, aged one 96, the other 97. Their daughter, wife of Jacob Osgood, of Warner, was aged about 100. Jonathan Johnson, died in 1844, aged 90; Ephraim Gile, aged 90; widow of Daniel Dane, aged 90; widow of Jonathan Davis, aged 90; Mrs. Lovejoy, sister to Mrs. Philbrook, above-named, aged over 90; the wife of Thomas Walker, was a Philbrook of the same long-lived family. She died at a very great age, supposed by some to be 100 years. Phineas Stevens, aged 90.

Some of the Earliest Physicians.—Dr. William Martin came to Sutton to practice his profession about 1793, being the first regular physician in Sutton. Married Sally Andrews. Lived in town till he died.

The four following practiced in town about 1800: Dr. Ezra Marsh, who married Sally, sister to Daniel Page. Dr. Thomas Wells, who came to Sutton from Hanover. Dr. Arnold Ellis, who came from Newport. Dr. Crosman, who was preacher as well as physician.

Dr. Lyman practiced some in town in the early years of this century; was among the best of his time. Dr. Benjamin Lovering came about 1816; resided here till his death, in 1824. Dr. John A. Clark succeeded him; was popular as citizen and physician; was chosen town clerk. (For Dr. Robert Lane see biographical sketches.)

The following is a list of some of the earliest magistrates, with date at which they received their commissions:

Benjamin Wadleigh, Sr., 1786; Matthew Harvey, 1798; Moses Hills, 1804; Thomas Wadleigh, 1805; Jonathan Harvey, 1809; Joseph Pillsbury, 1820; Benjamin Wadleigh, Jr., 1823; Enoch Page, Sr., many years, date of first commission not known.

The Samuel Peaslee Lawsuit.—In 1804 the town votes to assist Samuel Peaslee in an action commenced by Dr. Haven against him for the recovery of certain lands sold by him, as collector for the town, for non-payment of taxes. This affair takes us back to 1777, at which time several of the non-resident proprietors being delinquent of paying their taxes, Samuel Peaslee, by right of his office as collector, sold these delinquent rights, and gave titles defending the same against the claims of the former owners. The lots were sold entire to the highest bidder at public vendue. The buyers afterwards sold off parcels of these lands to accommodate settlers, who made settlements and improvements, and, of course, greatly increased their value.

About 1803 the original proprietors commenced action for the recovery of these lands, claiming that the sale was illegal; that due notice thereof was not given, and, in fact, that it was not legally advertised. The town chose a committee—Benjamin Wadleigh, Sr., and others—to assist Peaslee in defending the claims of those to whom he had sold the lands. The settlers meantime were suffering the greatest alarm lest they should lose, not only their original purchase, but all their buildings and improvements thereon.

The case was not decided until 1808,—a long time to be in suspense about one's homestead.

It is probable that the proprietors felt confident that at that late day—nearly thirty years after the sale—there was not in existence a copy of the newspaper containing the advertisement of the vendue, and they were even suspected of having bought up and destroyed all the copies thereof themselves. But the committee spared no pains to find the necessary proof. They rode day and night and searched the whole State through. They even offered fifty dollars for a copy of the paper. At last, when they had almost abandoned hope, they succeeded in finding one paper containing the advertisement, in the possession of a former Governor of the State. This was enough. The whole case turned on that one point, of evidence of the sale being legally advertised. The court immediately decided in favor of Peaslee. The great joy of the settlers may well be imagined.

Natural Features of Sutton.—SURFACE.—Sutton is a rocky, uneven township, on the height of land between the Merrimack and Connecticut Rivers. Along Mill Brook, from New London to Kezar's Pond, except where there are falls, are valuable meadow lands. From Kezar's Pond to the falls above Mill village is a large body of meadow and plain land of even surface, and free from stone. From Mill village to the falls below the South village are valuable meadow lands and also near Roby's Corner. On Stevens' Brook are meadows and other natural mowing lands, valuable for the hay they produce. On Fowler's Brook and its tributaries are productive intervals and meadow lands.

STREAMS.—On the east side of the town is Stevens' Brook, running southerly nearly half the length of the town, entering Warner River a little below Warner village. The main branch of Warner River from Sutton rises in the northwest part of New London, near Sunapee Lake, passing through Harvey's and Minot's or Messer's Ponds and Kezar's mill-ponds to Kezar's Pond or Lake; thence by Mill village and South village to Roby's Corner, where it joins Warner River. Most of the mills in town are on this stream. Jones' mill, the first made in town, was below the South village. Quimby's mill was next made at Mill village. Fowler's Brook, a branch of the Blackwater, is in the northeast part of the town, where were formerly Fowler's and Roby's saw-mills. A stream passes from Long Pond to Warner River, where have been mills.

Ponds.—Kezar's Pond, a beautiful body of water, containing about two hundred acres, is in North Sutton. Early settlers in the vicinity of this pond were Ebenezer Kezar and his son Simon, David Eaton, Matthew Harvey, Samuel Bean, Benjamin Wadleigh, Esq.

Gile's Pond is on a level with Kezar's Pond, about half its size, and not far distant from it. Appearances indicate that they both at some time formed one body of water. Ephraim Gile, Jonathan Davis and Daniel Messer early settled near Gile's Pond.

Billings' Pond is in the southwest part of Sutton; also Russell's Pond, and Peasley's or Long Pond, the latter being about one and one-half miles long. Isaac Peasley, Hezekiah Blaisdel and Jonathan Johnson settled near it previous to this century. Russell's Pond, near Captain Aaron Russell's, contains but a few acres. There are other smaller ponds in town.

HILLS.—King's Hill is about two thousand feet high, being the highest land in town, the very topmost point of Sutton. A part of Kearsarge Mountain lies within the limits of the town, but not its highest point, the town line crossing the mountain at an altitude lower than two thousand feet. Kezar Lake, or Pond, as it is usually termed, is noted for the beautiful scenery around it. This lake lies west of North Sutton village. Approaching King's Hill from North Sutton, the excursionist passes Kezarville, on the north end of the lake. Here is one of the most lovely and picturesque places in Central New Hampshire, its natural beauties increased, its attractions added to manifold, through the artistic eye and liberal hand of Jonathan Harvey Kezar, aided by his sons. These men are descendants, in the fourth and fifth generations, of Ebenezer Kezar, who early settled here, and from whom the lake takes its name. From Kezarville the base of King's Hill is soon reached by a good carriage road; thence by the Samuel Kezar and Benjamin Wells farms (anciently known as such) to the old school-house of District No. 5; thence by Kezar's road to the granite ledge near the top of the hill. To accommodate the workers on the ledge, Mr. Kezar has here built a temporary house, which is on a level with the Winslow House on Kearsarge Mountain.

On the top of King's Hill is a large rock of forty or fifty tons' weight resting on the ledge, but not a part of it, so evenly balanced as to be readily moved by hand. From the top of this balance-rock, as it is termed, the rain that falls there may be conveyed to either the Merrimack or the Connecticut, it being on the height of land between the two rivers. From the top of the hill is an enchanting view of Kezar Lake, and Gile Pond and the pleasant village of North Sutton on the east, of Sunapee Lake on the west, and the Sunapee Mountain range near by, with Acuteiny and the Green Mountains in Vermont farther on in the west. On the north are the Grantham, Croydon and Cardigan Mountains, and also on the north and north-east are Bald, Rugged and Kearsarge Mountains. On the south are the Mink Hills, in Warner, Lovewell Mountain, in Washington, Monadnock and other mountains and hills.

The western view from King's Hill is better than from Kearsarge, while in another direction may be seen in the distance the White Hills. On the north are Harvey's Pond and Messer's Pond and the villages of Scytherville, Low Plains and Wilnot Flat.

King's Hill contains an inexhaustible quarry of excellent granite, easily wrought and extensively used in this part of the country. Formerly, near the top, bricks were made extensively, and here are numerous living springs of good water.

King's Hill was early settled by John King, William Bean, Amos Pressey, Moses Hills, Esq., Joseph and David Chadwick and Hugh Jameson.

In the vicinity of the entrance of the stream into Kezar's Pond and along the western shore were found many Indian relics, among which were hearths or fire-places, skillfully made, arrows, gun-barrels, tomahawks, pestles and mortars, etc. There was also an Indian burial-ground where the original forest had been cleared.

On the road passing over the southeastern portion of King's Hill is a beautiful rivulet and cascade, running over solid rock, through a gorge or ravine and a primeval grove.

It will perhaps be a convenience to the reader if the following table of altitudes above mean tide-water at Boston be inserted here:

Acuteiny Mountain	3186 feet
Kearsarge "	2942 "
Croydon "	2789 "
Sunapee "	2683 "
King's Hill	2600 "

Sunapee Lake is eleven hundred and three feet above mean tide-water at Boston, and by a survey made in 1816 it was found to be more than eight hundred and twenty feet above Merrimack and Connecticut Rivers.

Fellow's Hill is a little south of King's Hill, adjoining Newbury line. First settled by Jesse Fellows and Ensign Jacob Bean. Burnt or Chellis Hill is in the westerly part of the town, south of Mill village and east of South village. The early settlers in its vicinity were Lieutenant Joseph Wadleigh, Samuel Andrew, Thomas Wadleigh, Esq., Samuel Peaslee and Leonard Colburn.

Kimball Hill is in the southeast part of the town and was early settled by Caleb Kimball. The locality is now known as Eaton Grange, being owned by the Eaton descendants of Caleb Kimball, one of the most remarkably honorable and justly successful families Sutton has ever produced.

Birch Hill is west of Kimball Hill and was the former residence of Ichabod Roby, James Roby, Jonathan Roby and other early settlers.

Meeting-House Hill, northeast of the South Meeting-House, is noted for the large quantity of plumbago found there. The surface of this hill is remarkably rough, steep and uneven, which is a great hindrance to the obtaining of the plumbago.

Easterly of this last hill is Peaslee or Dresser Hill. The early settlers here were John Peaslee, Ezra Jones and son, Ezra and Samuel Dresser. Mr. Dresser and wife both died at great age, ninety-seven and ninety-five years, being, with one exception, the oldest couple who have died in town.

Nelson Hill, on Newbury line, was early settled by Philip and Moses Nelson.

Pound or Hildreth Hill is in the centre of the town. Ephraim Hildreth and Jeremiah Davis were early settlers there.

Davis or Wadleigh Hill is where Milton B. Wadleigh lives and was early settled by Benjamin Wadleigh, Esq., Rev. Samuel Ambrose, Jacob and John Davis.

Kearsarge Hill extends more than half the length of the town, adjoining and embracing a part of Kearsarge Mountain. The early settlers here were Hezekiah Parker, Jacob Mastin, George Walker, Jonathan Phelps, Nathan Phelps, Aquilla Wilkins.

Gile's Hill was formerly owned by Captain Levi Gile. It was once a great impediment to teamsters.

Porter Hill, for many years owned by Reuben Porter, Esq., is on the west side of Kezar's Pond, and from it may be obtained a beautiful view of North Sutton and surrounding scenery.

Oak Hill, east of the North Meeting-House, is a noble eminence, almost a mountain, and the views to be obtained by ascending it more than repay the difficulty of the steep ascent.

Many more lofty elevations merit especial mention, but enough have been named to convince the reader that Sutton not only is located in, but forms a part of the Central Ridge of New Hampshire.

KEARSARGE MOUNTAIN.—No sketch of Sutton would be complete without some description of Kearsarge, since a large portion of the body and foot of this noble eminence lies within the town limits, though not its head and crown. King's Hill, the highest land in town (two thousand feet), whose regal title chances to be so appropriate, being the only representative of royalty in which Sutton claims absolute proprietorship. No municipal limitations, however, hold with regard to the landscape view of Kearsarge. From most of our hills, from many points in the lowlands, can be obtained an unobstructed view of its whole magnificent proportions. No point of observation in Sutton, perhaps, is better than Harvey's Hill, in the north part of the town.

Both Kearsarge and Sunapee Mountains show evidence of glacial action of the ice period, though in different ways. Sunapee, with its broad base and blunted cone, owns up to having lost its crown by the scraping of icebergs over it, while Kearsarge, which yet holds its bare head nearly three hundred feet higher in the air than the Sunapee of this age, escaped with many scratches, its top being much scarred and striated.

The highest part of Kearsarge is now bare rock, though it was once covered with soil which supported a rather stunted growth of forest-trees. In the early part of the present century a fire ran over it, burning not only the woods, but the soil itself. Since that time its granite top, forever wind-swept, has been as bare of soil and vegetation as are the sea-shore rocks washed by daily tides.

Slowly, slowly, in the long ages to come, by imperceptible accumulations, soil will gather again, and the forests that now cover the mountain-sides will creep timorously upward till the top of Kearsarge shall be again a mass of waving woods. So much will the far-remote future accomplish; but that, in past ages, the mountain has been sending down more of value than it has carried up needs no better evidence than the fact that the Lord Proprietors, when they granted the charter of Ferrystown, selected for their own eighteen reserved shares the lands lying where they get the wash of the mountain. These lands have not yet lost their richness. They were often termed the Lord Proprietors' Lots, and were all laid out one mile long and one hundred and thirty-five rods wide, containing two hundred and seventy acres.

As to the question of priority of right to the name of Kearsarge, the question that caused some discussion between those who favor the Conway Kearsarge and those who favor the Merrimack County Kearsarge, it would seem to be settled by the fact that, in the charter of Ferrystown, the date of which was 1749, the tract of land is described as lying to the west of Kearsarge Hill, while the claim of the Conway Kearsarge is of a recent date.

GEOLOGY OF SUTTON.—For the convenience of those readers who may not always have at hand Hitchcock's "Geology of New Hampshire," the following, descriptive of Sutton's geological characteristics, is here copied from that noble work:

"Sutton is nearly all underlain by porphyritic gneiss. Near the north line, by C. A. Fowler's, the dip is 75° N., 75° W. The main road through the hamlets of North Sutton, Sutton Mills and South Sutton abounds with porphyritic ledges. At the Mill the descent is considerable. Between Kezar and Gile ponds there is an extensive meadow, and also below Sutton Mills.

"About South Sutton are steep, conical hills,—steepest on their South side—as seen from the Northeast. At the head of Long pond is a mass of compact, flinty rock, dipping 80° N., 25° E., girt by the porphyritic rock on both sides. On Stevens' brook this rock begins at the town line, and for two miles the ledges are continuous.

"Sand obscures the ledges in the northern half of the town, on the road to Walnut Flat, from Stevens' brook. It was surprising to us to find such a level road between Warner and Potter Place, through the Stevens' brook valley, in this mountainous region."

DAVIS' MINERAL SPRINGS.—Ezekiel Davis was for several years the owner of the meadow wherein these springs are found; whence their name. They are not far from the base of Kearsarge Mountain, between which and the springs the possibility of a secret understanding has been suggested. Were we able to interpret the hints which these springs are continually throwing out they might perhaps give us some valuable information respecting the structure, nature and disposition of the inner-man of the mountain. Not far from the base of Mt. Monadnock, issues a spring of similar character to these in Sutton. Here is a fact for the geologist to inquire into.

It appeared that Davis' Springs were not discovered, at least by white people, till soon after the beginning of the present century, as is shown by the following notice copied from The Farmer's Cabinet, printed at Amherst, N. H., October 21, 1806:

"A mineral spring has lately been discovered in Sutton, which, from its medicinal qualities, promises to be of great utility. Many persons of respectability have drunk of the water and have uniformly experienced very sensible effects. Its taste is slightly alkaline, and appears to contain a large quantity of sulphuric Acid and Fixed Air. Gentlemen who have visited Stafford springs the present season are decidedly of opinion that the use of this will be attended with similar success. It is situated in a pleasant, shady vale, the property of Lieutenant Hutchins, which might be made an elegant place of retreat."

Cooking-stoves began to be introduced soon after 1830. Friction matches began to be introduced soon after 1834. Metal pens began to be introduced soon after 1834. At first these pens were not well received, the paper, as it was then finished, not being well adapted to their use. This defect was perceived and remedied by a different finish, and then the steel and copper pens found universal favor and their use became general.

The first carding-machine in the United States was set up by Arthur Scollfield, from England, in Pittsfield, Mass., in 1801. These machines found their way into Central New Hampshire soon after 1810.

The first stage making regular trips through Sutton was about 1830. On its appearance the post-rider disappeared.

Biographical.—DEACON MATTHEW HARVEY was born in 1750 in Amesbury, Mass., where his ancestors had resided since they came first to this country from England, a century before. He was son of Jonathan, who removed to Nottingham, N. H., where he died about the year 1760. From thence, in 1772, Matthew removed to Sutton, where he purchased a farm, he being then in his twenty-third year. Like all the early settlers, his wealth consisted in his mental and physical powers. He remained unmarried till 1779, when he married Hannah Sargent, of Weare. Soon purchased more land and employed help, and took the lead in farming. He was a man of sound judgment, industrious and sagacious in his financial affairs, and died at the age of forty-nine, the wealthiest man in town. He was a man of piety, and upon the formation of a church in town was its first deacon; was active and prominent in all town and public business; was a wise and influential magistrate, and was the first representative of Sutton under our State Constitution of 1793, and held this office by annual re-election till his death, in 1799. He left five sons—Jonathan, Matthew, Philip S., John, Benjamin—and two daughters—Susan, who married Joseph Emerson, of Hopkinton, and Hannah, who married Dr. Dinsmore, of Henniker.

HON. MATTHEW HARVEY, second son of Deacon Matthew Harvey, was born in Sutton June 21, 1781, in the log house which Deacon Harvey did not exchange for a frame house till 1787.

Matthew fitted for college under the instruction of Rev. Dr. Wood, of Boscaawen; graduated at Dartmouth College in 1806 and immediately commenced the study of the law in the office of Judge Harris at Hopkinton. Having assiduously pursued his studies during the required period of three years, he was admitted to the bar in 1809 and opened an office in Hopkinton, where he successfully conducted the business of his profession till the year 1830, when his election to the chief magistracy removed him from the scenes and duties of professional life. His professional course was marked by that honesty and uprightness which many men have been led to suppose is incompatible with success at the bar. It is too often considered that a person cannot be a good lawyer, in a worldly sense, and at the same time a good man, in a Christian sense—an error which such an example as Judge Harvey gave to the community ought to have dispelled; for, while clients found him always true to their cause, and learned that they might safely rely upon his industry, judgment and discretion, they also learned that they might never hope for success through the suggestion, or suzerainty by him, of any compromise with justice and truth. A trick, a quibble, a subterfuge or an evasion he scorned. Whatever was unmanly or dishonorable was intolerable to him; and, observing the undiverging path of his rectitude, people were insensibly led to respect the honest lawyer and to confide in the discreet and faithful counselor. In the later years of his life especially he was often the guardian by choice or appointment, the administrator, the executor by testamentary creation, the adviser of those who sought counsel with regard to the disposition of their worldly estates, and the depository of their wills, many of which were found among his papers after his death.

Judge Harvey was chosen to represent the town of Hopkinton in the Legislature of 1814, and was annually re-elected to the same office seven successive years, during the last three of which he was Speaker of the House.

He was then elected a member of Congress, where he served four years, or until 1825, when he was succeeded in the same office by his elder brother, Jonathan, who represented the same constituency six years successively.

Retiring from Congress, Judge Harvey was immediately chosen a State Senator, in which office he continued three years, being during all that time president of the Senate.

In 1828 and 1829 he was a member of the Executive Council, and in 1830 he was elected Governor. Before the expiration of his term of office he was appointed by President Jackson United States judge for the district of New Hampshire, which position he held for more than thirty-five years, and until the day of his death, which occurred April 7, 1866.

It will thus be seen that for more than fifty-two consecutive years Judge Harvey occupied official position in the State. Probably no other person in New Hampshire ever received so many, such continued and so well-merited tokens of public confidence. Judge Clifford said of him, on the reception of resolutions of respect for his memory, presented by the bar of the Circuit Court: "Few men of this State have enjoyed greater honors, and none have gone to the grave with a more general acknowledgment of their integrity and purity of life." This sentence contains the key and explanation of Judge Harvey's worldly success,—his integrity and purity of life. It was known and observed of all men, and it was adorned and made attractive by its combination with an unvarying demeanor of kind and gentle courtesy.

The foregoing eulogy of Judge Harvey is copied verbatim from "A Sketch of the Life and Character of Hon. Matthew Harvey," by William L. Foster; read before the New Hampshire Historical Society, June 13, 1866.

Governor Harvey is his own authority for the statement that the suggestion for the State to furnish the State prisoners, on their release, with at least enough of money to save them from being driven into immediate crime to satisfy immediate wants, originated with him, in his message to the Legislature.

Judge Harvey's mental and physical powers were faithful to duty till almost the last possible demand for their use. The day before his death he walked about the street, came home, lay down and passed into an unconscious state, from which, in this mortal life, he never awakened. In twenty hours afterwards he ceased to breathe, dying without the least evidence of pain or suffering of any kind, being in his eighty-fifth year.

MATTHEW HARVEY (3d).—The following is an extract from the Boston Journal, of February 2, 1885:

"Matthew Harvey, whose death occurred at Newport, N. H., Saturday night, January 31, 1885, was born in Sutton, January 14, 1815. He belonged to one of the most distinguished and scholarly families of the State. He was a son of Colonel John Harvey, a grandson of Matthew Harvey, Sr., and nephew of Matthew Harvey, Jr., who was governor, Representative to Congress, and a judge of the United States District Court, and of Jonathan Harvey, who was also Representative to Congress. He received a common school education and went to Newport in 1831, where he served a full apprenticeship in the Argus and Spectator office, under Benjamin B. French and Simon Brown. Then he came to Boston, where he worked several years as a journeyman printer. Returning to Newport in 1837, he became a compositor in the Argus office. In 1840, in company with Mr. Carleton, he purchased the establishment, and for forty years the firm published the Argus and Spectator. Mr. Harvey being, during that time, the leading editor. In 1880 the deceased retired from business to private life with a competence. Mr. Harvey was, from 1846 to 1852, register of deeds of Sullivan County, assistant marshal for taking the census in 1850, and was four times a Democratic candidate for Representative to the Legislature from Newport, but his party was in the minority. He was a gentleman of decided poetical ability, and was the author of many most creditable compositions, written by request for special occasions. He had been a prominent Free-Mason for many years, and had been twice elected Worshipful Master of Mt. Vernon Lodge of Newport. In private life Mr. Harvey was a man of the highest purity of character. As a citizen he was liberal in his views, popular, generous and public-spirited, and was a gentleman of the old school."

This Matthew Harvey (3d) was the only brother of Mrs. Augusta Harvey Worthen, author of this sketch of Sutton.

HON. JONATHAN HARVEY was the oldest son of Deacon Matthew Harvey, being born at Sutton February 25, 1780. Immediately after becoming of age he took the lead in the political affairs of the town, being repeatedly chosen town clerk and selectman; was a civil magistrate from 1810 till his death, August 23, 1859. A brief reference to his long career of public service will show how deeply he shared the confidence of his fellow-citizens. He made his first appearance in the House of Representatives in 1810, and to this body he was annually re-elected till 1815; he then represented his district in the State Senate from that date till 1823, and was president of that body during the five last years of his connection with it. By reference to dates it will be seen that the two branches of the Legislature were, from 1819 to 1821, three years, presided over by the brothers Jonathan and Matthew Harvey,—Jonathan being President of the Senate at the time Matthew was Speaker of the House.

In 1823 and 1824 Jonathan Harvey was a member of the Executive Council. In 1825 he was elected a member of Congress, as the successor of his brother, Hon. Matthew Harvey, then of Hopkinton.

He was in Congress six years, at the expiration of which time he was again elected to the Legislature of this State, where he served two years, thus completing an unbroken term of twenty-three years of public service. He was again returned to the Legislature in 1838 and re-elected in 1839, when he finally retired to private life, after leaving a spotless record upon the journals of his State and nation and securing those enviable tokens of approbation which but few unprofessional men have either merited or received. He filled all the places of trust within the gift of his townsmen.

He was never defeated at the polls in the election to any office for which he was a candidate.

But little need be said of the virtues that adorned the private life and character of Jonathan Harvey, because the public needs no information upon those points. His social and genial nature made his ever-hospitable home the abode of cheerful hearts and the resort of numerous friends.

These prominent characteristics of the man shed a bright halo of light around his declining years and illumined his path to the grave.

But few men have been permitted to complete the entire circle of eighty years and die upon the soil of their ancestral homes; yet such a life and such a death was reserved for the well-known subject of this notice.

The above, extracted from one of the public prints issued a few days after his decease, is only one notice among many of similar date and character.

This record of his public services is known to be correct, having been carefully gleaned from the records at Concord by the writer of the sketch above-copied.

GEORGE A. PILLSBURY was born in Sutton August 29, 1816. (For sketch of Mr. Pillsbury, see "History of Concord," in this volume.)

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

WADLEIGH.

On the town records of Sutton, as well as on the proprietary records of Perrystown, the name of Wadleigh occurs so frequently in connection with town affairs as to demand some special notice of the family.

Several years prior to any settlement in Perrystown Thomas Wadleigh, of Hampstead, became a proprietor by the purchase of a right, and consequently used his efficient endeavors to promote its interest, and occasionally resided here with the earliest settlers. From the record, as well as from some known facts, it is to be inferred that he was possessed of much practical ability, good sense and judgment. He was also a man of immense bodily strength—double that of average men—which was in itself about as desirable capital as could be had to invest in an enterprise so full of hardship as the settlement of Perrystown. This Thomas Wadleigh had nine sons and three daughters. Several of the sons settled early in town, the father being at one time the possessor of a thousand acres of land in one tract. His deed to his son Benjamin, conveying to him a lot of land, No. 68, in the first division, in Perrystown, is yet preserved and bears date November 11, 1777. This lot, unimpaired and undivided, is now possessed by Milton B. Wadleigh, one of the fifth generation from him, counting himself one.

This, with two exceptions (the Johnson estate, and Caleb Kimball estate, owned by his descendants, the Eatons, of whom General John Eaton, so long United States commissioner of education, is one), is the only instance in Sutton of an entire lot remaining, unchanged and undivided, in the same family.

This Benjamin, coming here as a settler, at the age of twenty-one, became one of the leading men of the town. Mr. Dresser, who, many years ago, prepared a brief sketch of some of the most prominent early settlers, says of him,—“He was firm and uncompromising, a wise counselor to the town, church and society. His wife, Hannah, a daughter of Ebenezer Kezar, at the age of nineteen, came with him to live on Wadleigh Hill, and had there her home till the end of her long and useful life. She died in 1836, aged eighty-six. He died in 1817, aged sixty-eight, his death being occasioned by an accidental slight injury to the knee, resulting in mortification.”

Much of the town business was transacted by the two noble brothers, Benjamin and Thomas Wadleigh. The latter, however, did not settle here till after the close of the Revolutionary War, in which he had served six years and seven months; was at the battle of Bunker Hill, and fought side by side with his brother John. The main-spring of the gun that John carried broke at the first discharge, rendering the weapon useless; but telling Thomas he would load while the other fired, he did this so quickly that the piece became too hot for holding. But the two brothers with one gun were able to load and fire all the ammunition of both before they left their position.

Thomas Wadleigh was very highly esteemed in his day by the citizens of Sutton for capacity, integrity and patriotism; was the first town clerk after incorporation, and every year afterwards till 1806, a period of twenty-two years; selectman and representative, as elsewhere stated in this sketch.

Benjamin presided over town-meetings thirteen years in succession. Both brothers were civil magistrates. The commission of Benjamin is dated September 16, 1786.

At this time it can hardly fail to seem to us that the distinction of being justice of the peace was worth something a century ago, when Benjamin Wadleigh, Sr., received his commission, signed by John Sullivan, "President,"—i. e., Governor of New Hampshire; while in the list of those justices who were contemporary with him we find such names as Samuel Livermore, Josiah Bartlett, Matthew Thornton, John Langdon, etc.

Erastus Wadleigh was made a civil magistrate in 1857, and so continued till his death, in 1881, he being the third "E-s-j. Wadleigh" in regular line of descent from Benjamin Wadleigh, Sr., who received his commission—the first in town—in 1786; his son Benjamin, Jr. (the judge), in 1823. It will thus be seen that the time covered by their several commissions is but little short of a century, and includes almost the entire corporate existence of the town.

The Thomas J. Wadleigh whose name appears on the town record as selectman in 1857 and 1858, and as representative in 1865, who, in 1858, received his commission as justice of the peace, was son of Moses Wadleigh, brother to Thomas and Benjamin, Sr.

Hon. Bainbridge Wadleigh, of Milford, N. H.

(since of Boston), six years United States Senator from New Hampshire, is grandson of Moses, being son of John D. Wadleigh, of Bradford.

JUDGE BENJAMIN WADLEIGH, JR.

Benjamin Wadleigh, Jr., was born in Sutton in 1784. He was the youngest son of Benjamin Wadleigh, Sr., and succeeded to the homestead of his father, who died October 8, 1817. The mother of Judge Wadleigh survived her husband more than twenty years, and it was this period of her long widowhood which gave room and opportunity for the manifestation of that filial devotion, on his part, which was so noticeable in him continuously, and up to the last day of this venerated lady's life. She died in 1836, aged eighty-six.

Judge Wadleigh married, early in life, Polly Marston, daughter of Jacob, a native of Sutton, a woman whose kind and unselfish nature is still reverently remembered.

As a wife and mother, she was ever ready to surrender every thought of self to the welfare of her family. She died December 17, 1857, aged seventy-six years.

The product of this union was six sons and two daughters, and two children who died in infancy.

Eliphalet was born November 21, 1804; died in Illinois about the year 1866.

Luther, born July 11, 1806; married and settled in East Corinth, Me., where he died in 1873. During all his life there he occupied positions of trust and responsibility.

The resolutions passed by the town at his death testify to the esteem in which he was held. These resolutions speak of him "as a municipal officer competent and faithful; as a citizen, he was unpretending, yet at all times ready, by fitting words and timely deeds, to help the needy; a consistent lover of his country and his home and those virtues so pleasing to the patriot and the parent; an unobtrusive worker; a doer of the word; steadfast; a keeper at home, meddling never with that which did not concern him, but faithful in all life's duties."

Erastus, whose biography is elsewhere given, was the third son.

Milton, the fourth son, graduated from Norwich University, Vermont, as civil engineer, in 1837. Subsequently he went West and engaged in railroad engineering; located at Galena, Jo Daviess County, Ill., then distinguished for its mines, and the most flourishing and promising place in the State. For many years he filled the office of city engineer. At the present time he is surveyor of Jo Daviess County, an office to which he has, for many consecutive years, been elected, irrespective of political ascendancy.

Hannah, the fifth child, born November 23, 1814; married Nathaniel A. Davis; died November 8, 1853, lovingly remembered by her surviving family.

Lydia F. was educated at New Hampton Institution, where she remained as teacher three years. For the past thirty years she has been engaged in teaching in New York City,—first, as organizer and principal of the Senior Public School, in Twelfth Street; and, since 1870, as superintendent of the Normal College in that city.

Benjamin, the seventh child, was engaged in mercantile business in Newport and elsewhere. Died in Newport, N. H., November 8, 1868.

Gilbert, the youngest son, graduated at Dartmouth College in 1847; studied law and settled in practice at Milford, N. H., where he now resides. During the Civil War he was paymaster in the army.

Judge Wadleigh was born and spent his life, married and reared his family, on the same farm. He is remembered as being of fine personal appearance, gentlemanly in manner and possessed of a pleasant, genial nature, which was very attractive to young and old.

He was an earnest promoter of education, and no sacrifice was deemed too great to afford the educational advantages of the times to his children.

Through life he commanded the confidence, respect and friendly regard of his fellow-townsmen; while, as a citizen and the leader of a party, no man's views had more weight than his.

His sound judgment and recognized integrity caused his opinions and advice to be much sought in controversies, not only between his own townsmen, but by those of neighboring towns, and for many years no inconsiderable part of his time was devoted to the settlement of such controversies in which he acted as arbitrator—sometimes with associates, but frequently alone—by mutual consent of parties.

Judge Wadleigh has now been dead more than twenty years, but within a few days one man, a lawyer, who used frequently to act with him in reference cases, has volunteered this testimony to his uprightness,—“I remember him well; I remember his unflinching honesty;” and he added, “If I were his worst enemy, or if he were mine, I would trust him for honest dealing. He never gave opinions at random.”

Judge Wadleigh was active in the public service during most of his life. His name appears on the record as selectman in 1809, 1810, 1813, 1814, 1815, 1817, 1820 and 1822; as moderator in 1822, 1823 and 1824; as representative in 1823, 1824 and 1825; as town clerk in 1825, 1826, 1827, 1828 and 1829.

He was justice of the peace from 1823 till his death.

He was judge of the Court of Common Pleas from 1833 till his age (seventy years) disqualified him.

He died June 24, 1864, aged eighty-one years.

ERASTUS WADLEIGH, ESQ.

Erastus Wadleigh, Esq., was the third son of the late Hon. Benjamin Wadleigh, and was born April 27, 1808; died May 21, 1881.

Erastus Wadleigh

A high-minded, honorable gentleman, scholarly, courteous and hospitable, he was one of those men whose presence gives character and dignity to the community in which they make their life-long abiding-place.

Possessed of superior intellectual powers, cultivated and strengthened by the habit of study and investigation, with much natural sagacity, quickened by thorough acquaintance with men and practical experience in the managing of public affairs, his influence was strongly felt. As a politician he was conservative enough for safety, yet not too timid to adopt new measures in place of the old when the new seemed founded in justice.

In his young manhood, as teacher and as superintending school committee, he was the means of giving to the cause of education in Sutton a decided impulse forward, being among the foremost of those who substituted emulation to excel in scholarship for the old fashion of seeking to govern by authority founded on the rod and ferule.

No man who ever lived in Sutton has a clearer right to the favorable remembrance of his fellow-townsmen than Erastus Wadleigh, since no man ever did so much as he has done to rescue from oblivion the names and memories of others. He prepared many biographical sketches of deceased citizens, which found their way into the journals of the day, and copies of which are still preserved. In this work he spent many laborious days, but it was his favorite employment, and many of the latter years of his life were largely devoted to the early history of his native town. No one so well as the writer of this sketch, who labored jointly with him on that work, can testify to the enthusiastic interest, the study, the faithful accuracy and patience which he brought to bear upon it.

Both authors were descended from original settlers prominent and active in the earlier years of the town,—the one from Benjamin Wadleigh, Sr., and the other from Matthew Harvey, Sr.—and both having access to the papers and records of their respective ancestors, much valuable matter was thus collected and recorded. Selections from this unpublished history have, to some extent, formed the basis of the present work. By his separate and individual efforts Mr. Wadleigh added greatly to that which is the chief merit of those historical collections, as indeed it is of all historical works,—their reliability.

He left no means untried for obtaining correct information. By many letters of inquiry, by conversation with aged persons, and by carefully consulting burial-stones in ancient grave-yards he compelled both the living and the dead to add their testimony to the written record. No part of the town was left unvisited, and from every part he gathered something. In response to his close questioning, "North" Sutton "gave up" all it ever knew about itself, and "South" Sutton "kept not back." He left nothing for guess-work; accepted no statement unless supported by other and well-known facts.

He was, perhaps, at first led into this pursuit by the strong love and interest he always felt for the scenes and localities amid which his infancy and boyhood, his young manhood and mature life had been spent. To him every hill and valley, every lake and stream had a history of its own, suggestive of the toils, the alternate successes and defeats of the men of the preceding generations; of their continuous conflict with the very roughest side of nature; of the cold and hardships, sometimes even hunger, that they braved; of the rocks that they blasted, the stone walls they built, the swamps they filled up and the hills they laid low to make passable roads; of the forests their determined arms converted into fields and farms. Occasionally, too, there bubbled up in his memory, like a living spring in the dense forest, some jest or joke, some anecdote of fun or frolic, that had its origin among those hardy pioneers, and which, having served its refreshing purpose of making an hour or a day of their toilsome life more endurable, had reached down to our time.

Kezar's Pond was to him an object of especial love and admiration; there was no sheet of water so beautiful, no sandy beach so white and smooth as that on its south and southeastern shore. For more than seventy years he had watched its face, playful or frowning, as it lay nestled at the foot of the noble eminence on which stood his ancestral home.

Following with his eye the hills beyond, and in every direction, the desire grew upon him to repeople them all; not, like the novelist, with creatures of his own imagination, but with those to whom these localities had been the theatre on which they had acted their part in the drama of real life.

The history of Sutton was commenced, but the work had not proceeded far before the discovery was made that it is one thing to put on record facts already within reach, and quite another to find right answers to all questions of genealogy and descent to which those facts gave rise.

(And here, perhaps, is as good a place as any other to state, for the benefit of all those who are ambitious of entering the field of antiquarian and genealogical research, that no one ever yet entered that field with any adequate conception of the amount of labor involved in the attempt to operate there. Why, then, does not the aspirant quickly abandon a work the proportionate results of which are so small? Simply because he cannot. His interest in the work grows with his constantly-enlarging conception of its magnitude and its importance. He soon becomes thoroughly identified with it, or rather the work has mastered him, and he has become subordinated to it. For genealogical research, apparently so dry, once entered upon, becomes the most fascinating of all literary work, becomes magnetic even in its attractiveness to its pursuer. Very unwillingly, and only under pressure of strong necessity, will the genealogist suspend, even temporarily, his work while searching for "missing links" in some family chain. The clue he may chance to hold in his hand is so slight, so elusive, has been so difficult to attain, and yet is of such value if it leads to the result he is working for; with the conviction that, if he lets it slip, it is lost forever, and no future genealogist will be able to reach it, and yet will blunder for lack of it,—all this makes him cling to it with a miser-like tenacity till he finds the desired link and has got it fairly riveted in its proper place. Not only does the genealogist feel compelled to do his work, but he must do it aright. An assertion based, for lack of proof, upon supposition or even upon probability may prove to be a mis-statement, which will fatally bewilder and mislead the future historian. For history is forever going on, and the record is by no means completed when the writer of our day lays aside his pen forever.)

Mr. Wadleigh, of course, realized that in succeeding years some other would take up the work where he dropped it, and would make this, his early work, the foundation on which to build his own. It was this sense of double responsibility to the past which, to his ear, clamored for remembrance, for recognition and historical justice, at his hands, as well as to the future, which was to sit in judgment upon his work, united with a natural honesty and conscientiousness which, if a man possess it, enters as closely into his literary work as into his business dealings,—it was all this which urged him to use the strictest accuracy of statement rather than fullness of detail. Throughout his entire work there is no possibility of misconstruction through diffuseness or carelessness.

When, with advancing age, the hand of disease was laid heavily upon him, it was with deepest regret that he yielded to the conviction that he was no longer able to continue his chosen work. And yet he could not fail to view with satisfaction that which was already accomplished. He had brought the thirty years succeeding the first settlement out of the region of fog and fable in which the antiquarian usually finds such years, when searching for material for the centennial address, long before the town had seen its hundredth birthday.

In the following brief words he explains his aims and object, and gives his moderate estimate of what he had accomplished. He says:

Follows citation of Sutton: "I submit to you the following early history of the town and a sketch of the settlers previous to 1800, and some of their descendants, taken from the records of the original grantees, town records and information preserved by some of the settlers themselves, together with personal knowledge of a large number of the persons referred to. It is believed by the writer, so far as his knowledge extends, to be materially correct, although deficient in other respects—notwithstanding, all that is desirable. It is designed to be a record of mere facts, as far as it goes, without embellishment or exaggeration. If the writer has been able to make himself understood, he will feel that he has done something towards rescuing the memory of our forefathers from immediate oblivion, which is his principal design."

The love of kindred, always so noticeable a characteristic of Mr. Wadleigh, became much more marked towards the last of his days. This peculiar feature, which not unfrequently manifests itself, is always gratifying, yet painful for relatives to observe, indicating, as it does, this return to our earliest affections, this coming back to where we started from, that our life-circle is nearly completed. Whenever we shall detect this change in ourselves, it will not require the knowledge that our seventy allotted years are already past to tell us that the end of our life is near.

With a modesty remarkable in a man of his acknowledged and recognized ability, Erastus Wadleigh never sought distinction or preferment. Here, in our quiet town, he was content to pass his whole life; here he gave his interest, and here he gained what so many sons and daughters of Sutton have sought elsewhere, and some have failed to find,—competence, influence, friendship, true regard.

He was married three times. His first wife, who was the mother of his children, was Almira Challis, married Feb. 21, 1839, daughter of Timothy Challis; born October 15, 1815, and died July 14, 1842. His only surviving child is Milton B. Wadleigh, who lives on and owns the old Wadleigh homestead, which remains unimpaired and undivided, though greatly enlarged, and is one of the finest farms in Sutton. His second wife was Mary W. Flanders, who died May 4, 1865. His third wife was Olive Holmes, widow of Dr. Dimond Davis. She died November 1, 1880.

TRUMAN PUTNEY.

It is valuable to preserve for coming generations, in connection with the history of events, something of the personality of those who, at various times and in various ways, have been representative men, and have taken their part as actors in those occurrences which, when recorded, become to future readers the history of the past, and the history of Sutton would be incomplete without a record of the life of Truman Putney.

Hazen Putney, the son of Joseph Putney, of Hopkinton, married Susan Page. He was a farmer and tanner, and also added harness-making to his other trades, and was a respected and industrious citizen. The children of this worthy couple were Mary N., who married Carlos G. Presscy, and had one child, George H.; Lydia E., married Walter W. Stone (children,—Edwin C. and Charles H.); Almira M., married Jacob S. Harvey (their children are Walter, Fred, P. and Albert); and Truman.

Truman Putney, the youngest child of Hazen and Susan (Page) Putney, was born in Sutton, N. H., July 4, 1828. Like most of the sons of New England farmers, he attended the district schools of his native town, and also endeavored by his assistance to aid his father in his labors. His education was supplemented by the advantages of a school at Washington, N. H., where he was for a short time. The young man made the most of his opportunities, and, before reaching his majority, he commenced business-life by serving as clerk for his brothers-in-law, C. G. Pressey & Jacob S. Harvey, who were merchants. After a few years Mr. Harvey sold out his share of the business to Mr. Putney and went to Texas, and later Mr. Putney purchased Mr. Pressey's interest and continued merchandising in his own name for some years.

Mr. Putney married Lydia A. Woodward, of Sutton, daughter of Jonathan Woodward. They had two children,—Cora Belle, who died at the age of seven years, and Fred., who was born September 4, 1855. Mrs. Putney died March 2, 1875, and he married Frances E., daughter of P. S. H. Gile. She died February 8, 1879, and Mr. Putney married, February 28, 1880, Mrs. Lydia M. Nelson, daughter of Emery Bailey.

In April, 1878, Mr. Putney took his son, Fred., into partnership, under the firm-name of Truman Putney & Son.

About 1881, Mr. Putney's health becoming impaired from his long-continued devotion to business, and obtaining no relief from medical aid, and believing that a change of climate might accomplish the desired result, accompanied by his wife, he went to Colorado Springs, where he rapidly grew worse, and died September 30, 1882. His body was interred in Sutton. The funeral services were conducted in exact accordance with his previously made arrangements.

Entering into trade early in life, Mr. Putney developed a manhood well worthy the imitation of young men. For nearly thirty-five years he continued the same business in the same place. He had a natural aptitude for commercial transactions, and by honesty, perseverance and industry he was prospered. By integrity, years of fair dealing and a strict adherence to his word he built up a character of solidity, and never dared malice or envy whisper aught against his name or his broad Christian charity. In his business relations he was widely known, and his uniform courtesy and kindly manners won for him many friends, both in financial and social circles. He was a leading man in the town, and many, among all classes, sought his counsel and advice, and he was ever ready with his generous aid for any good object, and for a long period took an active part in everything tending to promote the growth and prosperity of the town.

Politically, he affiliated with the Republican party, and represented Sutton in the New Hampshire Legislature. He was appointed postmaster in 1861, and held the office until his death. For many years he held the office of town treasurer, and other official positions within the gift of his fellow-citizens, and all these duties he discharged with his characteristic fidelity.

Mr. Putney was not a member of any church, but his religion was exemplified in his life. His principles were Christian, and his sympathy, kindness and accord with the people of Christ were shown by his liberal contributions for the support of the gospel. His temperament was cheerful and sunny, always seeing the silver lining of the dark cloud.

By his death Sutton lost a valued citizen, and all who knew him cherish his memory with reverent regard.

DR. ROBERT LANE.

Dr. Robert Lane was born at Newport, N. H., April 2, 1786. He studied medicine with Dr. Truman Abel at Claremont. He first settled in the practice of his profession in New London, moving to Sutton about 1810. He married Mary Kelsey, of Newport, January, 1807. They had three children,—Elizabeth, who married Dr. James R. Smiley, of Grafton; Mary, who died when two years old; and Adelaide, who married George W. Ela, of Concord, June 10, 1812, his wife died, and Dr. Lane returned to New London for residence, but continued to occupy the same field of practice. During the first years of his practice he spent the winter months in attending medical lectures at Harvard and Dartmouth, and in 1814 received his degree of M.D. from the latter college.

Close application to the study and practice of his profession, continued through several years, told upon his health, and in 1817 he gave up practice for a season of rest. He went South, and, after visiting most of the Southern States, accepted an appointment as surgeon in the expedition of General Jackson against the Indians and Spaniards in Florida. After the capture of Pensacola he was stationed there for a short time and then was ordered to Mobile, Ala., and placed in charge of the military hospital at that post. In the summer of 1820 he resigned his position in the army and returned to Sutton to settle permanently. He bought a farm near the North village and the rest of his life was spent in the routine work of a country physician and in farming.

The breaking out of the War of the Rebellion re-awakened his military ardor, and it was with keen regret that he felt the infirmities of age bearing too heavily upon him to permit his acceptance of the responsible position in the service which was tendered him. Towards the close of the war he was appointed by the Governor an examining surgeon in the preparation of the draft rolls, and, as it did not take him from the State, he was able to perform the duties of the office. He continued in active practice until he was eighty years old. In the spring of 1872 he fell upon the floor, crushing the bones of one hip, from the effects of which accident he died May 31, aged eighty-six years.

For more than fifty consecutive years Dr. Lane was an influential citizen of Sutton. As a physician, he stood in the first rank among his contemporaries. He loved his profession and gave to it the best efforts of a clear and vigorous intellect. Beginning practice with a better preparation than was common at that day, he was a life-long student, both of books and in the line of original investigation. He regarded his profession as a field for unlimited research and study and held it to be the physician's first duty to be always learning. He was gifted by nature with the special qualifications of a good surgeon, and the circumstances of his army connection gave him unusual facilities for the study of surgery. Upon his return to New Hampshire he gave special attention to that branch of his profession, and soon became widely known as one of the best surgeons of the State. His reputation as a physician was also far more than local; and, in addition to his home practice, which embraced all the towns adjoining Sutton, he almost always had patients under his care in more distant towns. Professionally, he may be said to have belonged to the county rather than to the town of his residence.

In the midst of his professional work, Dr. Lane found time for the watchful supervision of his farm. He was a devoted lover of New Hampshire soil, and stoutly maintained that it was the equal of any as a field for progressive and profitable agriculture. In this pursuit, also, he was a close student of books and of nature, and in his efforts to harmonize book farming and practical farming he was a generation in advance of his time. He was fond of experiments and held many peculiar theories; but these were the result of a careful study of the soil and the crops with which he had to do, and for the most part experience proved them correct. At a time when New Hampshire farming was generally the practice of a blind routine, his work was based upon an intelligent study of the natural laws which governed it.

In politics, Dr. Lane was an Old-time Whig and in later years a Republican. Sutton was a staunch Democratic town, only three Whig votes being cast at its polls for several years. After awhile the number of Whigs increased to thirteen, and so remained until the little band, known as "Dr. Lane and his twelve disciples," became politically famous in the region round about. In politics, as in all things, his opinions were sharply defined and tenaciously held, and he was always well informed upon current political ideas and events. He, however, had no wish for official position and little time or taste for political controversy; but it was with pardonable pride that he at last saw his faith triumphant at home as well as in the country at large. In 1866 the Democrats failed of a majority at the annual election, and Dr. Lane was chosen the first Republican representative from Sutton to the State Legislature. He was then eighty years old and the oldest member of that Legislature.

The mental characteristics of Dr. Lane were strength and breadth of view united with accuracy and minuteness in the notice of details. Aside from his profession, he was self-educated, but his education was broad and thorough. He had marked literary tastes and was especially devoted to the study of the English classics. When wearied with professional work he habitually found rest in the reading of standard English literature. But he took nothing for granted. Everything he read must pass the ordeal of his independent judgment. His books—medical, agricultural and literary—were dotted along their margins with his comments and notes of approval or dissent. He possessed rare conversational gifts and a great store of anecdotes; and, having a retentive and exact memory, his talk was an instructive and interesting mingling of facts and quotations with his own argument. He was always employed, finding his recreation in study or a change of work rather than in rest or sport. Thus the measure of his long life was filled with useful activity.

The genealogy of the Lane family may be traced for several generations until lost in the traditions of the seventeenth century. The ancestors of Dr. Lane were prominent among the early settlers of Connecticut and New Hampshire. His father, Jesse Lane, was born at Lebanon, Conn., December 1, 1746, and removed to Newport, N. H., in June, 1766. February 22, 1770, he married Hester Wright, of Killingworth, Conn., who was born October 31, 1750. He was a leading citizen among the first settlers of Newport, serving as representative three years and selectman eight years. He died at the age of seventy-two years. His family consisted of eleven children, of whom Robert was the fifth son and eighth child. Jesse Lane was the second son of Robert Lane, who was born at Killingworth, Conn., in November, 1713. He married Mary Thatcher, of Lebanon, Conn., July 4, 1744, and moved to Newport, N. H., about 1770. He, too, was active in the early history of that town, holding various town offices for many years. He was, perhaps, a son of the Robert Lane who lived in Stratford, Conn., from 1665 to 1685, and who is probably the same mentioned by Field as coming from Derbyshire, England, and making one of the first settlers of Killingworth, Conn. Tradition connects him with the loyalist Lane who aided Charles the Second.

ENOCH PAGE.

The Page family were of the pioneers of Rockingham County, and among the first settlers of the town of Alkinson, N. H., we find the name of Edmund Page. He was a man of note, and his descendants are among the brave and good men of their day and generation; some served their country in the dark days of the Revolutionary War, and many have served their God, living worthy and honorable lives. July 17, 1772, there was recorded the birth of one Captain

Cornese Guye

Enoch Page, in Atkinson, and about the year 1795 he married Sarah Noyes, who was born March 12, 1774. Enoch was a carpenter by trade, and remarkably skillful in the use of tools, besides possessing an unusual amount of energy and enterprise, and soon after his marriage he moved to Sutton, of which place he continued to be a resident during his life. He carried on farming, was also an "inn-keeper," keeping the old tavern located at the corner of the road leading to Sutton's Mills. In those early days the inn-keeper was looked upon as one of the "solid men" of the town, and was elected to and served in many town offices. Whatever Mr. Page did, he did well; his farm was productive, his other business prospered and from an humble beginning he gained a competency by his own unaided exertions. He died October 31, 1828.

The children of Enoch and Sarah (Noyes) Page were Susanna, born April 21, 1797 (she married Hazen Putney, October 24, 1816, and had four children,—Mary, Lydia, Almira, Truman), and Enoch. Mrs. Page died August 8, 1855, aged eighty-one.

Enoch Page was born in Sutton October 2, 1804, and died January 14, 1882, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. He received his early education in Sutton, and afterwards attended Pembroke and Meriden Academies.

Mr. Page married, December 2, 1846, Hannah C. Colby, of Warner, N. H. They had six children,—

1. Daniel, died in infancy.
2. Josephine, born August 1, 1848, and married, December 31, 1868, George Roby, the fourth in descent from Samuel Roby (1), Ichabod (2), Samuel, Jr. (3). The Roby family were among the early settlers of New Hampshire. George Roby was born in Sutton September 21, 1834, and at the commencement of the war he enlisted in the Eleventh New Hampshire Volunteers, Company D. Mr. and Mrs. Roby have one child, Eva B., born September 14, 1870.
3. Eugene, born May 16, 1851; died August 19, 1851.
4. Martha C., born December 12, 1852, and married, May 9, 1882, George H. Littlehale, a native of Sutton, and son of Henry, and grandson of Isaac Littlehale, an old resident of Sutton.
5. Sarah, born February 24, 1856; died August 23, 1856.
6. Mary, born May 4, 1860; died July 29, 1860.

Mr. Page was a farmer, and took pride in the improvement and cultivation of his farm, and was interested in the affairs of the town to a large extent. He was postmaster for a great many years, the post-office being in the old tavern, the latter of which his father had remodeled into a private residence, and in this house, which is now occupied by his daughter, Mrs. George H. Littlehale, both Enoch Page, Sr., and Enoch Page, Jr., died.

In politics Mr. Page was first a Democrat and afterwards a Republican, and was always found in accord with progress, and served his native town faithfully in all the various offices to which he was elected by his townsmen, by whom he was universally esteemed. He was a leader in town matters and was honored with many public trusts. He held a commission of justice of the peace, and was a captain in the militia; he was town clerk from 1831 to 1838, and for the years 1843, 1852 and 1853; town treasurer for 1839, 1852, 1853, 1860, 1861 and 1862; representative for the years 1840, 1841 and 1842; county commissioner for 1870 and 1873. Mr. Page also attended to probate business and settled a great many estates. He was a man of good judgment, unimpeached integrity, unassuming and unostentatious in his manners, kind and benevolent, doing many an act of charity known only to the recipient, and, although not a member of any particular religious denomination, yet he believed in the principles of that charity which never faileth—love and good-will to all—and left to his descendants the record of an honorable and well-spent life.

CONVERSE GAGE.

The Gage family is of old and honorable English lineage. It is also of historical interest, as one of its members was the last royal Governor of Massachusetts,—General Thomas Gage. He planned the expedition to Concord which resulted in the battle of Lexington, April 19, 1775, where the initial struggle of the Revolutionary War took place.

Phineas Gage emigrated from Haverhill, Mass., and became one of the first settlers and pioneers in the town of Enfield, N. H., and married a New Hampshire girl, Phebe Eaton, who bore him twelve children,—Jesse married Hannah Sweetland; William (deceased) married Eliza Sanborn; Samuel (deceased) married, first, Rosamond Alden, second, Nancy Little; George married Mary Whitford and resides in Waterford, N. Y.; Calvin (deceased) married Elizabeth Greendell, of Maine; Harry married, first, Mary Goss, second, Susan Fuller (they reside in Roylton, Vt., and have one son, Henry); Converse; Eliza married, first, Benjamin Collins, second, Benjamin Perley; Amelia (deceased); Abigail married Francis Robbins, she resides in Warner, N. H.; Nancy (deceased) married Aaron Wells.

Phineas Gage was a good, old-fashioned farmer, toiling early and late, striving to care for a large family from the avails of his farm. He died September 1, 1849, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. His wife, Phebe, who was born July 4, 1776, died March 7, 1860, aged eighty-three.

Converse Gage, the youngest son of Phineas and Phebe (Eaton) Gage, was born in Enfield, N. H., June 17, 1817, and died in Sutton April 20, 1882. He was one of a family of eight sons and four daughters. His father being an early settler, his acres were, like many others common to New England, well fitted to develop both mind and muscle. The constant problem to be solved by their owner is how to extort from the stony soil the necessaries of life. This problem has been solved by many, and the earth made to yield to those engaged in its cultivation something more than a subsistence, and developing in many instances both physical as well as intellectual growth. Farming is an old and honorable calling, dating back to the time of Adam, and at the present day, if more of our young men would adopt agriculture as their work, there would be more honest and vigorous manhood and truer patriotism.

Converse passed the early part of his life assisting his father on the farm, and availing himself of the opportunities afforded by the district schools. He married, November, 17, 1844, Cerlania, daughter of John P. and Rachel (Powers) Carroll, of Croyden, N. H. Carroll is an old and respected name. Mrs. Gage's grandfather Powers was one of the old residents of Croyden.

The children of Converse and Cerlania (Carroll) Gage were Susan E., born December 13, 1847 (she married Charles W. Purmort, of Enfield; they have had four children,—Frank M., Herbert C., George C. (deceased) and Mabel M.); George, who died in infancy; and George W., born December 12, 1853, unmarried, and who, with his mother, carries on the place at Sutton.

Mr. Gage remained in Enfield for ten years after his marriage, leading the life of the hard-working farmer, which means unwearied, unremitting industry and patience; but assisted by the sympathy, encouragement and aid of his wife, without which many men with the brightest of prospects for future success have utterly failed, he was prospered.

About 1854 he removed to Sutton, where he continued to be a "tiller of the soil," and for nearly thirty years was resident, taking pride in the cultivation and improvement of his land. Here he became interested in town affairs, identifying himself to such an extent that he was elected to office, and was a selectman for nine years, and proved a man of understanding and intelligence in public business. Republican in politics, he represented Sutton in the Legislature two years. In religious belief he was a Universalist, trusting rather to the God of love than the God of fear. His religion was exemplified more by practice than preaching. He was a man of genial and cheerful nature, a kind neighbor, a good citizen and enjoyed the respect and esteem of a large range of acquaintance.

JAMES E. SMILEY, M.D.

William Smiley, the grandfather of Dr. Smiley, was of Scotch-Irish origin, born in the north of Ireland in 1728. He was one of the first settlers of Jaffrey, N. H., in 1758. He had ten children, two of whom, David and Robinson, were the first college graduates from the town. David became a lawyer. He married Mary Harkness, whose mother, Elizabeth Putnam, was a relative of General Israel Putnam, of Revolutionary fame. They had five children, only two of whom lived beyond infancy,—Mary Harkness, born July 5, 1806, married October 9, 1834, to Deacon David Fosdick, died June 25, 1864; and James Robinson, born in Bristol, N. H., June 17, 1808.

When about eight years old he moved, with his parents, to Plymouth, and two years later to Grafton. He graduated in 1826 from Kimball Union Academy, and entered Dartmouth the same year. In his sophomore year he left college and began the study of medicine under Dr. Reuben Muzzev, of Hanover. His studies were interrupted by ill health, but he resumed them later with Dr. Robert Lane, of Sutton, and received his degree from the Dartmouth Medical School in 1833. He practiced medicine four years with Dr. Lane, and in 1837 married Elizabeth Lane, and removed to Grafton. Here he lived, with two short interruptions, for nearly thirty years, building up a large and successful practice, which commanded the whole of Grafton, and portions of Danbury, Springfield, Canaan, Orange and Alexandria.

He was a thorough medical scholar, a close observer of diseases and their causes, careful and judicious in his treatment of them. He was earnestly devoted to his profession, making himself, literally, the servant of all, if only he might save life or relieve suffering. He received in return, to an unusual degree, the love and confidence of the people whom he served.

In Grafton all his children were born,—Adelaide Lane, Mary Elizabeth, Frances Farley, Susan Ella, Pamela Tarbell, Robert Lane.

Dr. Smiley began, at length, to suffer from the labors of his profession, and a change became necessary. At the same time the failing health of Dr. Lane required the presence of Mrs. Smiley, his only surviving child. In 1866, therefore, he returned with his family to Sutton, where he has since lived, doing some business as a physician, but giving most of his attention to farming.

In 1828, Dr. Smiley received an appointment to the office of deputy sheriff of Grafton County, and to the horseback riding which its duties involved in those days he always attributed his restoration to health. He was also, about the same time, an officer in the old State militia, ranking up from ensign until he held a colonel's commission. While in active practice he was a member of the New Hampshire Medical Society, and he has been a justice of the peace for over forty years. He was an early member of the Christian Church, organized in Grafton in 1855, and for many years the superintendent of public schools in that town. In his later life he has helped establish a Division of the Sons of Temperance, and he is one of the charter members of the Sutton Grange. An Old-Line Whig and a staunch Republican, he has held intelligent and decided views upon all the great public issues which have entered into the history of the country for the last half-century.

FREDERICK EATON.

Sutton has been honored by her sons who went from her rocky farms into the business sphere as well as by those who engaged in the professions and in the affairs of state. Frederick Eaton, of Toledo, Ohio, is one of her sons who, at the age of seventeen, went out from his father's farm on Kimball Hill to begin a remarkable career as a merchant. His education was limited to what the old red school-house in his district had furnished and to one term's attendance at an academy in Thetford, Vt. But the Sutton rocks are disciplinarians as well as are the teachers in her schools. No lad can haul lumber and logs out of her woods in the deep snow and drive loaded carts over her side-hill pastures and swing the scythe in her stony fields without having his mind trained to alertness, concentration and nice discernment. In this vigorous schooling, where the pitiless rocks held the ferule, young Fred put in early and late hours summer and winter. He was born February 10, 1835. His first continuous service in merchandising was as a clerk to Messrs. Daniel & William A. Carr, in Bradford. With them he served three years, his salary for the first year being a little less than one dollar a week and his board. From there he went to Manchester and engaged in the dry-goods store of Mr. Otis Barton. In the mean time his brother, now General John Eaton, United States commissioner of education, had become the superintendent of the Toledo public schools. In 1856 he joined his brother in that city, where he has ever since resided. He found employment as a dry-goods clerk at ten dollars a week and continued to work in that capacity a few months. In August, 1857, having received the loan of six hundred dollars from his father, he engaged in the retail dry-goods business on his own account, with the exception of a silent interest his brother John had in the enterprise. His opening stock of goods amounted to only three thousand dollars in value and his first year's sales to only twelve thousand dollars. The financial crash of 1857 came the very month his store was opened, and hard was the fate of all the merchants throughout the country. Toledo's population was then between six thousand and eight thousand. But the new enterprise weathered the storm. Mr. Eaton has battled with all the calamities which, in war and peace, in the past twenty-eight years have at times crushed commerce and manufacture and agriculture and sent giant millionaires to poverty; but he has never taken shelter under insolvency or bankrupt laws; and, what is wonderful, his own note has never gone to protest. He has pushed his business so vigorously that some years his sales have exceeded one million dollars,—a sum which but few Boston merchants outran twenty-five years ago. As indicating the expense of doing business in the West within his experience, it should be recorded that the interest on money—bank discounts—was fifteen and eighteen per cent. for several years and never less than ten per cent. up to 1879. New York exchange cost in the earlier years from a quarter of one per cent. to five per cent. Freight from New York and Boston to Toledo has been as high as one dollar per hundred pounds. Mr. Eaton does his business in two immense double stores situated a square apart on Toledo's main street. He has given to his city's prosperity a great share of his generous heart and immense energy. He is a stockholder in thirteen of her manufactories, a director in the Merchants' and Clerks' Savings-Bank and vice-president of the Merchants' National Bank and a like officer in the Toledo Mower and Reaper Company, which is the owner of the wonderful platform grain self-reaper and binder. His money has helped build nearly all the churches in the city and he is a liberal supporter of her charities. He has been a member of the First Congregational Church since 1858 and is a trustee of the same. He is a member of the advisory board of managers of the Protestant Orphans' Home. In politics he has always been a Republican. On March 8, 1861, Mr. Eaton married Miss Mary H., daughter of R. M. and Sophia Shirley, of Godstown. The only child (a daughter born to Mr. and Mrs. Eaton died, in 1876, at the age of ten.

Kimball Hill is five or six miles directly south of Kearsarge Mountain. It receives its name from Caleb Kimball, who settled there from Hamstead with his wife—Miss Sarah Sawyer—about one hundred years ago. His children were Mrs. John Eaton, the grandmother of the subject of this sketch; Jacob Kimball, of Montpelier, Vt.; Mrs. Moore, mother of the Moores of Canterbury; Mrs. Adams, mother of the Adamses of Highgate, Vt.; Mrs. John Adams, of Sutton, mother of a large family; Mrs. Haddock, of Franklin, mother of the Haddocks of Chicago; Mrs. Pinkerton, of Bossawen; and Mrs. Dr. McCrillis, of Sandwich, mother of Hon. W. H. McCrillis and of Mrs. Dr. Griswold, of Bangor, Me.

John Eaton, the grandfather of the subject of this sketch, settled on this hill a short distance east of the Kimball mansion. On a ledge near this point the school-house stood. He was a silver-smith and for a time kept a store of general merchandise. Over this hill was the main road south of Kearsarge, for the travel north and south to Concord, and Kimball's mansion became a tavern. On Kimball's broad field east of the house the militia had their annual muster. Indeed, the business of Sutton first centred on and around this hill. On the western spur of this hill, called Potash Hill, because a potash establishment flourished there, was reared the family of Taylors, three of whom became clergymen, one of whom, William, was one of the founders of a Baptist college in Kalamazoo, Mich.

John Eaton's father, Nathaniel, was a native of Haverhill, Mass., and commanded a company at Bunker Hill and served through the Revolutionary War. He married Mary Dodge, of Lunenburg, Mass., and first settled on the bank of the Merrimack, where are still the remains of the chimney of his house by a brook of his name near Pennycook, not far from the spot where Mrs. Dustin killed her Indian captors. Two brothers of John Eaton, Elijah and Nathaniel, joined him in Sutton and settled easterly on the same road, where they also reared large families. Carlos Eaton, son of Elijah, still occupies the homestead. Nathaniel lived to celebrate his one hundredth birthday, and was the father of George, who still occupies the homestead.

John Eaton, the grandfather above mentioned, is described by the venerable Levi Bartlett, of Warner, and others who remember him, as a man above the usual stature, of fine physique and strong mind and a leader of men. He was convivial, and though full of vigor and activity, was not thrifty.

Mary Kimball Eaton, his wife, was a woman of rare powers and extraordinary Christian faith and piety. Eleven of the children of John and Mary Eaton survived to active life, as follows:

Frederick; Ruth (Mrs. Robert Sherburn, of Concord); Rebecca, unmarried, teacher; John, father of the subject of this sketch; Sarah (Mrs. Samuel Dresser); Hiram, unmarried; Lucretia K., unmarried; Jacob S., M.D., still resident of Harvard, Mass.; Charles, unmarried; Lucien B., now living in Fremont, Ind.; Rev. Horace, D.D. (see memorial by his wife, Mrs. Anna R. Eaton, of Palmyra, New York).

John Eaton, the father of the subject of this sketch, married Janet Cole Andrews, of whose children there survive:

John Eaton, born December 5, 1829; Caroline, born July 19, 1831; Nathan Andrew, born April 11, 1833; Frederick, born February 10, 1835; Lucien Bonaparte, born March 8, 1837; Christina Landon, born August 23, 1839; James Andrew, born September 30, 1841; Charles, born on the 28th of August, 1843.

John Eaton, the father of the subject of this sketch, became possessed of the estate of his mother's father, Caleb Kimball, and to the same he added farm after farm till he owned at one time eighteen hundred acres. He inherited the sturdy frame and stronger mental characteristics of his father. His children above named still retain the greater portion of his Sutton lands and have enlarged and improved the old mansion on Kimball Hill and occupy it as a summer resort. Being owned and enjoyed by them in common, they call the mansion Eaton Grange.

HISTORY OF WARNER.

BY FRED. MYRON COLBY.

CHAPTER I.

The Grant and the Settlement.—The township of Warner is situated in the western portion of Merrimack County and is bounded as follows: North, by Sutton, Wilmot, Andover and Salisbury; east, by Salisbury and Webster; south, by Hopkinton and Henniker; west, by Bradford and Sutton. The area of the town comprises thirty-one thousand eight hundred and fifty-one acres; the number of acres of improved land is about twenty-one thousand. The centre of the town is eighteen miles from the State House at Concord in a northwesterly direction.

The territory now embraced in the present limits of the town of Warner was granted in 1735, by the General Court of Massachusetts, to Thomas Stevens and sixty other inhabitants of Amesbury and Salisbury of that province, under the name of "Number One." The terms of this grant were that each grantee should, within three years, clear and fence in five acres of land and build a house thereon, erect a church and "settle a learned orthodox minister;" otherwise it would revert to the province of Massachusetts.

In April, 1737, the several grantees met. The township was rechristened "New Amesbury," in honor of the home of the larger number of the proprietors, and by June of the following year the allotments had been made and sixty-three house-lots, containing about five acres each, had been laid out. These lots were near the extreme southeast part of the town, at what is now called Davisville, where are located several excellent mill privileges. On March 21, 1739, the proprietors "Voted to pay Orlando Colby, Joseph Jewell and John Challis, Jr., £120 in Province bills of the old tenor to build a good saw-mill." The mill was erected in 1740. It was at Davisville. The men who built it camped near the stone watering-trough below that village. In the hut which they used as a camp the proprietors held their first meeting in town, May 28, 1740. At this meeting Joseph Jewell was chosen moderator and Ezekiel Morrill clerk. These were the first men elected to office in Warner.

Strong inducements were held forth to colonists, twenty pounds being offered by the proprietors to each man who would settle upon the conditions of the grant. As late as 1749, however, only four houses had been built on the five-acre building lots in Davisville. These houses stood some distance west of the store at the corner, stretching along on the five-acre lots. The persons who built them were Thomas Colby, Moses Morrill, Jarvis Ring and Gideon Straw. The beginning of the French and Indian War put an end for the time to all projects for settlement. The saw-mill and the cabins were destroyed by the Indians and the progress of civilization was stayed for a dozen years.

During the time that this first settlement was going out in smoke and ashes the Masonian proprietors granted the territory to seventy-six men, mostly residents of Rye and Newcastle.¹ Many of these grantees bore the name of Jenness, and the town was accordingly sometimes called Jenness town. A sharp controversy now arose between the Amesbury proprietors and the inhabitants of Rye, which assumed at one time a serious aspect. The question was finally settled by arbitration in 1769, the Amesbury proprietors agreeing to pay a certain sum for a quit-claim. Controversy still continued as to the sum to be paid, but it was ended in 1773 by the decision of the arbitrators, who awarded one hundred and forty pounds. The General Court of Massachusetts, to remunerate the Amesbury proprietors for their loss, gave them one-half of the townships of Solon and Poland, in Maine.

The terms of this grant from the Rye proprietors to the Amesbury proprietors indicate the same care for religion and education which was noticed in the charter granted by Massachusetts. Some of these

RECORD OF THE PROPRIETORS' MEETING, 1741.

"Att a meeting of the Proprietors of the Township No. one, in the line of towns held by an Adjournment from the 18th day of January, 1741, for first-day of february following and then met at the house of Jonathan Barnard, Inholder in Albury."

"All the Same meeting voted That Thomas Rowel, Esq. and Joseph Jewell Be a Committee to prefer a Petition, in the name of the proprietors, to the Governour and Council, in the province of New Hampshire, in order to obtain orders and directions the returne to bringe forward the Settlement of 84 Township."

"A true copy, as attst. by me,

"JONATHAN BARNARD, Proprietors' Clerk."

terms were that the grantees "lay out three rights or shares of land—one for the use of the first minister of the gospel who should be ordained or settle there; one for the use of the ministry in the town forever; and one for the use of a school, for and towards the support thereof forever; each of said rights to be laid out in lots as the grantees manage the other rights, and to be free from the charge of settlement or any public taxes to that end." Also, "that they build a meeting-house and maintain constant preaching there from and after the term of three years from the date thereof."

The first permanent settlement was made in 1762 by Daniel Annis and his sons-in-law, Reuben Kimball and Daniel Floyd. Mr. Annis' house was in Diamond's Corner District, on the north side of the highway, a little west of the Paine Davis buildings. Reuben Kimball at first lived near by, on the south side of the highway, some twenty rods from where it now runs. Daniel Floyd (or Flood), afterwards known as Captain Floyd, lived on what is now Denny Hill. Annis, Kimball and Floyd all came in under the Rye proprietors and had probably lived in the neighborhood of Rye. Hannah, daughter of Daniel Annis and wife of Reuben Kimball, came into Warner in 1762. She was the first English female who ever lived here, and her son Daniel, born October, 1762, was the first English child born in town. Mrs. Kimball died in Warner February 23, 1823, aged eighty-three. Daniel Kimball died in Enfield July 29, 1843, aged eighty years.

In 1763 the proprietors voted to give each of the first ten settlers a forty-acre lot of upland and five acres of intervals. Some engaged to settle on these on similar conditions. Isaac Waldron, his two sons, Isaac, Jr., and Theodore, and Paskey Pressey, came in early in 1763. We cannot name the exact order in which the settlers came afterwards. At the end of 1763 those named above and the following persons, with their families, constituted the population: Thomas Annis (from whom Lake Tom took its name), Moses Annis, Solomon Annis, David Bagley (who was town clerk thirty-nine years, holding office for a longer period than any other man in town), Enoch Blaisdell, Elijah Blaisdell, Isaac Chase, Daniel Chase, Abner Chase, Joseph Currier, Daniel Currier, Theophilus Currier, Moses Clark, Hubbard Carter, Moses Colby, Francis Davis, Daniel Flanders, Ebenezer Eastman, Stephen Edmunds, Eliphalet Danforth, James, Christopher and Philip Flanders, Jeremy Fowler, Joseph Foster, Jonathan Fifield, Seth, Richard and Ezekiel Goodwin, Robert Gould, Nehemiah Heath, Barnard Hoyt, David Gilmore, Samuel Roby, Theodore Stevens, Thomas Rowell, Jos. Sawyer, Jonathan Smith, Jacob Tucker, Nathaniel Trumball, Parmenas Watson, Daniel Young and Abner Watkins.

These settlers, so far as we are able to ascertain, resided as follows: Davis and Gilmore lived at Davisville; Th. Annis, Moses Annis, Solomon Annis and Fifield, at Dimond's Corner; Smith and Bagley, at Bagley's Bridge; Heath, Hoyt, Joseph Currier, Daniel and Christopher Flanders, at the Lower village; Watson Fowler, Moses Clark and Daniel Currier, at Joppa; Roby, Trumball, Philip Flanders and Seth Goodwin, at Schoolch; Joseph Sawyer, Abner Chase and Richard Goodwin, on Kelly Hill; Joseph Foster, in the Kimball District; Gould, Stevens, Rowell, Theodore Currier and Ezekiel Goodwin, on Waldron's Hill; Moses Colby and James Flanders, on Burnt Hill; Isaac Chase, on Pumpkin Hill; Edmunds and Carter, on Tory Hill; Abner Watkins, in the Gore; Daniel Young, at the Levi Bartlett place, on the Joppa road; and Jacob Tucker, near the site of the Kearsarge Hotel, at the Centre village. By 1770 about fifty-five families were settled in Warner, or New Amesbury, as it was then called.

The habits of the early settlers, their privations, sufferings and endurance, possess a fascinating interest. Their first dwellings were rude and simple. As late as 1773 there were none but log houses. David Bagley built the first frame house at Bagley's Bridge, a little after this date. Francis Davis and Reuben Kimball built the next earliest; Mr. Kimball also built the first frame barn. Rev. William Kelley, the first settled minister, erected the first two-story frame house in 1774. Money was scarce; watches and clocks were few. When houses were built, compasses were set to square them by, so that the sun might shine in at the front doors when it was noon. They had also nine o'clock marks, one o'clock marks and others. These rude time-pieces, of course, were available only on sunny days.

The fare of the first inhabitants was plain and simple. Bean porridge, Indian corn, rye, pumpkins, turnips, fish and game were the most common articles of food. One barrel of potatoes was considered a large quantity for one family to store for winter use. Sometimes, when provisions were scarce in the summer-time, boiled beech-leaves were substituted. For a number of years after the place was settled the people went to Concord to grind their corn, drawing it upon hand-sleds or carrying it upon their shoulders. Captain Daniel Floyd used to carry two bushels at a time on his shoulders to that place, and bring it back in the same way. Another settler, Jacob Collins, carried the boards of which to build his rye-bins on his shoulders from Waterloo, through the woods and over the hills, to the edge of Bradford, because no team could go by the wood-path. The first grist and saw-mills were erected in 1765, and they stood at Davisville.

Some of the first roads laid out in town were the main road to Perrytown (now Sutton), which ran over Denny Hill and south of Frank Bartlett's, crossing the Tory Hill road about a third of a mile up; the road to the North village, by the first meeting-house and Levi Bartlett's; the one from the first meeting-house, by Kimball's Corner and the Major Hoyt place, to Henniker; the one through Joppa; the one through Schoolach, which crossed the river at Bagley's Bridge; and the Pumpkin and Burnt Hill roads. The first bridge built in town was across the river at the Lower village. It was built in the autumn of 1774, and a part of its cost—forty dollars—was contributed by Councilors Daniel and Jonathan Warner, of Portsmouth.

The first public meeting of the inhabitants of the town was held December 27, 1770. At another meeting held July 14, 1774, among other actions it was "Voted that Captain Francis Davis shall go and get the town incorporated, if the Proprietors will find the money to do it with." The proprietors were accordingly consulted, who found the necessary funds, and a petition was drawn up asking for a charter and praying that the town be named Amesbury. Ezekiel Evans, of Salisbury, Mass., agent for the proprietors, and Captain Davis, who was also a proprietor, together journeyed to Portsmouth and presented their petition to Governor Wentworth and his Council. They secured a charter, but the Governor and Council named the new borough Warner. This was by no means an exceptional case, as Governor Wentworth named several other towns to please himself and honor his friends, regardless of the wishes of the inhabitants or proprietors. The town was incorporated September 3, 1774, receiving its name in honor of Hon. Jonathan Warner, of Portsmouth, the Governor's most intimate friend, his cousin by marriage and a member of the Royal Council.

The Corporate Town.—The first town-meeting of the legal town of Warner was called a month later, October 4, 1774. The first civil officers of the town as elected that day were as follows, viz.: Moderator, Isaac Chase; town clerk, Daniel Flanders; selectmen, Daniel Floyd, Jacob Waldron and Isaac Chase. The number of voters at that time was forty-eight; the population was probably in the vicinity of two hundred and thirty souls. The records of the Committee of Safety, published December, 1775, furnish some interesting facts as to the population at the breaking out of the Revolution. By the census ordered to be taken by the Provincial Convention held at Exeter, August 25th of that year, Warner had, of white males, 78 under sixteen years of age, 45 between the ages of sixteen and fifty not in the army, and 6 above fifty, 126 females and one negro,—total, 262. Ten men from Warner had joined the patriot army before Boston. The town reported twenty-one fire-arms fit for service, and twenty-six instances in which fire-arms were wanting. At a town-meeting held that summer the inhabitants had "Voted that the selectmen should provide powder, lead and flints for a town stock, and as many fire-arms as should be found wanting in town." At another meeting held at the meeting-house on the old parade, August 3, 1775, Captain Francis Davis, Captain Daniel Floyd and Daniel Annis, Sr., were chosen a Committee of Safety.

Warner sent no representatives to the General Assembly of the province or the State until 1776, the first election for that purpose being held November 13th of that year. Captain Francis Davis was then chosen; in 1777, Daniel Morrill; and in 1778, Captain Daniel Floyd. The General Assembly met in those days at Exeter. Representatives to that body were required by law to possess real estate to the value of two hundred pounds, lawful money. The following is a list of those who have served as representatives of the town from 1779 to 1885:

Thomas Rowell, 1779; Isaac Chase, 1780; Captain Tappan Evans, 1781; Nathaniel Bean, 1782-83; Captain Francis Davis, 1784; Warner, Sutton and Fishersfield elected Matthew Harvey, of Sutton, representative in 1785; the same towns elected Zephaniah Clark, of Fishersfield, in 1786; the three towns elected James Flanders, of Warner, in 1787-89 (this was the end of the class-representative business, hereafter Warner elected and sent her own representative, as before); James Flanders, 1790-94; Aquilla Davis, 1795-98; Joseph Bartlett, 1799-1801; Aquilla Davis, 1802-3; James Flanders, 1806-7; Richard Bartlett, 1808-11; Benjamin Evans, 1812; Richard Bartlett, 1813; Benjamin Evans, 1814; Philip Flanders, 1815; Henry B. Chase, 1816-17; Benjamin Evans, 1818-19; Richard Bartlett, 1820; James Bean, 1821; Benjamin Evans, James Bean, 1822; Benjamin Evans, Henry B. Chase, 1823; Henry B. Chase, Abner B. Kelley, 1824; Timothy Flanders, Caleb Bissell, 1825; Benjamin Evans, Daniel George, 1826; Benjamin Evans, Abner B. Kelley, 1827-28; Abner B. Kelley, Nathan S. Colby, 1829; Nathan S. Colby, Zebulon Davis, 1830; Zebulon Davis, Benjamin E. Harriman, 1831; Benjamin E. Harriman, Daniel Jones, 1832; Daniel Jones, Nathan S. Colby, 1833; Nathan S. Colby, Timothy Davis, 1834; Timothy Davis, Philip Colby, Jr., 1835; Philip Colby, Jr., Mitchell Gilmore, Jr., 1836; Mitchell Gilmore, Jr., Nathan Davis, 1837; Nathan Davis, Abner Woodman, 1838; Abner Woodman, Abner Watkins, 1839; Abner Watkins, Asa Patten, 1840; Asa Patten, Robert Thompson, 1841; Robert Thompson, John Stewart, 1842; H. D. Robertson, Ebenezer Collins, 1843; H. D. Robertson, Emos Collins, 1844; Emos Collins, Daniel Bean, Jr., 1845; none elected, 1846; James M. Harriman, Daniel Bean, Jr., 1847; J. M. Harriman, Franklin Smoots, 1848; Franklin Smoots, Walter Harriman, 1849; Walter Harriman, George A. Pillsbury, 1850; George A. Pillsbury, Leonard Eaton, 1851; Leonard Eaton, H. D. Harriman, 1852; H. D. Robertson, Ira Harvey, 1853; H. D. Robertson, Levi Collins, 1854; Levi Collins, Benjamin C. Davis, 1855; Benjamin C. Davis, Lewis Holmes, 1856; Lewis Holmes, Samuel W. Colby, 1857; Samuel W. Colby, Walter Harriman, 1858; Cummings Marshall, Ephraim M. Pundak, 1859; C. Marshall, E. M. Dunsbor, 1860; Augustine N. Harriman, Stephen C. Patten, 1861-62; John P. Colby, Ezekiah B. Harriman, 1863-64; Ephraim B. Gilmore, John Rogers, 1865-66; Samuel Davis, Moses J. Collins, 1867-68; Christopher G. McAlpine, Lemuel W. Collins, 1869-70; Charles Currier, Moses D. Wheeler, 1871-72; John E. Richardson, John W. Clement, 1873-74; John H. Dowlin, Nicholas G. Ordway, 1875-76; N. G. Ordway, Henry C. Davis, 1877; Henry C. Davis, 1878; Augustus R. Putnam, 1880; Harlow S. Willis, 1882; none elected, 1884.

Of the value of money, land and labor during the early history of the town, a few facts gleaned from the town records and other sources will give one a good understanding. It should be premised that the "pounds" spoken of in the early records was in the "new tenor" currency, which was six shillings to a dollar. A pound, therefore, was equal to $3.33, and a shilling to sixteen and two-thirds cents. One stipulation made in regard to Rev. Mr. Kelley's salary in 1771 was to give him one hundred dollars in labor, at two shillings and six-pence (forty-one and two-thirds cents) per day, or, if dinners were found, then two shillings (thirty-three and one-third cents) per day. Work on the highways was reckoned at three shillings (sixty cents) per day in 1785. March 22, 1791, the town voted to reckon-work on the highways as follows:

"From the first of June to the last of August, three shillings per day.

from the last of August to the last of September, two shillings and six-pence per day; from the last of September to the first of November, two shillings per day; from that to the first of April, one shilling and six-pence (2½ cts.) per day; and from then to the first of June, two shillings and six-pence per day.

December 28, 1797, the town voted to allow men for work in building bridges two shillings per day till April 1st and after that three shillings per day until the bridges were finished. February 8, 1798, it was voted to pay minute-men enlisted by the town enough to make up to them ten dollars per month while they did duty, including what they were allowed by Congress.

Several lots of land, varying from forty to eighty acres, were sold at public auction for non-payment of taxes in 1784, for which prices were paid varying from six-pence to one shilling per acre, with taxes and costs.

At a similar sale, in 1797, different lots were sold at five cents, seventeen cents, thirty-one, forty-one, sixty and a dollar and fifty-four cents per acre. Twenty lots were sold in the same way in January and February, 1812, the average price per acre being twenty cents. In 1782 the furnishing of the twenty cords of wood, which were a part of Rev. William Kelley's salary, was struck off to the lowest bidder, as follows: Ten cords to Esq. Joseph Sawyer, at four shillings and six-pence (seventy-five cents) per cord; five to Francis Ferrin at four shillings and five-pence; and five to the same at five shillings (or eighty-three and a half cents).

When the first pound was built, in 1798, which, by popular vote, was to be thirty feet square and seven feet high, of green white-pine logs, with the bark taken off, with a white-oak door and a heavy lock, its building and providing all the materials was struck off to Tappan Evans for ten dollars and a half, all of a quarter less for what it could be built for now. At the close of the last century a girl's wages were two shillings a week and board. The commonest quality of calico was four shillings a yard, so that a woman could no more than pay for a dress by three months of hard labor. In the year 1788 wheat was rated in Concord at seven shillings per bushel, Indian corn at four shillings, potatoes at one shilling, cheese at six-pence per pound and stall-fed beef at four-pence.

The census statistics of Warner from the close of the Revolution to the census of 1880 will show the period of its greatest growth and likewise of its decline. The increase for the first decade was remarkable, and that of the second as much so, the population nearly doubling in each instance. The large increase between 1810 and 1820 must, in part, be attributed to the annexation of the Gore in 1818, the population of that territory being one hundred and twenty-five persons by the census of 1810. The population of the town has been constantly decreasing since 1825, though at the present time there are more voters than at any previous period. Population in 1783 was 158; 1790, 863; 1800, 1569; 1810, 1838; 1820, 2446; 1830, 2221; 1840, 2139; 1850, 2038; 1860, 1970; 1870, 1667; 1880, 1537.

Upon looking at the map of Warner one will see a narrow neck of land stretching northward, like a mason's apron, between Sutton and Salisbury, till it reaches the Wilmot and Andover lines. This territory constitutes the famous Kearsarge Gore. It originally stretched over the mountain northward to the present site of Wilmot Centre. Up to the year 1807 this Gore was a sort of a town by itself, the inhabitants holding their own town-meetings and electing officers like any corporate organization. When Wilmot was incorporated, in June, 1807, the new township took a third of its territory from the Gore. The description of its boundaries on this side reads as follows in the charter of incorporation: "Also all the lands and inhabitants within said Kearsarge Gore, north of a straight line beginning at the southwest corner of Andover; thence running westerly to the highest part of said mountain; thence westerly to Sutton line." The territory on the south side of the mountain continued separate until 1818, when, by an act of the State Legislature, approved June 13th, the Gore, with the inhabitants thereof, was annexed to Warner. By this the fine mountain of Kearsarge, its glorious bold summit, overlooking the whole central and southern part of the State, became, to all intents and purposes, our mountain.

The first post-office was established in Warner in 1813, at the Lower village, then the chief business centre of the town. Henry B. Chase, who was appointed postmaster at that time, held the office till 1817, when he was succeeded by Dr. Henry Lyman. Levi Bartlett was appointed to succeed Dr. Lyman in 1825 and held the office until 1839, when it was discontinued. An office meanwhile had been instituted at Waterloo, with Philip Colby, Jr., as postmaster. In 1830 this office and the one at the Lower village were consolidated and established at the Centre village, when Harrison D. Robertson was made postmaster. Mr. Robertson was succeeded as follows: George A. Pillsbury, 1844; William Carter, Jr., 1849; Gilman C. Sanborn, 1851; Abner B. Kelley, 1855; Hiram Buswell, 1861; E. H. Carroll, 1877; E. C. Cole, 1884; Lloyd H. Adams, 1885. In 1865 a post-office was re-established at Waterloo, which was discontinued after two years. Walter H. Bean and T. Leavitt Dowlin served successively as postmasters. In 1885 another office was established at the same place, with Roger Gage as postmaster. In 1871 an office was established at Roby's Corner and Moses H. Roby was appointed postmaster. In 1884 offices were established at Melvin's Mills, W. Tappan Melvin as postmaster, and at Bagley's Bridge, Fred. H. Savory as postmaster. In 1885 an office was also established at Davisville, with Moses Twitchell as postmaster, making six post-offices in town.

The Simonds Free High School was established in 1871. It received its name from Hon. Franklin

Simonds, who left the bulk of his property for this purpose. Mr. Simonds died in 1869 and Mrs. Simonds the following year.

At a legal meeting of the inhabitants at the town hall, March 18, 1871, the following resolution was adopted by unanimous vote:

"Resolved, That the Town of Warner, in view of the bequests of Frank B. Simonds, late of Warner, of twenty thousand dollars, and of Abigail K. Simonds, late of Warner, of five thousand dollars, as a fund, the income to be applied for the purpose of a high school, establish a high school, and that said town be and hereby is constituted a high school district, including the whole territory of said town."

The following summer a brick school building was erected on a pleasant site, and in December the school was opened. The building cost about ten thousand dollars. The succession of principals have been as follows: E. C. Cole, 1871; N. N. Atkinson, 1874; William Goldthwaite, 1876; E. H. Farnsworth, 1880; Charles A. Strout, 1881; H. S. Roberts, 1884.

A home fair was inaugurated in Warner, in 1871, by several of the leading farmers. During two years the exhibitions were at the town hall and in the street. In 1873, Hon. N. G. Ordway laid out twelve acres of land near the village for a fair-ground, erected buildings and stalls and made a race-course. River Bow Park Association was incorporated by the Legislature in 1875. The association, which embraces a dozen or fourteen towns around Kearsarge Mountain, purchased the grounds and buildings in 1876 and have held several successful fairs at the place. In the summer-time the park is open and is used as a driving resort by the citizens.

The Kearsarge Mountain Road Company was chartered in 1866. For several years the company endeavored to secure the co-operation of the town in building a road to the summit of the mountain, but unsuccessfully. At the Presidential election in November, 1872, a resolution was introduced by S. C. Pattee, authorizing and instructing the selectmen to subscribe for and hold, in the name of the town, twenty shares, of the value of one hundred dollars each, of the stock of the Kearsarge Road Company, provided, however, that the foregoing resolution shall not be binding on the town until said road is completed, or until responsible parties shall furnish a bond to the satisfaction of the selectmen, to build said road, without further assistance from the town. An amendment proposed by Major Samuel Davis, providing "that the town have two-fifths of the five directors, and that the first and second selectmen shall be ex-officio said directors," was adopted. The resolution, thus amended, passed. Subsequently N. G. Ordway and William E. Chandler furnished a bond in the sum of four thousand dollars to complete the mountain road, without expense to the town beyond the appropriation of two thousand dollars, and binding themselves to finish the road on or before the 1st day of June, 1874, to a point some eight rods below the summit of Mount Kearsarge, the selectmen for the town coming under obligation to pay over the two thousand dollars on these conditions.

Work was begun on the new road in the fall of 1873, and by June, 1874, the five miles were completed, a wide roadway being made from Hurricane Gate to the top of the mountain. July 4th of the same year the road was formally opened, a large crowd being present, and addresses being made by Hon. N. G. Ordway, Hon. W. E. Chandler, Hon. M. W. Tappan, Robert Thompson, Esq., and Hon. Walter Harriman.

In 1876 there was a decisive change of political opinion in the town. Warner had always been a Democratic town, and in some years had been the banner town of the Democracy in New Hampshire. In 1838 the town gave a majority of 311 votes for Isaac Hill, which was the largest given him by any town in the State. From the beginning of the century the Democratic vote of the town had averaged 150 in excess of the opposite party, sometimes no opposition being recorded. But after the formation of the Republican party the Democratic majority was constantly reduced. In 1854, the vote for Governor was as follows: For N. B. Baker, Democratic, 257; Jared Perkins, 75; James Bell, 24. In 1854 the vote stood as follows: James A. Weston, Democratic, 242; Luther McCutchins, 172. In 1855, Hiram R. Roberts, Democratic, had 238 votes; Person C. Cheney, 202. In 1876, Person C. Cheney had 253 votes; Daniel Marey, 222; giving the Republican candidate a majority of 31. For the first time in the history of the town the Board of Selectmen was Republican, and one of the representatives to the General Court was also a Republican. In 1878 the Democrats regained the Board of Selectmen, and at the gubernatorial election Frank McKean, Democrat, received 247 votes, while Natt Head received 272 votes. Since then the Democrats have carried all the town elections, though most of the biennial elections have gone Republican by a small majority.

Warner being such a Democratic stronghold, it was perfectly natural that her leading citizens should play prominent parts in the politics of the county and the State. We wish to notice a few who in their day and generation "strutted upon the stage," acting a part at home and abroad that recalls the Scriptural statement,— "There were giants in those days." One of the most prominent men of the last century was Hon. James Flanders, who lived on Burnt Hill, between the Clough and Bartlett places, the buildings having long since been taken down. He was a native of Danville, N. H., and came to Warner about the close of the Revolutionary War. He was by occupation a farmer and cordwainer, but was almost constantly in public life. He was repeatedly moderator of the town-meetings, was representative several years to the General Court, both of Warner alone and of the three classified towns—Warner, Sutton and Fishersfield (now Newbury). Beginning with 1794 and ending with 1803, he was State Senator from his district every year excepting 1799, when Colonel Henry Gerrish, of Rosecawen, was elected, and during all this time was a leading man in the councils of the State. His large natural abilities, his sound judgment, his talent as a speaker, gave him an influence much greater than that exercised by men of larger culture and education.

The man of the most commanding influence in town during the first of the present century was Hon. Henry B. Chase, who came to Warner from Cornish, N. H., in 1805, and practiced law at the Lower village. He represented Warner several years in the Legislature of the State, and in 1817 was the Speaker of the House. He was the first postmaster of the town, and in 1823 was elected the first register of Probate for Merrimack County, serving in that office until 1840. His reputation as a sound lawyer was second to none in the State. Mr. Chase died in 1854, aged seventy-seven years. Another of the "giants" of that period was Hon. Benjamin Evans, son of Tappan Evans, one of the early proprietors of the town. He was born in Newburyport, Mass., but was, during the greater part of his life, a citizen of Warner. He was a man of the Benjamin Pierce stamp, and, like him, was a power in his own town and in the State. He had great business capacity, and though his education was limited, his energy, penetration and sound judgment were untiring and unerring. The town elected him its representative several times; in 1830 he was elected Senator in old District No. 8, and in 1836 and 1837 he was in the Council of Governor Hill. In 1838 he was solicited to run as Democratic candidate for Governor of the State, but because of his advanced age he refused the honor, at a time when a nomination was practically an election. From 1838 to 1843 he held the office of sheriff of Merrimack County, resigning the same a few months before his death. Hon. Reuben Porter, the son-in-law of "Squire Evans," was a man of influence in his day; served as selectman in both Warner and Sutton (he resided at the latter place a few years); was representative from Sutton, and was elected Senator in District No. 8 in 1834 and 1835. Robert Thompson, Esq., has been a prominent man in the county for many years, and Major Samuel Davis is a marked man in his party in the State.

The era of greatest prosperity in Warner was undoubtedly from 1820 to 1850. The town had reached the acme of its populousness at the beginning of this period, and that enterprise and activity which make the prosperity of a municipality was just then beginning to operate in a large measure. There was more wealth then in the town, although that fact is not shown by the amount of valuation as recorded in the town-books. We must remember that one dollar in 1825 was certainly worth two at the present day. There were not so many horses in town in 1820 as now, but there was a greater number of oxen, cows and sheep. Farms were more productive. Every farmer raised his own corn, flour and hay. There was a greater number of useful industries. Every brook turned one or more water-wheels, and there were sixteen mills and factories on Warner River and its tributaries. More money was brought into the town than was carried out; the stores and taverns did a prosperous business, and everything was "rushing."

That was the age of style and aristocracy. The village squire, physician, lawyer and minister lived in a more expensive way than their neighbors. Their houses were staterier, they wore richer clothes, had the foremost seats in public places and were recognized as beings of a superior order. These old patricians, like Dr. Lyman, Hon. Henry B. Chase, Major George and "Squire Evans," constituted a class by themselves. Their influence was great, and they practically ruled the town. They expended liberally of their means for the good of the town, and they set the tide a-flowing toward a better and more elegant way of living. The first piano in town was brought in by Mrs. Herman Foster in 1832. The first two stoves, of the James patent, were introduced and used by H. G. Harris, Esq., and Elliot C. Badger, in 1825. The first brass door-knocker was put on the residence of Rev. Jubilee Wellman, about the year 1830. A few of the "best families" used carpets as early as 1836.

One of the causes which operated to develop Warner industries and stimulate activity was the building of several new roads. Highways may be considered as an excellent standard of civilization. In fact, there is no better physical sign or symbol by which to understand an age or people than the road. The savage has no roads. His trails through the forest, where men on foot can move only in single file, are marked by the blazing of trees. In half-civilized lands, where law is weak and society insecure, wheeled vehicles are seldom seen, and roads are obstructed, rather than opened. The strength and enterprise of men are utilized in fortifying themselves against the invasion of danger. Huge castles are built on inaccessible rocks, walled cities cover the plain, and horses and mules offer the only means of transportation and communication, by which, along rude bridle-paths, the traveler and the merchant are conveyed from one country to another. It is only civilized art that constructs a royal highway or a magnificent railroad, and by these means offers conveyance for men and goods over rugged steep and along frightful precipices by routes once deemed insuperable. Roads are the ducts of trade, and commerce is one of the pillars of a civilized State. No nation can become great without intercourse with its surrounding States, and necessarily roads must be built. Something can be learned of the status of society, of the culture of a people, of the enlightenment of a government, by visiting universities and libraries, churches, palaces and the docks of trade; but quite as much more by looking at the roads. For, if there is any material or art enterprise in a nation, or any vitality to a government, it will always be indicated by the highway,—the type of civilized motion and prosperity. All creative action, whether in government, industry, thought or religion, constructs roads.

Prior to 1820 Warner had no highway leading directly west; consequently no great degree of travel passed through the town. Reposing in the deep valley, shut in almost on all sides by high hills, Warner seemed to be cut adrift from the rest of the world. It was distant from all the great lines of travel, and, in fact, the travel that might naturally have come to the town was diverted from it by those very lines. The turnpikes had been the exciting topic for several years, the craze in this State beginning in 1795 and culminating twenty years afterwards. Fifty-three turnpike companies were incorporated in this State, and the enterprise wrought a revolution in public travel, relatively, nearly as great as that brought about by the railroad system between 1840 and 1850. The second New Hampshire turnpike road, which was incorporated December 26, 1799, ran from Claremont through Unity, Lempster, Washington, Marlow, Hillsborough, Antrim, Deering, Franconstown, Lyndeborough, New Boston, Mont Vernon and to Amherst. It was fifty miles in length, and took, of course, all the travel that passed west and south of our town. The following year the fourth New Hampshire turnpike was incorporated and laid out. (The third New Hampshire turnpike road, running from Bellows Falls and Walpole, through Westmoreland, Surry, Keene and Jaffrey, towards Boston, was incorporated December 27, 1799.) This turnpike was at the north and east of Warner, and extended from Lebanon, through Enfield, Andover, Salisbury and Boscaawen, to the Merrimack River, thus opening the means of communication between the two great river valleys.

It will be seen that these two routes combined to turn the public travel directly from Warner. The condition of affairs aroused the attention of certain of the enterprising business men of the town, and they devised a way to remedy it. The only road leading any way west was the old Perrytown highway, laid out in the early period of the settlement, which went over Kimball's Hill (now Eaton Grange) to South Sutton and Sunapee and Claremont, and thence into Vermont. Just beyond Eaton Grange, at what was called the old Potash, a road branched off from the Perrytown highway which led to North Sutton, Springfield, Hanover and White River Junction. Both of these roads were indirect and exceedingly hilly, and consequently not very inviting to the traveler. A committee of the leading citizens of Warner, Bradford and Fishersfield (now Newbury) met in consultation, and after a thorough examination of the ground, decided to lay out and construct a road from the head of Sunapee Lake to Bradford, thus opening a convenient route from Windsor, Vt., through the Sugar and Warner River valleys to Concord. There was one obstacle in the way: the people of Fishersfield were so poor that they did not feel able to construct their part of the road. What was to be done? Warner necessarily would be benefited more than any other town by this new road. Our citizens saw this, and a number of them took hold of the affair of their own free will, and without any vote of the town or any help from the municipality. Several of the most able and enterprising men, including Benjamin Evans, Daniel Bean, Sr., and John E. Kelley, accordingly drove to Fishersfield, took their families and plenty of provisions, and boarding in an old school-house, labored there for weeks, giving their labor and "finding themselves." Before the autumn of 1821 the road was completed.

The result was all that its designers could wish. It turned a portion of the travel which had formerly passed around Warner on either side along this new thoroughfare. It became a stage-route, connecting Western New Hampshire with Concord and Boston by the shortest and most easily accessible way. Travel poured in abundantly, and Warner became a grand centre and halting-place for the caravans of people and merchandise. During nearly a decade of years the travel was unchecked, and the individuals who had labored so hard and expended so liberally of time and money found themselves amply recompensed both in the increased prosperity of the town and in their own natural share of the general prosperity.

In 1830 the adjacent town of Henniker on the south went to road-building, and constructed a good highway from Bradford to Weare, thus devising a nearer cut from the west to Nashua and Lowell on the south. This as effectually diverted the travel from Warner as water would be turned from a barrel by knocking out its head. Warner people did not, however, give up the battle, but went to work to tap the channel of travel from the west, higher up on the Connecticut. To do this, it was necessary to construct a new highway through Sutton, New London and Springfield, to intercept the stream of travel that naturally poured along the fourth New Hampshire turnpike. The road was laid out in 1831, a serpent's trail from Hanover, through Springfield, New London, Sutton, Warner and Hopkinton, to Concord. The town of Hopkinton shortened the line by building the Bassett Mill road. Springfield and New London did their part, but Pike's Ledge in Sutton was so formidable that the people of that town refused to take hold of the enterprise. Again the spirit and the enterprise of the citizens of Warner met and overcame the dilemma. These citizens met the authorities of the town of Sutton, and gave a bond holding them to the building of two hundred and nine rods of their part of the road, if the town would do the rest. So the work went on. The first ten rods were built by Henry B. Chase, the second ten rods by Harrison G.

Harris. Benjamin Evans built forty rods, and his son-in-law, Nathan S. Colby, built forty rods. Robert Thompson built five rods. Levi Barlett four rods. Zebulon Davis two rods. Daniel Runels two rods, and Daniel and Stephen George constructed the road over the formidable Pike's Ledge. The road was finished that fall, and Robert Thompson, Esq., of Warner, was the first person to drive over it in a carriage.

A route was now established as the shortest and most feasible from the north and northwest to the growing cities of Massachusetts; but Warner was not yet satisfied. To still further increase the tendency of travel in this direction, it was determined to put on a flying stage-coach line which would carry passengers from Hanover to Lowell in one day. Many said it could not be done; others thought differently. Nathan Walker, an "old whip," subsequently the second landlord of the Warner and Kearsarge Hotel, made one trip, going through in the time specified, but concluded he did not care for the job. The next year the route was purchased by Major Daniel George, and his son Henry drove the stage for a number of years. Afterwards Moses E. Gould, of Bradford, took the reins, and continued the business until the opening of the Concord and Claremont Railroad in 1849.

This stage-route was one of the best and most successful lines in the country. It became the main thoroughfare of travel from the Canadas to Boston, and the stream of business that poured along the road was enormous. Every town along the route was benefited by it. Stores sprung up and hotels were built, for where there is travel and motion there must be life. In Warner alone there were eight licensed taverns doing business at one time. Those were busy, prosperous days.

Public-Houses in Warner.—Washington Irving, in his ever-delightful "Sketch-Book," tells the story of his quest for the immortal Boar's Head Tavern, east Cheap, London, where Shakespeare made his "oystering crew" to gather,—Falstaff, Prince Hal, Bardolph, Dame Quickly, Ancient Pistol and their memorable conféres in the drunken bout and social strife. The history of the first inn or hostelry in Warner would be nearly as interesting as the story of the Boar's Head told by this inimitable sketch-writer. The town had been settled four years when it was built. It was made of logs and combined the uses of a tavern and dwelling-house. Jacob Hoyt was the pleasant Boniface of this early hostelry. In 1775 Landlord Hoyt erected a frame house in place of the one of logs, and this, in turn, was displaced in the beginning of this century by a large two-story house, which had all the appointments of a country hotel. The successors of Mr. Hoyt, as taverners at this place, were Dr. John Currier, Richard Pattee and William Carter. The old stand was finally sold to Samuel Brooks, who took down the sign and made it a private residence. It was removed about 1862, and not even the cellar remains to show the spot where the first travelers through Warner were hospitably entertained.

The first hotel was built at the Lower village; the second stood at the Centre. It was built by Captain Asa Pattee, of Haverhill, Mass., who settled in Warner directly after the close of the Revolution. It was the first frame house erected in that village. Captain Pattee sold the stand to Daniel Whitman, who kept open house here until after 1812. Captain Joseph Smith purchased it for a private residence, and it has been occupied since his day successively by Dr. Caleb Buswell and Dr. Leonard Eaton. While the Lower village was still the "Centre" of the town, another hotel was opened at the opposite end from the old Hoyt tavern. It stood a little below the John Tewksbury place, on the opposite side of the highway, and was kept by John E. Kelley, a nephew of the first minister. A store occupied one end. The whole stand was burned January 16, 1828.

At Waterloo stood the fourth house used as a tavern in town. The leading family at this flourishing borough were the Beans. They owned the mills there and carried on a large farm. Daniel Bean, a son of Nathaniel Bean, who was prominent as an early settler, built a commodious mansion about 1804, which was kept open for a tavern near a score and a half of years. It is now occupied by a son of the founder, Dolphus S. Bean.

In the fall of 1828, Major Daniel George, who had purchased the timber procured to rebuild the Kelly house, erected a building for a hotel at the lower end of the North Lower village. This was kept by Major George for a number of years, and subsequently by Ebenezer Watson. This hotel and two or three adjoining buildings were destroyed by fire near the year 1846. Colonel Richard Straw, who lived in that section of the town called Schoolaeb, was for many years one of the most prominent citizens of Warner, one of the largest land-holders, selectman for several years, colonel in the State militia, prosperous yeoman and farmer, also kept a hotel, and was a "licensed taverner." His large mansion-house and inn still stands and is owned and occupied by John Jones.

About 1833, General Aquilla Davis, who had been occupying the old family mansion at Davisville, erected a stately brick residence on a fine site near his former home, where he spent the remainder of his days. His son, Nathaniel A. Davis, then converted the old family mansion into a hotel, which he kept open as long as the public travel required it. At present it is a private residence, the home of Mrs. N. A. Davis. At Dimond's Corner, Hiram Dimond, son of Israel, who was farmer, potter and store-keeper, also kept a public-house. It is still standing, a large, old-fashioned, red-painted structure, but the tavern sign has long since been taken in.

The ninth tavern came into existence owing to changes of travel and the building of the road from Bradford to Henniker. On that road, one mile and a half from Bradford Pond, and in the limits of Warner, Joel Howe, somewhere about 1831 or 1832, built a tavern, which he kept open until the opening of the railroad, in 1849. Most of these hotels did a lucrative business until the introduction of railroads and the consequent change of travel in this section.

The tenth hotel had a longer and more eventful history than any other in the town. It stood in the Centre village, at the corner of Main Street and the road that leads to North village and the south part of the town. The house was built by Nathan S. Colby, a prominent citizen, in 1832. It was a large, two-story building, with an ell and pleasant piazzas and hall in the second story, which was often used by the public. It was a central stopping-place, and always very popular with the traveling public. The following is the list of gentlemen who have entertained the public at the Warner Kearsarge House since Mr. Colby's régime: Nathan Walker, Messrs. Nevins & Barbour, Joseph Ferrin, Dudley Bailey, George & Charles Rowell, Thomas Tucker, Geo. D. Chadwick, P. B. Putney, Martin Bartlett, Fred. Smith, A. C. Carroll, E. P. Hutchinson and T. B. Underhill. In 1875, Hon. N. G. Ordway purchased the property and enlarged and remodeled it. Thursday morning, January 29, 1885, the house and its contents were destroyed by fire. To-day the town is in the same condition that it was in 1765, in having no public-house. Plans are, however, maturing for the erection of a first-class hotel on the site of the one recently destroyed.

Warner Village in 1825.—Future generations may like to know how our main village looked and who were the dwellers therein sixty years ago. In this year of grace 1885 there are one hundred and forty buildings in Warner main village, exclusive of barns; in 1825 there were just forty. Of those who were inhabitants at that time, only four are living to-day, namely, Abel Waldron, Mrs. Abner Woodman, Mrs. Harrison Robertson and Mrs. Ira Harvey. There were no public buildings then on the street, except the school-house; no bank, no church, no post-office, no hotel, no depot, and only one store. The Lower village was still the principal place of business, and there all public interests centred.

Beginning at the lower end of the street, where School District No. 13 commences, and where John Tewksbury now lives, resided Deacon David Heath, a prominent citizen and a deacon of the Congregational Church, which edifice stood a few rods below, on the same side of the road. The house this side, afterwards occupied by "Parson Webman," and now by Moses Johnson, was owned by Daniel Young, the son of a Revolutionary soldier. Mrs. French's house, at the corner, was the home of Widow Judith Hoyt and her two daughters, one of whom went as a missionary to Honolulu. After this there was no house westerly for a quarter of a mile, until we arrive at what is now the McAlpine house. Here lived Thomas Backett. Almost opposite, on the site of Hiram Patten's house, stood a vine-covered cottage, the home of Abraham Currier.

On the site of the John Savory stand was a low, unpainted dwelling, where a Mrs. Folsom lived. Abel Waldron's house, on the opposite side of the way, remains unchanged, the home sixty years ago of his father. Where Mrs. H. H. Harriman now resides lived Captain Safford Watson, who had a wheelwright-shop near by, which was afterwards moved on to School Street, the residence of Zebulon Currier. Just beyond Captain Watson's, where the Kearsarge Hotel stood, lived Dudley Bailey. Ira Harvey's house was then the residence of Isaac Annis, "the village blacksmith," whose shop stood under the large elm-tree in front of where Louis Chase now lives. Going back, on the opposite side of the street, to the dwelling-house of Deacon J. W. Clement, we find Benjamin Evans living there sixty years ago. The large mansion that is now the residence of Gilman C. George was then occupied by Nathan S. Colby. Mr. Colby was a "store-keeper," and his "shop" was just above his dwelling-house, the same building now used by B. F. Heath. The Uptons lived where P. C. Wheeler resides, and Joseph True in the house Mrs. H. D. Robertson occupies. The Dr. Eaton homestead was then owned and occupied by Dr. Caleb Buswell, who was at that time surgeon of the Fortieth Regiment of New Hampshire militia.

Union Block occupies the site where stood a long, low cottage, a part of which was remodeled into the old post-office building, now the office of the Kearsarge Independent. Here lived Isaiah Flanders and his daughter, who was familiarly known as "Aunt Anna." In the broad hall which ran through the centre of the house the songs of the "Osgoodites" might have been heard every Sunday morning, for "Uncle Isaiah" was a devoted disciple of that sect. Mr. Flanders' barn stood where Shepard Dimond now lives. The Harris mansion, now owned by the Misses Harris, has remained in the family all these long years. Harrison G. Harris was the owner sixty years ago, the lawyer of the place, and who had been selectman the preceding year. In the George Upton house, above, where Erastus Wilkins lived a number of years, there lived Deacon Barrett, who carried on a large scythe-smith manufactory. Where the Arthur Thompson house stands on the hill was a small, unpainted house belonging to Nathaniel Treadwell. The house now owned and occupied by Joseph Rogers then stood on the site of the Baptist parsonage and was the home of Josiah Colby.

Moses Colby lived at the place now owned by Hiram Buswell, and Ezekiel Flanders lived where Jacob Rodney resides. Where Leonidas Harriman lives was the home of the Widow Pattee, and on the opposite side of the street, in W. C. Johnston's house, lived Paine Badger. James Bean, the father of Mrs. Ira Harvey and Mrs. George Rowell, lived at the Uriah Pearson place. In the A. P. Davis house, now occupied by Rev. Smith Norton, lived Ezra Buswell, who had a tannery by the brook just beyond.

Ezekiel Evans owned the house now occupied by S. T. Stanley, and Daniel Morrill lived somewhere near where his grandson, Samuel, now resides. George Savory's house, the farthest on "the plain," was then owned by Jonathan Emerson.

Over the river, at the Robbins place, lived David Colby, the road to his place running nearly where the present Fair-Ground road is. Where the saw-mill now stands stood a grist-mill, the owner, Stephen Bader, residing in the little red house near by. The road running to it was across the land owned by W. C. Johnson and through Pine Grove Cemetery, terminating at the mill. The district school-house, a wooden building, stood where the brick structure now is, and between it and A. D. Farnum's place there was but one dwelling-house, occupied by Benjamin Waldron,¹ where P. M. Wheeler resides. Richard Morrill, who lived at the Farnum place, owned a saw and grist-mill on Willow Brook, somewhere near where the Clark Brothers have their mill. On Denny Hill, at the old Floyd place, lived Capt. Denny, and where Frank Bartlett lives resided Simeon Sargent.

CHAPTER II.

WARNER—(Continued).

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

Congregationalists.—For more than half a century the only active evangelical denomination in town was the Congregationalist (orthodox). The history of this church begins with the history of the town.

One of the conditions of the grant, as we have noticed, was that the grantees should, "within the space of three years from the time of their being admitted, build and furnish a convenient meeting-house for the public worship of God and settle a learned orthodox minister." Before the actual settlement of a minister the proprietors paid considerable sums for the maintenance of preaching in the town. The earliest ministers who are known to have preached in Warner are Timothy Walker and Nehemiah Ordway, Jr. The proprietors' records contain mention of sums paid them for their services in preaching in 1767, 1769 and 1770. In 1771, Rev. Robt. Morrill, of Epping, preached several Sabbaths and a little later a Mr. Farrington.

Timothy Walker was the son of Rev. Timothy Walker, the first minister of Concord. He was a graduate of Harvard College, and being licensed to preach in 1759, preached in several places a number of years, but was never settled. He was prominent afterwards in civil life: was counselor, chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas, and several times was the candidate of the Democratic party for Governor of New Hampshire.

Nehemiah Ordway, Jr., was the son of Nehemiah Ordway, of Amesbury, one of the proprietors of Warner. He graduated at Harvard in 1764, and after his preaching in Warner was settled a number of years over the church at Middleton, N. H. Of the other itinerants little is known.

The Congregational Church was formally organized February 5, 1772, and Rev. William Kelley, the first settled minister, was ordained the same day. Mr. Kelley had been preaching in town since the first of 1771. He was born at Newbury, Mass., October 31, 1744. He graduated at Harvard in 1767; studied divinity with Rev. Henry True, of Hampstead, and married Miss Lavinia Bayley, daughter of Rev. Abner Bayley, of Salem, N. H. He belonged to the old style of ministers, had the manners of a Chesterfield and the theology of the moderate Calvinists. His prayers and sermons are said to have been not so wearisomely long as were most of that day. He was the pastor of his people no less than the minister of his church.

The little church thus organized in the wilderness was weak in numbers and wealth. The covenant was signed and assented to by only eight of the citizens, although there was a larger number of women. Everybody, however, attended meeting, and each citizen of the town paid a proportionate part of the tax for support of preaching, for church and State were then one. The church building was a rude, barn-like structure, with rough board benches for seats, and the pulpit was perched like a bird's nest high up on the wall. The first two deacons of the church were Parmenas Watson and Nehemiah Heath, who served the church in this office, the first for a period of fifty-eight years, the latter forty-eight years.

Mr. Kelley was continued in his pastorate until March 11, 1801, when he was dismissed. He spent the remainder of his life in town, and was never settled over any other church. He was elected the moderator of the church, and the people continually gave proof of their affection for their former pastor. Very often he occupied his old pulpit Sundays, and he went down to his grave honored and revered. After his dismissal the church was without a regular pastor for thirteen years. There had been dissension in the church. It was divided and weakened by the location of the meeting-house "under the ledge," and by other causes. The wounds were slowly healed by time.

In June, 1814, Rev. John Woods, of Fitzwilliam, was settled over the church. He was a young man of great intellectual strength, but lacked the courtly ¹This Mr. Waldron was the first man in Warner to use a wood-saw. Robert Thompson brought the first wood-saws to town and sent Mr. Waldron to come and saw wood. He replied that "he knew nothing about saws," but on Squire Thompson agreeing to teach him the art, he consented, and was soon initiated into the mysteries of wood-sawing.

manner of his predecessor. His preaching, however, stirred up the dry bones, and there was a wonderful revival. A new church building was erected, in 1819, by twenty-nine individuals of the society. It stood, first, a little west of the Lower village, but was removed to its present location at the Centre in 1845. Mr. Woods was dismissed, at his own request, June, 1823.

From 1823 to 1827 the church was without a pastor. Rev. Henry C. Wright preached about two years, and several others a few months. September, 1827, Rev. Jubilee Wellman was installed, remaining ten years, during which time the church was strong and prosperous. Mr. Wellman was followed by Rev. Amos Blanchard, who was settled over the church February, 1837. The Rev. Dr. Nathan Lord, president of Dartmouth College, preached the sermon, and Mr. Wellman gave the charge to the pastor. Mr. Blanchard remained over the church only two years, accepting the pastorate of the church at Meriden, N. H., in 1839, where he remained more than twenty-five years. The next pastor, Rev. James W. Perkins, was installed March 4, 1840, and dismissed in 1846. He was an earnest, laborious, efficient pastor. Rev. Robert W. Fuller was settled over the church from 1846 to 1850. He was a man of strong will and active habits. The church flourished during his stay. In 1853, Rev. Harrison O. Howland, who had been preaching for the society more than a year, was settled over the church. Mr. Howland remained here until 1857, when Rev. Daniel Warren was installed pastor. In 1863 he was dismissed, and for three years the pulpit was supplied chiefly by Rev. Henry S. Huntington, of Norwich, Conn. In 1866, Mr. Huntington was settled over the church. He resigned, in the fall of 1872, to accept the pastorate of a church at Galesburg, Ill. The one hundredth anniversary of its organization was celebrated by the church in June, 1872.

Rev. Matthew M. Gates immediately followed Mr. Huntington as pastor of the church. He closed his connection, after four years of service, in 1876, since which time there has been no settled pastor. The following are the names of those who have preached for the church during periods of more than one year: Rev. George A. Beckwith, Rev. George J. Pierce, Rev. George E. Foss, Rev. George W. Savory. Rev. Smith Norton, the present pastor, commenced his service with the church April 1, 1885.

Baptists.—In 1793 the religious affairs of Warner were considerably agitated. A large body of citizens separated themselves from the orthodox church and established another religious society. The cause of the schism was a diversity of opinion regarding the baptism of infants, the separatists declaring themselves Anti-Pedobaptists. The new church began a meeting-house, but never finished it, and no settled minister ever presided over the society. It gradually weakened, and in a few years was practically extinct.

The present Baptist Church was organized, in 1833, by twenty-two citizens of the town, who built a church building, and dedicated it in September of that year. The dedicatory sermon was preached by Rev. Ira Person, of Newport. The first settled pastor of this church was Rev. George W. Cutting, a native of Shoreham, Vt., who remained from January, 1835, to September, 1848, when he accepted a call from the Baptist Church in Lyne. He was a popular citizen and an able preacher. Rev. John M. Chick, of Maine, began his ministry over this church in 1849, and continued his services until 1846, when Rev. J. S. Herrick succeeded him, who remained five years. The fourth pastor, Rev. Lorenzo Sherwin, who began his labors with this church in February, 1852, was obliged to resign his charge, the following year, on account of failing health.

In April, 1853, Rev. N. J. Pinkham, of Dover, began to preach, and retained his connection with the church until February, 1857. Rev. Henry Stetson succeeded him, and was the pastor from 1860 to 1864. From 1865 to 1870, Rev. Albert Heald was over this church, and from 1873 to 1881, Rev. William H. Walker. Mr. Walker resigned in May, 1881, and in the fall of that year Rev. N. M. Williams, of Lowell, was installed as pastor, which position he continues to hold. In 1883 the church had existed fifty years, and on the 13th of September its semi-centennial took place.

At times during the last eighty years there has been an organization of Free-Will Baptists in town, though they never have had a church edifice nor a settled minister. For many years they used the old school-house of District No. 8 as a sanctuary, having regular preaching and observing the church ordinances in the building.

Methodists.—This denomination at one time had quite an organization in Warner. The church built a meeting-house at the Lower village somewhere about 1835, and maintained public worship until 1870, since which time it has not been regularly occupied. Rev. William Abbott, Rev. Charles Knott and Rev. M. V. B. Knox were pastors of this church at various periods.

Universalists.—In 1844 a Universalist Church organized in Warner, and a meeting-house was built. Regular preaching was sustained during twenty years or more. Walter Harriman, Rev. J. F. Wetherell and Rev. Lemuel Willis occupied the pulpit the larger part of this time. The meeting-house was purchased by N. G. Ordway in 1865, moved from its old site and remodeled. The portion used as a church is now Union Hall.

Osgoodites.—The religious sect known by this name first made themselves prominent about the year 1814. The founder was one Jacob Osgood, son of Philip Osgood, one of the early settlers of the town. He was an enthusiast, a powerful singer and of much skill in repartee. In the early part of this century he took an active part with the Free-Will Baptists. Naturally ambitious and headstrong, he was disposed to be autocratic, and as some of his religious views were not strictly conservative, he was not approved by them as a leader. He then opposed them, claiming special power from the Almighty, and announcing that he was a prophet, and could heal the sick, and was a sort of vice-gerent. He was opposed to going to law, performing military duty and supporting preachers. For some time his followers increased about Mink Hill, the Gore, Sutton and vicinity. There were also about thirty families in Canterbury led by Josiah Haynes. During two or three years subsequent to 1830 the Osgoodites held great revival meetings, one of which was on Kearsage Mountain. Their singing and peculiar service attracted many hearers. The hymns sung by them were usually of their own composition. Songs, prayers and exhortations were intermixed in their services without any regularity. Osgood's custom was to sit in his chair and preach, with two eyes shut and one hand on the side of his face. He was a very large man physically, weighing over three hundred pounds. He died in 1844, and Nehemiah Ordway and Charles H. Colby became the ruling elders. There are but few of the sect left. They were an honest, upright people in their dealings with others, and sometimes dishonorably treated by the officers of the law.

The following is a list of the names of the natives of Warner who have gone out and taken a position in the ministry: Hosea Wheeler, son of Daniel Wheeler, graduated from Dartmouth in 1811, and became a minister in the Baptist denomination. Asa Putney, son of Asa Putney, Sr., graduated at Amherst in 1818, and became a Congregationalist minister. John Gould, son of John and grandson of Jonathan, one of the first settlers, was for a long time connected with the Methodist denomination. Daniel Sawyer, son of Edmund and grandson of Joseph, studied at Gilmanston Seminary, and was settled over several Congregational societies. Reuben Kimball, son of Jeremiah and grandson of Reuben, the first settler, studied at Gilmanston, and entered the Congregational ministry. Mrs. Lois S. Johnson, daughter of John and Judith Hoyt, educated herself for the work of a missionary, and went with her husband to the Sandwich Islands about 1831. Richard Colby, son of Jonathan Colby, of the Congregational Church, went in 1830 as a missionary among the Western Indians. John Morrill pursued his studies at Amherst College and Andover Theological Seminary, and became a home missionary in the West. Joseph Sargent, son of Zebulon, born in 1816, entered the ministry of the Universalist denomination, and during the war was the chaplain of a Vermont Regiment. Alvah Sargent, brother to Joseph, is a minister in the Free-Will Baptist denomination. Samuel Morrill, son of Daniel and grandson of Zebulon, graduated at Dartmouth College in 1835, and died while a member of Bangor Seminary. James Madison Putney, son of Amos and grandson of Asa, Sr., studied at Dartmouth and entered the Episcopal ministry. Isaac D. Stewart, son of John Stewart and grandson of Deacon Isaac Dalton, entered the ministry of the Free-Will Baptist denomination in 1843. Marshall G. Kimball, son of John Kimball and grandson of Daniel Bean, Sr., studied at Dartmouth and Cambridge Divinity School, and entered the ministry of the Unitarian denomination in 1855. Elliot C. Cogswell, son of Dr. Joseph Cogswell and grandson of Elliot Colby, entered the Congregational ministry about 1822. John C. Ager, son of Uriah, born in 1835, is settled over the New Jerusalem Church at Brooklyn, N. Y. John George, son of Charles and grandson of Major Daniel, is in the ministry of the Free-Will Baptist denomination. Rev. George W. Savory, son of Cyrus Savory and grandson of Benjamin E. Harriman, was ordained in the Congregationalist ministry, and is settled over the church at Stratham, N. H.

CHAPTER III.

WARNER—(Continued).

MILITARY HISTORY.

WARNER did not participate in the old French and Indian Wars, for the township was not then settled. When the War of the Revolution commenced she was not behind her neighbors in patriotic ardor and enterprise. Upon the first alarm at Lexington and Concord ten of the citizens seized their arms and hurried to the scene of action. Among these were James Palmer, John Palmer, Richard Bartlett, Jonathan Roby, Francis Davis and Wells Davis. These men were never organized into any regiment and probably returned home. The State allowed the town for their services as follows: "Lexington ten men, 1775, £22 10s," which was about $7.50 to each man.

Five Warner men were in the battle of Bunker Hill, namely,—William Lowell, Amos Floyd, Francis Davis, Wells Davis and Jonathan Roby. In the same year Richard Bartlett and Charles Barnard (the latter settled in Warner after the war) participated in a skirmish with the British near New Brunswick.

ROLL OF DANIEL FLOYD'S COMPANY, 1776.

"Daniel Floyd, captain; Thomas Rowell, first lieutenant; Philip Handers, second lieutenant; Joseph Currier, ensign; Privates, Amos Chase, Abner Watkins, Christopher Handers, David Bagley, Daniel Currier, David Amos, Ebenezer Eastman, Ezra Handers, Edmund Sawyer, Francis Davis, Jr., James Palmer, Isaac Chase, Isaac Waddison, Jr., Jonathan Gould, Joseph Foster, Jonathan Fitch, James Handers, Jonathan Smith, John Palmer, Moses Call, Moses Clement, Nathaniel Trumbull, Richard Goodwin, Robert Gould, Stephen Edmunds, Samuel Trumbull, Thomas Amos, Wells Davis, Zebulon Davis, Theophilus Currier.

"Four Into the Service.

"Jacob Waddison, Jacob Tucker, Isaac Walker, David Gilmore, Daniel Young, Hubbard Carter, Moses Clark, Puckey Pressy.

"Alarm-List Men."

" Daniel Amis, Daniel Flanders, Daniel Amis, Jr., Francis Davis, Isaac Widdion, Joseph Sawyer, Jonathan Palmer, Jacob Hoyt, Nehemiah Heath, Parmenas Watson, William Kelley, Benjamin Currier, Samuel Roby, Seth Goodwin.

" Sir,—I have sent you a return of my company according to your orders well ministered, and can not make out to Chase any Servants as yet, as for fire-arms we have not got half enough, and where to get them we know not. Our men sayth they cannot get guns for they are not in the Country and shall see you next week.

" This from you to serve,

" DANIEL FLOYD.

" To Major Chandler, in Hophinton."

Of these men, Hubbard Carter enlisted for the war and Isaac Walker, Paskey Pressey, Daniel Young and John Palmer as militiamen. Three Warner men—Aquila Davis, Amos Floyd and Philip Rowell—enlisted for a term of three years. At the expiration of the service of these men, William Lowell, Isaac Lowell, Stephen Colby and Ichabod Twilight, a mulatto, were enlisted to succeed them. During Burgoyne's campaign several of our citizens were in service at Bennington and Saratoga. Elliot Colby, Francis Davis, John Palmer, Ezekiel Goodwin, Samuel Trumbull, Paskey Pressey, Robert Gould, Abner Watkins and perhaps others took the field at that time.

We copy the following from Hammond's "Town Papers":

SOLDIERS' DEPOSITION RELATIVE TO BACK PAY.

" November ye 8, 1777.—Then Paskey Pressey, Ezekiel Goodwin, Samuel Trumbull, Francis Davis, all of Warner, in the State of New Hampshire, in ye county of Hillsborough, yeoman, personally appeared, and being duly Examined and Crossed made Solemn Oath that they Served as Soldiers in Capt. William Stillon's Company, in Colo. Wyman's Regiment, at Mount Independence in the year 1776, for five months, and Rec'd over Pay until the month of November, and never Rec'd any Pay for said November, not by over Selves nor orders, direct nor indirect, and that they never Rec'd any Travelling Money nor any Saus'd Money During Said Service Except over Travelling Money from home to said Mount Independence, which we rec'd, and therefore Prays that Honorable house of Representatives or Committee of Safety of Said State would Said Month Pay and the Remaining Part of over travelling money and Saus money.

" Examined and sworn before me,

" CORAM JEREMIAH POND, Justice of Peace."

RETURN OF SOLDIERS, 1780.

" WARNER, June the 30, 1780.

" Agreeable to an act passed June the sixteenth, for raising Six hundred Good, able-bodied men out of this State for to fill up the battalion of this State in the Continental Army, in Compliance thereto, wee have raised said men, which two was on proportion, as followeth: Isaac Dalton, James Pressey."

" This is the return of Capt. Daniel Floyd."

" Colo. Stacey,—I am afraid said men Cannot get ready So Soon as is required of them by reason of having my orders so late."

" STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

" WARNER, July the 8, 1780.

" Pursuant to orders Dated July the first for to raise five men out of my Company, and according to orders, I have proceeded, have raised four men for to join the army at Amherst by the 12 Day of this month, as follows: John Palmer, Nathaniel Trumbull, Israel Rand, Simon Palmer

" I have also Draughted Elenazar Eastman for to go to Haverhill, in Coos, and ordered him to be at Concord by the tenth of this Instant to pass muster and then to proceed on to Coos, there to remain till further orders.

" DANIEL FLOYD.

" To Colo. Thomas Stacey, in Concord."

" Money was furnished soldiers, sometimes, to purchase vegetables, which was called by them "sauce-money."

Ebenezer Eastman was the only Warner man who was raised for the defense of Coos. When, in October, 1780, an eruption of British and Canadian Indians swept over the eastern part of Vermont, plundering and destroying the settlements, New Hampshire was alarmed for the safety of her own soil, and raised a volunteer force to proceed to the threatened locality. Warner furnished fifteen men for the expedition, the greater number being old men and boys under age, Jacob Hoyt, mine host of the first hotel, was one of these volunteers. The names of the others are not known, as there are no rolls of these men in existence. Their term of service was short, for the invading army took the alarm and made a hasty retreat. They were allowed by the State the sum of £12 17s., or $2.62 each.

CERTIFICATE OF SIMON WARD'S SERVICE.

" This may certify that Simon Ward has served the United States in Capt. Chase's Company, Second New Hampshire Regiment, one year being the time he engaged for. And is hereby discharged the service.

" West Point June 25, 1780.

" CALLE ROBINSON, Capt. Commanding 2d N. H. Regt.

" Whom it concerns, civil or military."

" WARNER, July 22nd, 1780."

" We do hereby relinquish all our right and title to any emolument that may be due to Simon Ward for doing a short term of service in the late American army, for this town, of about nine or 12 months, in the year 79 or 80.

" BENJAMIN SARGENT, 1 Schoolman of "

" RICHARD BARTELT, 1 Warner "

Warner Soldiers in the War of 1812.—There were two hundred and sixty men enrolled in the town in 1812 as capable of doing military duty. Of these, between eighty and ninety did service at one time or another during this second war with the mother-country. The following is the muster:

ROLL OF CAPTAIN JOSEPH SMITH'S COMPANY

Enlisted February 1, 1813, for one year.

Joseph Smith, captain; Daniel George, first lieutenant; James Bean, second lieutenant; Richard Patten, ensign; Stephen George, sergeant; Philip Osgood, sergeant; David Straw, sergeant; Daniel Floyd, sergeant; Benjamin Evans, corporal; Daniel Bean, corporal; John Barnard, promoted to corporal; Ezekiel Roby, promoted to corporal; Samuel Roby, promoted to corporal; Jeremiah Silver, musician; William Barnard Walker, musician; David Bagley, Robert Bagley, Timothy B. Chase, Timothy Chandler, Moses F. Colby, Charles Colby, Phineas Banforth, Zade Dow, John Davis, Jesse Davis, Joshua Elliott, Stephen G. Eaton, Moses C. Eaton, Enoch French, Amos Floyd, Richard Floyd, Thomas W. Freelove, David Hardy, James Hastings, Richard Hunt, Isaiah Hoyt, David E. Harriman, Ezra Jewell, Windrop M. Lowell, William Little, James Little, Joseph Maxfield, John Merrill, Nehemiah Osgood, Eldon Stevens, Royal W. Stanley, Samuel S. Titcomb, Abraham Waldron, Plumer Wheeler, Samuel Wheeler, James Wheeler, Ebenezer Woodbury, Humphrey Bunsel, John Smith, Andrew C. Sargent, Jonathan Stevens, privates.

In Captain Jonathan Bean's company of Salisbury Warner had fifteen men, as follows:

Nicholas Evans, sergeant; Joel B. Wheeler, corporal; Isaiah S. Colby, Marner Eastman, Joseph Goodwin, Seth Goodwin, John Goodwin, Nathaniel Hunt, David H. Kelley, James G. Ring, James H. Stevens, Stephen Sargent, Thomas Thurber, Abner S. Colby, Jacob Harvey, privates.

In Captain Silas Call's company of Boscawen there were six Warner soldiers, who enlisted October 2, 1814, for forty days. They were Reuben Clough, ensign; Christopher Sargent, musician; Marden Seavy, sergeant; John Hall, Simeon Bartlett and Jacob Colby, privates. There were four Warner men in Captain Josiah Bellows' company of Walpole, who were enlisted September 26, 1814, for sixty days, namely: David Harvey, Samuel Page, Benjamin Spalding and Daniel Wheeler. Other Warner men served in various companies. The following are their names:

Wentrop D. Ager, sergeant-major in the regular army; Daniel Pillsbury, corporal; Otisiah Whittaker, corporal; Dudley Trumbull, Nathaniel Jones, Benjamin C. Waldron, Joseph Burke, privates.

In conformity to the suggestion of the Governor, the Legislature, December 22, 1812, passed an act establishing the pay of men detached, or to be detached, including the pay from the general government, at the following rates: Sergeant-major, $13 per month; quartermaster-sergeant, $13 per month; principal musician, $12 per month; sergeant, $12 per month; corporal, $11 per month; private, $10 per month; and it was also provided that the towns that had paid, or should pay their detached soldiers extra pay to the amount paid by the general government, should be refunded by the State to the amount per month for each soldier, as specified above.

The citizen of Warner most prominent in this war was General Aquilla Davis, son of Captain Francis, the first representative, and a large mill-owner and lumberman. In 1812 he raised the First Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteers, enlisted for one year, and was chosen and commissioned its colonel. The law for raising volunteers having been repealed January 29, 1813, by Congress, the First New Hampshire Regiment of Volunteers was mostly transferred to and formed the Forty-fifth Regiment of United States Infantry, and Colonel Davis was commissioned its lieutenant-colonel. It is related of Colonel Davis that, while stationed on an island in Lake Champlain, he mounted a battery of huge guns, and kept the British at a respectful distance from the shore by his formidable battery. The chagrin of the British officers was not small when, too late to profit by the knowledge, they discovered that the Yankee in command had exercised his mechanical skill, and had improvised a battery of huge guns from pine logs, hewn, fashioned and painted in imitation of "the real article." General Davis retired after the war to his mills, and spent the rest of his life in his avocation. He died February 27, 1835, while on a journey to Sharon, Me., aged seventy-four years. He was prominent in the old State militia, was lieutenant-colonel commandant of the Thirtieth Regiment from 1799 to 1807, and brigadier-general of the Fourth Brigade, from 1807 to 1809.

The first man to hold a military commission in Warner was Francis Davis, father of General Aquilla, who was commissioned a captain by His Excellency, John Wentworth, in 1773. The earliest military trainings in town, were at the Parade, near the First Church. Here, in the last days before the Revolution, Captain Davis used to call together the Twenty-second Company of Foot, in the Ninth Regiment of militia. Here, for years and years, those liable to military duty were warned to appear "armed and equipped as the law directs." There were two trainings, generally, each year, in May and in September.

The militia laws of the State, passed in 1792 and remodeled in 1808, remained the laws of the State, without any very essential modification, nearly forty years; and perhaps our militia was never better organized or in a more flourishing condition than for the twenty years succeeding the War of 1812-15. But innovation and change are natural laws. Forty years of peace made men forgetful of that truth embodied in our Bill of Rights, that a "well-regulated militia is the proper, natural and sure defense of a State." Our militia, by legislative enactment of July 5, 1851, became a mere skeleton, and that existing only upon paper. The days of the old-fashioned musters were over.

The following is a partial list of general and field officers which Warner furnished the State militia from 1792 to 1851:

Brigadier-General, Aquilla Davis; Colonels, Richard Straw, Simeon Bartlett, Isaac Dalton, Jr., James M. Harriman, John C. Ela; Lieutenant-Colonels, Hiram Dumond, Timothy D. Robertson, William G. Flanders, John A. Hardy, Calvin A. Davis, Bartlett Hardy; Majors, Daniel Bunnels, Joseph B. Hoyt, William H. Ballard, Joseph Burke, Daniel George, Joseph S. Hoyt, Eleazar Emerson, Stephen K. Hoyt; Captains, Jacob Davis, Timothy Flanders, David Harriman, Nathaniel Flanders, Nicholas Evans, William Currier.

Warner in the Civil War.—When the Rebellion broke out, in 1861, and New Hampshire raised a regiment to proceed to Washington, this town sent seven men who were mustered May 2, 1861. This first regiment were three-months' men, and were discharged August 9th of the same year. Five of the Warner men enlisted again in other regiments. New Hampshire raised, from first to last, seventeen regiments of infantry, two battalions of cavalry, a regiment of artillery and one of sharpshooters, embracing in all thirty-four thousand five hundred men. Warner had men in most of these organizations. The whole number furnished by the town was two hundred, of which one hundred and twenty-four were citizens and seventy-six were recruited abroad. Three Warner men were mustered in the Second Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteers, of three-years' men; one in the Fifth Regiment; two in the Seventh Regiment; forty-six in the Eleventh Regiment; thirty-one in the Sixteenth Regiment, nine months; eight in the Eighteenth Regiment, nine months; two in New Hampshire Battalion, First New England Cavalry; six in the First Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Cavalry; three in the First Regiment Heavy Artillery; eleven men in the First Regiment United States Sharpshooters; four others served in various organizations out of the State.

Of the citizens who held prominent positions in the service during the War of the Rebellion, was, first, Walter Harriman, who was commissioned colonel of the Eleventh Regiment August 26, 1862. He fought with his regiment in the battle of the Wilderness, and entered Petersburg in command of a brigade of nine regiments. March 13, 1865, he was appointed brigadier-general by brevet, for gallant conduct during the war. General Harriman subsequently went into civil life, became Secretary of State, 1865 and 1866, and was elected Governor of the State in 1867 and 1868.

Samuel Davis, who served as major of the Sixteenth New Hampshire Volunteers, was born in Bradford, but has been a citizen of Warner since 1859. He was educated at the military academy at West Point, and in 1853 and 1854 he was in the North Pacific Railroad exploration and survey, under the late General I. I. Stevens as engineer, and for one thousand miles had charge of the meteorological department. He studied law in the office of Hon. Herman Foster, of Manchester, and is now engaged in the practice at Warner.

David C. Harriman, a brother of General Walter, both sons of Benjamin E. Harriman, Esq., was commissioned second lieutenant September 4, 1862; promoted to first lieutenant February 27, 1863; resigned July 1, 1863; appointed first lieutenant of the Eighteenth Regiment October 6, 1864; mustered out as captain June 10, 1865. Charles Davis, Jr., enlisted as first sergeant September 2, 1862; promoted to second lieutenant, and then to first; appointed captain September 20, 1864. Philip C. Bean was commissioned second lieutenant November 4, 1862.

Manufacturing Interests.—The inhabitants of Warner are principally employed in farming, but manufacturing is an important and growing interest. The town is watered by Warner River, a pleasant and rapid stream, which takes its rise in Sunapee Mountains and in Todd Pond, Newbury. From Newbury it passes through Bradford and enters Warner at the northwest corner; thence running in a northeasterly direction through the town, separating it in nearly two equal parts, and uniting with the Contoocook River in Hopkinton. In its passage through Warner it receives a considerable stream coming from Sutton. This river affords abundant water-power in its passage through the town, and during two or three miles of its course the water can be used over every thirty rods. At Melvin's Mills, at Waterloo, and at Davisville there are excellent privileges, which have been utilized more or less since the first settlement of the town. More than a hundred years ago there were saw and grist-mills at Waterloo (Great Falls), and at one time since the little borough could boast of a tannery, a clothing-mill, a trip-hammer and a paper-mill. The latter factory was in operation from 1816 to 1840, manufacturing all grades of paper from the finest note to the coarsest wrapping.

At Melvin's there was also a saw and a grist-mill, a bedstead-factory, a chain-factory and a woollen cloth factory, all of which did considerable business. The grist and saw-mill are still in operation, the woollen-factory was destroyed by fire, the others have discontinued business. At Davisville there was an iron foundry, at which clock-weights, hand-irons and like articles were manufactured. Old iron was run up and used for these purposes instead of ore. The business was discontinued about the year 1830. There was also a woollen-factory at the same place, but the cloth-mill was washed away by the great freshet of 1826.¹

Notwithstanding the decay and suspension of several manufactures, it is believed that the manufacturing which is done in town at present will equal, if not surpass, that of any previous period. The leading manufacturing industry is probably at Davisville. Here the Davis Brothers are engaged in the manufacture of straw-board. The firm consists of Walter S. Davis and Henry C. Davis, grandsons of General Aquilla Davis. They began business in 1871, and at present employ about forty hands. They manufacture some seven hundred tons of straw-board annually, amounting in value to seventy-five thousand dollars. The firm also own a grist-mill and a saw-mill, and this very year have commenced the manufacture of boxes. Five hundred thousand feet of pine timber is now lying in their yard for this purpose.

At the Centre village the Merrimack Glove Company has established a very thriving business. The company procured, on favorable terms, the commodious building near the freight and passenger depots of the Concord and Claremont Railroad, which had been erected by the defunct Boston Boot and Shoe Company, and established its business in the early part of 1883. Late in the fall of the same year a large tannery was erected in connection with the factory. During the year 1883 the factory was run eight months, turning out some twenty-five hundred dozens of different kinds and qualities of buckskin gloves, which were sold to the largest jobbing-houses from Maine to California, giving perfect satisfaction and finding no superior in the market. The managers, having perfect confidence in the success of their enterprise, in 1884 increased the business more than one hundred per cent., and manufactured five thousand, employing some thirty-five hands. The amount paid for help during the year was fifteen thousand dollars. The company purchased, during the time, eighty-five thousand pounds of deer-skins; and the entire product of the factory, five thousand dozen gloves and mittens, were sold to different parties throughout the country. A cash dividend of six per cent. was paid the stockholders January 1, 1885. The stockholders of the company are as follows: A. C. Carroll, W. H. H. Cowles, George Savory,

¹ This was the same freshet that destroyed the Willey family at the White Mountain North. All the bridges at Warner were carried off by the flood, and the crop on the 1500 acres were entirely destroyed. August 25th is still remembered as the day of the "Great Freshet."

B. F. Heath, L. W. Chase, E. H. Carroll, Ira Harvey, J. R. Cogswell, R. S. Rogers and A. G. Marsh. The directors are A. C. Carroll, W. H. H. Cowles, George Savory, L. N. Chase and E. H. Carroll.

The Warner Glove Company, located on Depot Street, are doing a large and increasing business. The company employ about fifteen operatives, and do an annual business of ten thousand dollars. The stockholders are A. P. Davis, P. C. Wheeler and H. M. Gillin. Another enterprising firm is that of Bartlett Brothers, who manufacture coarse and fine excelsior at Melvin's Mills. This firm began business in 1871. They have six thousand dollars invested, and do a business amounting to seven thousand dollars annually. Number of employes, seven.

At Roby's Corner O. P. & C. W. Redington are engaged in the manufacture of hubs. They have a large establishment, employing some ten or a dozen men, and do a business of fifteen thousand dollars annually. The Kearsarge Fruit Evaporating Company have erected two large buildings at the centre village, containing five evaporators of the capacity of five hundred bushels of apples per day. They employ between fifty and sixty operatives during three months of the year, and sometimes evaporate forty thousand bushels of apples per year. Arthur Thompson is general manager. The total value of manufactured goods annually produced in town is not far from four hundred thousand dollars.

An article of this description would hardly be complete without some allusion to the more interesting features of Warner. The main street is situated in a valley, through which flows the Warner River with graceful, sinuous curves, while on either side the hills rise grand and green and beautiful, towering far above the spires of the churches. There is not, of a verity, a pleasanter or a more picturesque hamlet in the county of Merrimack. The streets are wide and beautifully shaded by maple and elm. Neatness and thrift characterize the whole surroundings. It is only eight miles to the summit of Kearsarge Mountain, which affords some of the finest scenery in New Hampshire. Summer tourists have had their attention attracted by the fine scenery of the adjacent country, and have visited the town in large numbers. The income from this class amounts to more than three thousand dollars.

Warner is famous for its picturesque nooks and rural drives. One of the most charming drives in Merrimack County is on the road from Warner village to Bradford. The distance is about nine miles, following the river valley and crossing the stream several times. Three little hamlets are passed on the route, each dignified on the map as railroad-stations, namely: Waterloo, Roby's Corner and Melvin's Mills. The former contains some twenty or twenty-five houses, a saw-mill, depot, post-office and school-house. Ex-Governor N. G. Ordway, of Dakota, and ex-Secretary of State William E. Chandler have very fine summer-residences at this place. The name Waterloo was bestowed upon this little rural neighborhood in honor of that great battle whose issue decided Napoleon's career forever. When the result of that conflict was announced, most of the citizens were collected at a mill-raising. The victory of the Allies was pleasing to those few individuals, and one, in the excitement of the moment, broke a bottle of rum (they drank liquor in those days), and christened the mill and the village with it,—Waterloo. The name has "stuck."

Two miles beyond Waterloo is Roby's Corner station, the residence of M. H. Roby and George C. Eastman. A beautiful scene lies here. A broad interval stretches to the south; green sloping pastures are on the west, and the east and north are bounded by high hills, covered with sombre pines and gnarled oaks that have bid defiance to the storms of years. Between Roby's and Melvin's Mills there is a gorge of wonderful beauty and wild grandeur. The river, bound in by a narrow defile, dashes and foams and roars, so as to be heard many rods away. Several dwelling-houses and a busy factory nestle below in the valley, and the railroad, with its high grade and trestle-work over the river, carries the steaming iron horse high above the chimney-tops. It is a wild and picturesque scene.

Melvin's Mills was so named after the Melvin brothers, who built a saw and grist-mill there as early as 1825. The Melvins were large, muscular men, and their feats of strength are still the wonder-tales of many a rural neighborhood. To the generations that have passed away Melvin's Mills and the Calico school-house were landmarks of particular interest. Davisville, in the southeasterly part of the town, is a beautiful and busy little village. It has the finest water-power to be found on the Warner River, and from the time the first mills were built here until the present time, it has been taken advantage of in every possible way. Most of the manufacturing interests of the place are controlled by various members of the Davis family, who have given their name to the little hamlet which has grown up around this valuable water-power. There is a small store at the place, a post-office and some fine farms in the adjacent section.

"North village," so called, is one of the pleasant little neighborhoods of Warner. The name has been in use during more than a hundred years. In the early days of the settlement there was quite a farmers' village on the Gould road and over Waldron's Hill. Between Bartlett's Brook and "Kiah Corner," a dozen deserted building-sites can be counted where families once resided. These, with the buildings that still stand, made a lively, bustling street, the first of the century. At the north of this line of dwellings extended another cluster of farm-houses, taking in the Elliots, at the J. O. Barnard place, and Isaac Dalton and his tannery, at the Levi O. Colby place. The people of the South road called this settlement of the North road the North village.

It is not strictly a village or hamlet now, the houses being too scattered to allow such a dignified appellation, but within the radius of a mile are some twenty-five houses, principally the homes of hard-working and prosperous yeomen. The surface of the land is uneven and somewhat rocky, but the soil is strong and fertile and large crops are raised. A wild, dashing little stream, called Silver Brook, having its sources among the eastern slopes of the Minks, flows down through the valley and joins the Warner River near River Bow Park. Along the banks of this rivulet the highway leads, lined on either side by the farm-houses, the shops and the ample barns of the rural populace. Graceful willows and birches, with here and there a maple or an elm, throw their branches out on the breeze and make a grateful shade in the warm summer-time. A drive through this neighborhood on a still, hushed noon or at the sunset hour is perfectly enchanting; and if one drives round by "Kiah Corner," he will view a scene that is not easily surpassed in New England. Another beautiful drive is through the Kimball District. A view from Kelley Hill, looking to the north and west, at the sunset hour, the whole Warner Valley, with the village in the foreground and Kearsarge Mountain standing as a sentinel in the background, is worth going miles to see.

Six ponds are within the limits of the township, namely: Tom, Bear, Pleasant, Bagley's, Simmonds and Day's. The largest of these is Tom Pond, or, rather, as it is now called "Lake Tom." This is a beautiful sheet of water half a mile long and a quarter of a mile wide. Its shores are attractive, its waters clear as crystal. During the last few years it has become quite a summer resort. A company has erected a commodious pavilion on its western shore, improved the adjacent grounds and built a fleet of boats for aquatic and piscatorial purposes. The pavilion and grounds were formally opened and dedicated on July 4, 1884.

CHAPTER IV.

WARNER—(Continued).

MEMORABLE EVENTS, NATURAL AND SOCIAL.

The Old Meeting-House Fight.—The quarrel in which Warner was involved over the question of the location of the meeting-house, from 1783 to 1790, was one which was fought out to the bitter end with intense feeling, and has probably never been equaled by anything which has occurred since in the history of the town.

Prior to 1819, when the State Legislature passed the "Toleration Act," by which the building of churches and the support of preaching was divorced from the State and the meeting-houses and the ministers were renounced to the support of those only of the citizens who were voluntarily disposed to give their aid, it was binding on every tax-payer to contribute his share, according to his means, to build meeting-houses and to pay the minister's salary. Therefore, it followed that every voter had a personal and direct interest in churches and ministers.

In our review of the evangelical history of the town we had something to say about the first church. This structure, which was built at the South Lower village, was small and rude, and was in use only four years. In 1779 it was superseded by another of larger proportions and superior architectural design, erected on the same site. This, too, in process of time, became too small for the needs of the citizens, and the question of a new one was agitated. Meanwhile the population had been increasing on the north side of the river, and they, for reasons of the greater convenience to themselves, wished a meeting-house built on their side of the river. The town could support but one church, and as the people on the east side, for similar reasons, wished the new building to be erected on the old site, a sharp controversy grew out of the matter. Innumerable town-meetings were held, and votes for and against a new house and against changing the location were passed in alternate confusion for several years.

Finally, at a town-meeting held in May, 1788, the town voted both to build and not to build, and, in hopes of a final adjustment of the vexed question, voted, according to the record, "to petition the General Court for a committee to appoint a place where to set a meeting-house in this town." In June of that summer Benjamin Sargent and Richard Bartlett, two of the selectmen, appeared before a committee of the Legislature with a formal petition, and the court accordingly appointed a trustworthy committee to decide on the location of the meeting-house. This committee was composed of Col. Ebenezer Webster, of Salisbury; Robert Wallace, of Henniker; and Joseph Wadleigh, of Sutton; and their report was as follows:

"The committee, having attended to the business referred to, and after viewing the greater part of the town, with the situation of the inhabitants thereof, agree to report as their opinion, that the spot of ground where the old meeting-house now stands is the most suitable place to set the new meeting-house on.

"Warner, Sept. 12, 1788."

This did not, however, end the fight, for at a meeting in October and at another in November the town repudiated the decision of the committee and voted not to build on that site. At last, April 25, 1789, it was voted to build between Ensign Joseph Currier's and Mr. Isaac Chase's, on the north side of the road, under the ledge, at the northwest end of what is now the Lower village. A building committee was appointed at the same time, consisting of Joseph Sawyer, Tappan Evans, Richard Straw, Jacob Waldron, Benjamin Sargent, Reuben Kimball and William Morrill.
